My hon. Friends the hon. Members for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin), for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), for Pontefract and Castleford (Yvette Cooper), and my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton and Shepherd's Bush (Mr. Soley), who used to represent Hammersmith—it was better in the old days when he and I were up for that seat and, happily, he got it—all raised the question of whether we should replace the ISC with a Select Committee. Let me make a number of observations before not closing the door on the idea.

First, we should give the ISC time to develop. All members of the Committee supported the proposal that the ISC should have its own investigative capacity. As the right hon. Member for Bridgwater said, we said in paragraph 21 of our response that we intend to consider that request

"as sympathetically as possible and discuss with the Committee any necessary strengthening of its staff."

So we understand the case for that. A separate investigative capacity would obviously enhance the role of the Committee, and in the long run would be an important protection for the agencies.

Secondly, although I do understand the important points of principle to which my hon. Friends the Members for Sunderland, South and for Workington referred, there is an important difference in principle between a Committee established by the House—we all know that it is exactly the same in practice—and one established by Act of Parliament with appointments to it by the Prime Minister. If we are to continue discussing the issue, it is important to recognise that, in practice, the way in which any Select Committee would operate, if it were to operate effectively, would be little different from the way in which the ISC operates in terms of the ring of secrecy and there having to be some prior vetting—ultimately by the Prime Minister—of what is published in the Committee's reports and so on. That said, we do not close the door for ever on the idea of a Select Committee. We want to see how the new developments that are now in train work out in practice.

Mr. Winnick: My right hon. Friend said that the existence of the ISC has been to the advantage of the security agencies, although originally they had reservations. Is it not a possibility that a Select Committee, with the restrictions that obviously would be necessary, would give the security agencies even more confidence? Is that not worth considering?

Mr. Straw: That is a seductive argument and it is certainly worth considering. With great respect to my hon. Friend, I shall leave the matter where I have just left it, which is that we should look to the strengthening of the operation of the ISC, which is only four years old. That is but a blink in the 1,000 years of Parliament's history—a matter that, no doubt, we shall discuss again on Thursday. Let us watch with care.

I shall now deal with the points raised by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe (Mr. Howard), in addition to what he said about the ISC becoming a Select Committee. First, he asked about serious crime and organised crime, a point to which the shadow Home Secretary also referred. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was entirely right to introduce what became the Security Service Act 1996. We supported the provision to extend the role of the Security Service into serious and organised crime. As paragraph 17 of the report states, during the period covered by the report, there have been 24 separate taskings of the Security Service in respect of serious and organised crime. I have seen a great deal of the service's work and believe it to be a valuable addition to the law enforcement effort against serious and organised crime. The Security Service brings expertise not currently available in the police or Customs and Excise.

The Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, the right hon. Member for Haltemprice and Howden (Mr. Davis), and the former Chairman, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) asked about resources and value for money. The National Audit Office has undertaken some value for money studies of the work of the agencies. That is very important. The NAO should have the fullest possible access to the work of the agencies.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne rightly reminded us that, if we take secrecy too far, we reduce internal accountability in the agencies. What happened in the Metropolitan police is a dismal story of an absence of the most basic systems for separating those who ordered services from those who paid for them.

The shadow Home Secretary asked about resources. As paragraph 19 of the report shows—this is not too partisan a point—the resources available to the services dropped significantly between 1994 and 1997-98. For a variety of reasons, some good and some not so good, the figure fell from £855 million to £707 million, then to £693 million last year. We are increasing the figure to £743 million for the next three years. Of course there is never as much money as has been sought, but that is a verity at all times for Governments and agencies. We believe that the services have adequate resources.

The right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe raised the point about access by staff to industrial tribunals. Work is in hand on that. We shall report to the House when the work is complete.

The right hon. Member for Bridgwater made a wide-ranging speech in which he raised the importance of improving the agencies' internal security. That was reflected in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) and the sage remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron). The issue is how to nurture and treat the staff of the agencies, while ensuring that we spot any staff who are becoming disaffected before they are tempted down the road of chequebook treachery—in the resonant phrase of my hon. Friend the Member for Rhondda—which we see too frequently.

The service recognises that internal security has to be improved. Paragraphs 26 and 27 say that the Committee will return to study that in further detail. That is important, because this is a good example of the work of the ISC complementing the work of the agencies. The process of cross-examination and demanding more scrutiny of those internal procedures should raise the standards of internal security.

The right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) asked about warrant signing—an old chestnut if ever there was one—and whether, rather than by Secretaries of State, warrants should be signed by commissioners along the lines of the commissioners established under the Police Act 1997. I should make two observations. The first was made by the right hon. and learned Member for Folkestone and Hythe, who said that the process of scrutinising and signing applications for warrants is one by which any holder of my office is able, day by day and week by week, to hold the agencies to account. It was not until I started on the process that I understood just how important it is as part of the line of accountability. It is not like having a meeting from time to time. The fact that warrant applications come through routinely and that one has the power to say yes or no to them means that the service must make a proper case for its operation and that the Secretary of State has responsibility to ensure that the law and its requirements are properly complied with. Behind any signature on the warrant, almost resting on one's shoulders, is the shadow of the interception commissioner, who is at present Lord Nolan. In my experience, Lord Nolan and his staff are very thorough.

Secondly, although I do not want to rehearse all the debates on the Police Bill that we had in the run-up to the election—even though I would be very happy to do so—I must point out that the argument at that stage was about the kind of system for authorising warrants other than that of a Secretary of State. It was generally accepted—certainly on both Front Benches—that, had any Secretary of State or putative Secretary of State been rash enough to volunteer to take over warrantry for intrusive surveillance as well as for interception, there would not have been an argument either at this end of the Palace of Westminster or the other. It was precisely because that was not on offer that we had to make other arrangements.

The hon. Member for Cheltenham (Mr. Jones) rightly refered to some important issues on behalf of his many constituents who work at GCHQ and, indeed, on behalf of the town of Cheltenham. GCHQ is dominant there both as an employer and in its rather questionable architecture. Other hon. Members on both sides of the House have referred my involvement—I say only partial—in the fact that there have been four director-generals of GCHQ in the past three or four years. I seek exoneration. I should point out that the present permanent secretary to the Home Office, David Omand, in respect of whose appointment as director-general of GCHQ I played some part, served for slightly longer than I have been Home Secretary. That, at least from the point of view of Conservative Members, is a period that cannot come to an end too quickly. I cannot speak for David Omand's predecessors or successors.

Other issues that have been raised in the debate include the question of the holding of files. On 29 July I disclosed what I said I was going to in the Adjournment debate in February. Getting on for 300,000 files of one kind or another are held by the Security Service, although most of them are now closed. How those files are disposed of is very important. I am absolutely clear about one thing, which I made clear in the debate in February and again in July: no individual on whom a file may be held should have any say over whether a file should be disposed of.

It is extremely important to people's civil liberties as well as to a study of the history of this country that objective criteria should be laid down, which the Security Service should be able to follow. It is for that reason that we have asked the Lord Chancellor's Advisory Committee on Public Records, under the chairmanship of the Master of the Rolls, Lord Woolf, with the help of some very distinguished historians, to look at the criteria to be laid down. Their report will—I think—be made available to me just before Christmas.

Mr. Beith: Will the Home Secretary look again at the logic, or lack of logic, of the Government's response to this point? It is simply not the case to say that it would be second guessing if there were independent scrutiny of which files were to be destroyed. That will be long after operational decisions have been taken.

Mr. Straw: I shall look again at that matter and come back to Committee members.

Sir Norman Fowler: Does that mean that the Home Secretary will look again at the position of an independent check, because that is what is being urged?

Mr. Straw: Yes. The Committee has urged that there should be some kind of independent check in respect of files that have long ceased to have any operational value. The question whether a file is operational or not must be a matter for the director-general. There is then a separate question of whether a file that has had no value for many years should or should not be disposed of.

The first stage is that we are getting advice from the Lord Chancellor's advisory committee. The second issue is whether there should be any independent scrutiny of the decisions made about the disposal of the files. The Committee said one thing, and the Government have raised the issue of second guessing. Many representations have been raised this evening about whether we should think again and—without pre-empting our second thoughts on the matter—I am happy to take it away and think again.

Before I conclude, I shall refer to one other matter—the role of the commissioners and the tribunals. As the report makes clear, there have been a number of complaints to the tribunals and commissioners over the years but, so far, none of those has been successful. That could lead to the conclusion that the tribunals—despite the fact that they are chaired by eminent jurists—are simply there to whitewash the operations and poor practices of the agencies. On the other hand, it could mean that the internal processes of the agencies are sufficiently thorough so that—at least up to now—it has been quite appropriate that none of the complaints has been substantiated.

I believe that it is very much the latter, and not the former, that is the truth. In terms of interception, what has been striking to me—as someone coming entirely new to my role as one of the few Secretaries of State dealing with warrants—is how thorough the process is. Therefore, I am not surprised that no complaint has been upheld, and long may that continue. The interception of communications is, in principle and in practice, a serious violation of people's civil liberties, and it should take place only when the narrow criteria laid down in legislation are complied with.

I finish where my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary began—by paying tribute to a number of people. First, I pay tribute to the Chairman and the members of the Intelligence and Security Committee for the thoroughness of their work and for their independence of judgment, which shines through this report. Secondly, I pay tribute to a small group of officials in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Home Office and the Cabinet Office who are very often unsung but have the important task on behalf of Ministers of monitoring the work of the agencies.

Thirdly, I pay tribute—and express the thanks of the whole House—to the staff of all the agencies. They do very important work—important to the security of this nation, important in terms of our economic well-being and important in trying to make our society safe from serious crime. Those are dedicated people who, because of the nature of their work, cannot speak for themselves. It is right today that Parliament and the House of Commons has spoken for them, and has recognised the value, importance and integrity of their work.

Mr. Mike Hall (Weaver Vale): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Millennium Tower, Portsmouth

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

9.48 pm

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I am delighted to have this opportunity to raise an issue that is important for the people of Portsmouth and south Hampshire; indeed, I am sure that people in much of the United Kingdom will be interested to know about it. I am also delighted that we have a few extra minutes, as the hon. Members for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Rapson) have said, either to me or to the local newspaper, that they want to contribute to the debate—we would have been stretched if we had had only 30 minutes.

In March 1995, no one in the area opposed the decision by Portsmouth and Gosport to make a bid for funds for a landmark project. The bid offered a great opportunity for jobs, not only in the short term—in construction and in the many different aspects of the scheme—but in the long term, as a result of the development of new and existing attractions. As the then leader of Hampshire county council, I strongly supported the bid; indeed, I convinced my colleagues on the council to invest a great deal of money in the schemes, particularly in those in Gosport.

The schemes were put together in such a way that the community and many members of the council had little real input. They were dreamed up by people who had their vision and then brought other people in. No one can deny that those involved in the initial concept formed a close-knit circle—that may be how such ventures have to start, and I am not suggesting that there is anything wrong with it. However, at every stage, the public, especially in Portsmouth and Gosport, should have been brought in on the act—they needed to have a positive and meaningful share in the proposals. That did not happen.

There could be few doubts about some aspects of the project. Someone needed to step in to redevelop the older and more rundown areas of Gosport, particularly the former service establishment at Priddy's Hard. Realistically, only the millennium package would provide the opportunity for such investment.

There was also a need to rekindle development in the less rundown former Ministry of Defence establishments in Portsmouth. The Mary Rose, HMS Warrior, HMS Victory and the naval museum needed to be rejuvenated so that the heritage area could sustain the number of visitors that we had come to expect and that it had come to depend on. For the area, the millennium package was vital.

It was suggested that we needed something to spark the imagination of the Government, the nation and—most important—the Millennium Commission. The small team came up with the idea of a tower, although no one then knew what it would look like. We saw artists' impressions of cross-channel ferries sailing by the tower through a gigantic arch of water created by water cannon across the harbour between Portsmouth and Gosport. It all looked very nice.

I had been in local government in Portsmouth for nearly 30 years, and was leader of Hampshire county council. I had been a trustee of the naval museum and the Mary Rose, and had been actively involved in raising money for all the projects in the heritage area. Indeed, I had convinced the local authority to give the best part of £1 million to help the heritage area. However, I doubted whether a tower would be a viable proposition in that area, for reasons that I stated loud and clear.

To succeed, a tower would need to attract visitors, but the area contained a number of competing activities—people with limited resources would have to choose what to spend their money on.

As I know from family experience, towers can be divisive. Some people like to go up them and some do not. In a family of four, two may want to go up and two may not, as I found with my family. What does one do?

A day out in the heritage area is a wonderful experience, but it is not cheap. One needs the best part of the day, and the entry fee for a family of four plus buying a small snack at lunchtime costs £60 or more. Not too many families can do that very often. The tower would be another attraction in the area. It will have to be self-sustaining and viable and will need an awful lot of visitors.

I raised strong objections to the tower, which was first suggested in March 1995. Construction should start in a few months, but the planning application that is before the city council tells us nothing.

On Friday, I asked the planning officer to tell me what the tower was to be made of, what colour it would be, what maintenance would be necessary and how long it would last, but he could not. He said that we would have to learn all those things between now and when the planning committee meets. We must bear in mind the fact that the council has just signed a deal with the Millennium Commission to build the tower at a cost of £23 million. How can anyone be so specific, if we do not know what the tower is to be made of? When the concept was first agreed nearly three years ago, the Millennium Commission was to have a 35 per cent. share, but it has now increased it to 68 per cent.

The history of the concept is interesting. The then Secretary of State for National Heritage, the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley), visited Portsmouth—it was one of many visits, as she passed the site whenever she went to her holiday home on the Isle of Wight, and I am sure that she greatly enjoyed the trip out of Portsmouth harbour—and made great play of the fact that the tower should be of national and international significance. She likened the competition that should be held to design it to that held when Trafalgar square and Nelson's column were created. I think she said 144 people submitted bids to build the column and create the spectacle in Trafalgar square. She felt that Portsmouth deserved a similar competition. However, we did not have it.

Well-known architects such as Sir Norman Foster, Michael Wilford, who took over from James Stirling, and Santiago Calatrava, who built the Barcelona olympic tower, all expressed interest in the concept, but none was asked. The city council and the developers offered the people of Portsmouth and the surrounding area three options. The developer visited me in my offices in Parliament street, and told me that he did not like one of the three. He told me which one he preferred, and said that the third had been included to give people three choices.

Funnily enough, the private sector developer, Berkeley, did not get the design that it wanted, as the public chose the spinnaker. However, the public were not asked whether they wanted a tower at the entrance of Portsmouth harbour. They were simply asked which one of the three designs they preferred.

No one objected to any of the other aspects of the millennium scheme. Many of them, such as the boathouse project, Priddy's Hard and the millennium walkway, are essential to the growth of the areas concerned, and the potential is enormous, but most people in Portsmouth, when asked about the tower, say that it is a waste of money. I would have said so had I not been a member of the council. I would have said that the money could have been better spent on hospitals, schools and many other things.

I had dozens of letters asking me to get the commission to spend the money on other things, but we were not offered a choice. The city council said, rightly, that the commission had made it clear that the money was for a tower, so a tower it had to be.

At the same time, the Ministry of Defence was releasing the Gunwharf site at HMS Vernon, and it was intended that the tower should be part of the development. The millennium scheme and the development of Gunwharf were so interwoven as to be inextricable. I asked the Ministry of Defence about the disposal of the Gunwharf site. I am very disappointed—

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

Mr. Hancock: The reply from the Under–Secretary of State for Defence said:

"Offers for the Gunwharf site were sought on the basis of open market value and took into account the Planning Brief for the site previously provided . . . The bid chosen was considered to provide the best value for money. I am withholding information on the details of the sale receipt under exemption 14 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information."

I find that outrageous from a Government who came into office saying that were for open government. How on earth can the sale receipt for a piece of public real estate be withheld? What on earth can be the commercial significance of that disposal?

Berkeley got the prime site that it wanted. Until March, April, May this year, Berkeley was expected to build the tower. The city council was stupid enough to sign an agreement with the Millennium Commission saying that it was committed to building a tower, without having Berkeley signed up to build it. Once the commission had us on the hook and had checked the projects that Berkeley, the city council and others had submitted, I started to query the figures. I was told that the figures had been put together professionally, and that Berkeley, the city council and, more important, the commission were happy with the figures.

I have written well over 200 letters to the city council, the commission and others, to try to get the answers to questions, but those answers have been difficult to come by. I am a member of the city council, and I have not been able to get straight answers without writing at least three times, on some occasions, with the same question.

When I challenged the figures, I was told that there was nothing wrong with them. I wrote to the Millennium Commission on 11 February asking what it thought of the figures, given that the tourism market was very vulnerable. The commission had always maintained that its role was to be extra vigilant with public money. I wrote to the chief executive to tell him that I would be raising these points, and he had the opportunity, if he had wanted to, to contact me today.

The chief executive of the commission wrote:

"The testing and assessment of the visitor impact of the various proposed projects, and the impact of each project on the others, is primarily a matter for the Renaissance promoters. As you know, an assessment has been done, it was put to your local authority some time ago. It is the Commission view that that assessment was reasonable."

The commission allowed the development to continue, but it did not know that, at the same time as that letter was being written to me, Berkeley, the developer, had told the city council that it no longer believed the figures.

In July, Berkeley wrote to the city council:

"During the course of our discussions, however, we agreed to work in co-operation with Portsmouth City Council and to be helpful as possible in terms of helping Portsmouth to secure the building of the Tower . . . we offered a contribution of £3 million".

They were offering £3 million because they wanted to walk away.

In the same letter, the developers say:

"At that meeting we made it absolutely clear to you that we considered that the visitor numbers produced by Deloitte & Touche for the Tower were badly flawed and that the Tower was not financially viable."

Those people were set to make millions of pounds out of the development, with the tower right next door as the landmark project. The developers had verbally committed themselves, and certainly the city council innocently believed that they were going to build it. However, the developers walked away once they had scrutinised the same figures which the Millennium Commission assured me—and, I suspect, their commissioners and the Secretary of State—had nothing wrong with them. The developers were even prepared to offer £3 million to the city council as a consolation.

We were then left with no private finance, except for the £3 million, and some land for the scheme. What could the city council do next? Where could it get the money? Nearly 200 press releases have been issued by the city council about the project since 1995. The amount of spin that has been put on the tower project would make Shane Warne, the Australian spin bowler, look professionally inept.

Within weeks, the press releases contradicted themselves. One week it was claimed that 4,000 jobs would be created, and the next it was 3,500. Ludicrous claims were made, including that the Fine Arts Commission was to be consulted on the design of the tower so that we would not get a second-rate design. It has never been asked in three years for its opinion on the tower. Why not? Press releases sent out by the city council claim that the Fine Arts Commission would be a key player in ensuring that the tower would be the best we could have.

We were left with no private money, except for the £3 million, and a very difficult problem for the city council. It tried to attract other private finance. It could not do so, so it went back to the Millennium Commission, which suggested the downgrading of the whole scheme from more than £40 million to £38 million. The water feature was felt to be impossible to achieve and the only satisfactory alternative was a mobile water cannon mounted on a barge. The Millennium Commission felt that that was unacceptable, so it turned it down. Car parking was reduced, and sculptures and other landscaping around the heritage area were removed from the plan.

The Millennium Commission said that it would put more money into the tower, the cost of which escalated from 35 per cent. of the project to 68 per cent. That meant that the tower would cost the largest sum of any single project in any landmark scheme. The commission is basing that investment on the assurances given by Portsmouth city council. I know that the city council wants the tower to succeed, and I do not want to see it left in a mess. I represent too many people who find it hard enough to get through the week, without having to pay bigger bills to fund any unsuccessful aspect of the project. Once it is started, there is no alternative to success.

Two Secretaries of State have visited the area, and they were both enthralled by the concept. Both have given substantial support, although one would have liked to see a competition and the other, the current Secretary of State, did not seem to be too interested in any criticism of, or possible liabilities arising from, the scheme.

The purpose of the debate tonight is to try to obtain from the Minister firm assurances for the people I represent that she will not allow Portsmouth city council to be left holding a very expensive baby, in the short, middle or long term. We are talking about a 500 ft-plus tower that people can go up and down, costing £23 million. The project remains to be built, and the original concept was for design, building and operation in a single package by a single partner of the city council—Berkeley Homes. None of that has happened. Now, the tower will, for the first time, be in the ownership of the city council. That is an amazing and enormous liability for the next 50, 75 or 100 years. No one expects the tower to come down in 25 years. It will be there for a significant period, and it will be an continuing liability.

Portsmouth city council is negotiating with two types of people. It needs someone to build the tower for £23 million, and I have been assured that there is a good chance of a fixed-price contract. The council is also seeking someone to operate the tower at no cost to the council. I wish it luck. Anything short of that would be totally unacceptable. The Government must see that that cannot be allowed to happen. When the Public Accounts Committee discussed landmark projects, it said that no local authority should be left with a continuing liability, as that would be unfair, and not sensible.

If building begins and the finances do not run according to plan, I want the Millennium Commission or the Government to support the costs. There is no guarantee that the tower can be built for £23 million. We do not even know what it will be made of. Will it be steel and concrete? Will it be concrete alone? We do not even know what will be on the outside. What we do know, however, from our experience in Portsmouth at three schemes—a housing development at Portsdown park, the Pyramid leisure complex and the Tricorn development—is that building projects can cost local authorities a great deal of money and heartache. The people of Portsmouth will not forgive the council, any of the city's politicians or the Government if the scheme goes wrong, leaving them holding a very expensive baby.

As the agreement stands, the Millennium Commission can step aside like Pontius Pilate, self-righteously saying that its job is to protect public money, and that, once an agreement is made that the city council should deliver the project, its obligations to safeguard public money and the interests of the people of Portsmouth cease. Portsmouth city council would be left alone to be responsible, because it had signed an agreement to build the tower.

The tower is too important to be regarded as a matter for a political row between colleagues, as the hon. Member for Gosport has suggested in the local paper. What I am saying is too important to be dismissed as waffle or grandstanding, as it has been by the hon. Member for Portsmouth, North in the local paper. The matter is important because people have not been consulted, except by way of press releases that contradict themselves over a three-year period and that, in some cases, give nothing but misleading information.

Portsmouth has significant problems relating to education, social services, housing and many more policy areas. Every precious pound that can be squeezed from the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions is needed to fund local government services. We need every penny we can get. The city succeeds because of its successful ferry port, but nothing should be allowed to jeopardise our fragile financial situation, and we are no different from Gosport or any other local authority area in that. We must maintain the stability of our finances, and that can be done only if someone gives some assurances that will remove the burden from Portsmouth city council.

If we have to have a tower—and I am not convinced of the need for it—it must be something of which we can all be proud. It must not require other things to be added to it to make it viable, so that it is something short of an Alton Towers feature. It should be publicly accessible, it should be something that we can be proud of as a nation and the people of Portsmouth should not have to pay for it in years to come. I hope that tonight the Minister will lift much pressure from me and, potentially, from the people of Portsmouth.

Mr. Syd Rapson (Portsmouth, North): I have a different story. Although the tower is not in my constituency, the city council covers a tightly knit area. I represent the people of Portsmouth as much as the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) does. The hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) and I speak with the authority of the local authorities involved in the scheme.

I have been a local councillor for as long as the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South. We are local government people as well as Members of Parliament. I believe in local government. I believe that democratically elected local government has the right to decide planning for local people. It is not the job of Parliament to try to overcome that, as if we are the guardians of everything that goes on and can overrule what people want locally.

The project was originally dreamed up as a landmark scheme. The tower and the water fountains were an important part of the scheme that was chosen. Berkeley did not do enough investigation into visitor numbers. It is basically a building company. When it did its homework, it found that the numbers were not quite correct. The city council had to re-evaluate the scheme, which it did recently with the support of the Millennium Commission. The commission crawled all over the figures to ensure that everything was absolutely correct.

The commission insisted that the city council underwrote the cost of the scheme. The city council did that, although it has operators ready to guarantee to underwrite the commercial risk involved. Delicate negotiations are going on, which is why things are kept fairly confidential. The city council has a millennium sub-committee, which has all the information, with a representative of the Liberal Democrat group on it. All the information is with local councillors.

The scheme is viable. An operator is ready to come in to run the tower. I must explain one confusing point. The original idea was that a company would take on the whole scheme and had to build a tower that would cost a considerable sum. It had not worked out the figures and has drawn back, offering £3 million back. The package has been rearranged with commission money and other moneys. The tower will be built within the money envelope that we now have. The only difference is that the operator does not have to find the money for construction, only for operation. It can do that.

This is a local government issue. We have total confidence in the scheme, which is well supported by the people of Portsmouth. It should be considered in that context. It is a worthwhile project, which should be supported by all.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) was fortunate to obtain this debate, in which I intervene with his consent. It was particularly good of him to allow that, because he knows that my view is not exactly parallel with his.

The Portsmouth harbour millennium project is very important to the whole Portsmouth-Gosport area. It will involve the development of walkways with retail opportunities around the museums and the characterful Portsmouth harbour area, with its naval and civilian yachting movements. It will develop the defence heritage area of Portsmouth harbour. If successful—I am confident that it will be—it should result in the sort of project that has been so successful in places such as Barcelona, San Antonio and Philadelphia.

It is a big project, involving £81 million, of which about half will be provided by the Millennium Commission. We hope that, whereas in the past people have visited the Portsmouth area specifically for one purpose—perhaps to see Victory, Warrior, of which I am proud to be a director, or the submarine museum—the scheme will develop into the sort of project that people will visit not for a day but for two or three. There is overwhelming support for the tower's spinnaker design, to which the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South referred. The local newspaper said:

"without the tower, the whole project collapses into meaningless rubble. It is the focal point, the beacon that will lure visitors to the revitalised harbour area."

That is a strong way of putting it, but the tower is an important part of the millennium project. It is a symbol of the imaginative plan that is so important to the Portsmouth harbour area and the whole of south Hampshire. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that she gives her full backing to completion of the project.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Janet Anderson): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) for the opportunity to put the record straight regarding Portsmouth city council's support for this exciting project. I am also grateful to the hon. Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) for confirming the project's importance to Portsmouth, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Rapson), who has long been a supporter of the project, and who illustrated his firm wish to see it succeed.

I must emphasise, first, that local authorities are independently elected bodies, answerable for their policies to their electorate. It is for each authority to decide whether the scope of its powers is wide enough to carry out a particular activity. Section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 allows authorities to incur expenditure up to specified limits if, in their opinion, it is in the interests of their local area.

It is also important to remember that the renaissance of Portsmouth harbour is a Millennium Commission project, not a Government initiative. As the House is aware, the commission is a politically independent body, and the Government do not wish to compromise that independence. The detail of the project and the associated contractual negotiations remain matters for the Millennium Commission and the grant recipient.

In September 1995, the commission awarded a grant of £40 million to the project, against an anticipated total cost of £86 million. The renaissance of Portsmouth harbour is an ambitious development, incorporating many individual projects. The scheme emphasises public access to the harbour water front, linking the communities of Portsmouth and Gosport, and promoting the area's maritime history. It focuses on creating an international maritime arena that will provide leisure opportunities for local residents and visitors alike.

The project was developed by the Portsmouth and South East Hampshire Partnership, a consortium of local authorities and businesses. It has been led by Portsmouth city council on behalf of Portsmouth Harbour Renaissance Ltd. At an early stage in the appraisal process, the Millennium Commission identified the project as having the potential to become one of its landmark developments. Combined with the scheme's complex nature, that fact led the commission to work in partnership with the applicant during the development stage.

Tonight's debate, however, concerns specifically the construction of the millennium tower. The tower has always been a key element of the project, integral to its success. In March this year, local people unambiguously selected the spinnaker design as the preferred design concept, and outline planning permission was secured. The intended cost of the tower—some £22 million in total—was to be met partly by the commission, which would contribute £9 million, and partly by the Berkeley group.

In July, Berkeley decided to reduce its cash contribution from some £10 million to £3 million, although it remained committed to a contribution in kind of £4.3 million to provide the necessary infrastructure. That decision created a funding gap.

Portsmouth city council has now agreed, if necessary—I stress the words "if necessary"—to underwrite a portion of the commercial risk of the tower's operation. I understand that the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South takes issue with that decision. It is not unreasonable to ask why the city council should choose to invest in a scheme which the Berkeley group apparently did not find attractive.

Fortunately, I am able to answer that question. In July, Berkeley undertook a review of the business plan, and decided that the anticipated income projections from the millennium tower did not justify the level of capital expenditure that it was committed to provide. That was partly because the initial business plan had incorporated a number of commercial enhancements to the tower—restaurants, and so on. However, the spinnaker design—which, as the hon. Member for Gosport pointed out, was chosen by local people when they were consulted—does not include those elements; it is an architectural piece, a landmark.

Mr. Hancock: Have the Minister's officers at the Millennium Commission told her that there are proposals to enhance the tower? Have they told her that there could be a rollercoaster going around the base of it, or up part of it, and that there might be some sort of exciting ride as well? That would reduce what the Minister has just described as a free-standing piece of architecture to something that might have to be continually upgraded to keep people coming.

Is the Minister aware that the viability figures that she mentioned have now been reduced by nearly 300,000 in terms of the number of visitors?

Janet Anderson: I hope that, if the hon. Gentleman is patient, I shall be able to answer his questions. If I do not, he is at liberty to write to me, and I shall answer them then.

Berkeley's decision is not the issue here. It is perfectly reasonable for a commercial company to choose to withdraw from a project if it does not appear that substantial returns will accrue. Portsmouth city council, however, is a body with different priorities. It exists not to make a profit, but to promote the best interests of the local population. The city council strongly believes that the scheme in its entirety will have significant benefits for the local community. The most conservative analysis suggests that it will increase the number of visitors to the area, create additional employment, and raise the profile of Portsmouth, both within the United Kingdom and abroad.

Furthermore, the decision to underwrite the project merely makes explicit an implicit undertaking that was always part of the project's business plan. As a partner of Portsmouth Harbour Renaissance Ltd., the city council was party to an implicit underwriting of the entire scheme. It formalised that commitment to provide the Millennium Commission with additional security, although it is unlikely that it will ever be called upon to honour it.

Portsmouth Harbour Renaissance Ltd. is currently involved in complex negotiations to find a replacement commercial operator for the tower. It and the Millennium Commission have every confidence that such an operator—one who shares their view that the millennium tower is an integral part of the harbour renaissance scheme—will be found. It is regrettable that, at such a delicate stage in this exciting project's development, the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South should see fit to push into the public domain the subject matter of such sensitive negotiations.

Mr. Hancock: Will the Minister give way?

Janet Anderson: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not. I have only a few minutes left, and the hon. Gentleman said that he wished to hear what I had to say.

I hope that what I have said will reassure him, but let me make one final point to provide him with yet more reassurance. The leader of the council has given me an absolute assurance that, in the very unlikely event of the council's ever having to underwrite the operating costs of the millennium tower, there will be no question of its front-line services being cut as a result.

The hon. Member for Gosport mentioned a leader in the 2 October issue of the Portsmouth paper The News. Let me repeat part of what that paper said:

"when the Portsmouth South MP gets his teeth into something, he doesn't let go. But he is as wrong about the harbour's millennium tower now as he has been all along . . . Mr. Hancock never wanted the tower but he has lost the argument and it is time he accepted it."

The Government's opinion in this matter is straightforward. We believe that the Millennium Commission has made the right decision in agreeing to support the renaissance of Portsmouth harbour project, and we hope that the negotiations will soon be resolved in the interests of the people of Portsmouth and Gosport. We invite the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South to join us in that desire.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Ten o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

The Secretary of State was asked—

One-stop Clinics

1. Mr. Douglas Alexander (Paisley, South): What progress is being made in the development of one-stop clinic services in Scotland. [56101]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Sam Galbraith): We are making good progress towards modernising the national health service. About 80 one-stop clinics have so far been established throughout Scotland. That is an important step towards our aim of better and quicker treatment for everyone.

Mr. Alexander: Can the Minister tell the House what steps are being taken to support one-stop clinics for my constituents in Paisley, South?

Mr. Galbraith: My hon. Friend's local hospital has made considerable progress. There are already one-stop clinics for breast cancer, colorectal cancer, prostatic assessment, early pregnancy and cardiology. Those clinics are well on their way to providing better and quicker treatment for all their patients.

Gaelic

2. Mrs. Ray Michie (Argyll and Bute): What steps he is taking to encourage more Gaelic-speaking teachers to undertake training for work in Gaelic-medium units. [56102]

The Minister for Education, Scottish Office (Mrs. Helen Liddell): The Government are committed to Gaelic and plan to spend £5 million more on Gaelic education over five years, including £200,000 annually for in-service teacher training.

Teacher education institutions have targets for Gaelic student numbers; suitable Gaelic-speakers taking a primary postgraduate certificate in education receive free tuition, regardless of any previous support that they may have received; and the Scottish Office funds publicity promoting Gaelic-medium teaching.

Mrs. Michie: I thank the Minister for that comprehensive answer. My particular concern relates to primary school Gaelic units. I remember that Strathclyde region identified Gaelic-speaking teachers in its area and offered them retraining, but nothing much happened. I hope that the Minister will undertake to encourage education authorities to identify Gaelic speakers, retrain them through colleges or distance learning, and offer them development prospects.

I invite the Minister to tear herself away from the central belt and visit the units in Mull, Tiree and Islay. She will see what excellent work they are doing, but they are always on a knife-edge in case they lose a teacher whom they cannot replace.

Mrs. Liddell: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for her generous invitation, which I should love to take up. I know that she has had a particular concern about Salen primary school on Mull, which lost its Gaelic teacher and then lost the supply teacher, who moved away rapidly. I understand that a teacher is now in place, so that difficulty should have been resolved.

It may reassure the hon. Lady to know that Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools has undertaken research which shows that there are a substantial number of Gaelic-speaking teachers who are interested in teaching through the medium of Gaelic. Education authorities can provide support for those teachers to enable them to teach in Gaelic-medium units. The Government have set aside an additional £200,000 annually for in-service training for Gaelic teachers. Earlier this year the General Teaching Council held a seminar on Gaelic-medium education. My officials, together with the GTC, are seeking to address the issues that were raised at that seminar, with a view to making further progress.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): I welcome my right hon. Friend to her position on the Scottish Front Bench and congratulate her on her rise in status to membership of the Privy Council. She will recall that I wrote to her recently about other modern languages, as well as Gaelic. Can she tell the House what plans she has in store for Scottish schools to advance the learning of other modern languages, which are so vital in the present European context?

Mrs. Liddell: I thank my hon. Friend for his generous comments. I am aware of the correspondence that he sent me in relation to the teaching of modern languages. He will know that a recent report by Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools revealed rather disturbing news about the teaching of modern languages in Scottish schools. As a result, I have asked officials to strengthen the guidelines for initial teacher training to include stronger encouragement for developing modern language skills. I am also setting up a languages action group to work with the Scottish Consultative Council on the Curriculum to tackle a programme, including a review of the guidelines on modern languages for five to 14-year-olds, and to give advice on attainment targets for modern languages in primary and secondary schools. I will also ask the Scottish qualifications authority to review the standard grade arrangements for modern languages because, quite frankly, we cannot have a modern Scotland if the Scottish people are not proficient in modern European languages.

Businesses (International Financial Crisis)

3. Mr. Eric Clarke (Midlothian): What steps he has taken to assist Scottish businesses in respect of the recent international financial crisis. [56103]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Donald Dewar): Although my hon. Friend is right to be concerned about the turbulence in the world economy, the latest monthly figures show that unemployment in Scotland continues to decline and employment to increase. The Government endeavour to help businesses by promoting a competitive, stable domestic economy. Scottish Enterprise is reviewing its economic development strategy at my request and, with my Department, is providing specific assistance to areas experiencing particular problems.

Mr. Clarke: May I take this opportunity to thank everyone who wrote to me and sent get well cards—particularly you, Madam Speaker?

The Secretary of State knows that many businesses go to the wall because confidentiality is imperative in their day-to-day dealings. Does his Department have a hotline or an equivalent service from which businesses may seek assistance? If businesses could consult such a service more quickly, there would be fewer redundancies and less unemployment.

Mr. Dewar: My hon. Friend's reappearance on the Bench, in fighting form, is very welcome. In Scottish terms, the House is a much quieter place when he is absent. I am delighted to see him back and boisterous.

As to his specific question, many local enterprise companies run one-stop shops with entry points. I agree entirely that, at a time when there are inevitable economic difficulties given worldwide conditions, it is particularly important that those who believe that they have a viable future but who require assistance over a difficult patch establish contact with local enterprise companies, Scottish Enterprise, Highlands and Islands Enterprise or directly with my Department. That would give us the chance to offer what advice and help we can. I am very much in the business of taking a positive approach to firms experiencing difficulties.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I am sure that the Secretary of State will have heard many business people in Scotland express concern about the strength of the pound and the level of interest rates. Given that interest rates are significantly lower in countries that are about to become members of the single currency than in the United Kingdom, and given that tens of thousands of jobs in Scotland depend on manufacturing industries that export to European Union destinations, will the Government firm up their recent more positive sounds about economic and monetary union and establish a clear timetable for a referendum and British membership of the single currency?

Mr. Dewar: It is always a pleasure to hear Liberal party policy, and it is good that the hon. and learned Gentleman pushes his line with such charm.

As to the wider issues that he raised, he may have to approach my colleagues at the Treasury. However, in 1997, for example, exports from Scotland increased by 12 per cent. I take a bullish view of the Scottish economy's medium and longer-term prospects, but I am anxious not to see a return to stop-go economics and to boom and bust. I certainly do not want to return to the days—it was not so long ago—when we saw interest rates at 15 per cent. and many associated problems. The hon. and learned Gentleman is entitled to point to the Conservative Front Bench in that regard. The Chancellor is determined to end that situation, and I think that he has the full support not only of my right hon. and hon. Friends but of many other sectors of political opinion.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Ochil): I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware that a number of Scottish companies have suffered as a consequence of the international turbulence and, therefore, are not necessarily able to meet the regional selective assistance targets to which they were previously committed. Will my right hon. Friend and his colleagues continue to look sympathetically at those companies' requests that their problems be considered if the employment targets to which they were committed in more optimistic times are not met?

Mr. Dewar: I would approach my hon. Friend's suggestion with a great deal of caution. RSA is very tightly controlled—and rightly so. Regional selective assistance is paid when jobs are delivered, and I want to hold to that principle. I repeat my message: firms that experience particular difficulties should not be slow in coming forward and approaching the Scottish Office and Scottish Enterprise, because they may be assisted in other ways. We naturally look sympathetically at cases in which, despite certain difficulties, the long-term viable job prospects seem to be good and realistic. I hold to the fact—there are examples that underline this point—that RSA needs to be tied to the targets that have been promised.

Mr. John Swinney (North Tayside): In the light of the continuing economic difficulties in the shorter term to which the Secretary has referred, does he recognise the folly of the real-term reductions in the budgets for Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise? Does the right hon. Gentleman not consider that, in view of those difficulties, he should reverse the cuts and give himself more room for manoeuvre to invest in areas of Scotland that are suffering economic difficulties, such as the borders and the south-west?

Mr. Dewar: I certainly recognise the folly of taking a simplistic line, as the hon. Gentleman has just done, on this matter. The hon. Gentleman is referring to the adjustments that we have made, particularly to the property portfolio of Scottish Enterprise. We wish to invest not in property but in people, skills and economic growth. Secondly, we have adjusted Scottish Enterprise's training budget because £70 million a year is coming in under the new deal and more is being spent on skills and training in Scotland than previously. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware of those facts. I hope that he will both accept them and rejoice, with me, in the fact that Scotland is leading the way in the new deal: there are 15,500 people already in the system; 2,600 are now in jobs; and 5,700 employers have already signed up.

That shows that that part of the budget of Scottish Enterprise and the new deal, working together, are having considerable success.

Ms Rachel Squire (Dunfermline, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there are some success stories among businesses in Scotland? Will he join me in welcoming the additional 1,400 jobs that will be coming to the Fife area through BSkyB? Will he join me also in paying tribute to the management and work force of Solectron Scotland Ltd., which deals with the global manufacturing electronics industry? I visited its plant in Dunfermline yesterday, where it now employs nearly 1,300 people.

Mr. Dewar: I am happy to endorse what my hon. Friend has said. It is important that we remember that, although there have been disappointments recently and some failures, we have been creating more jobs in Scotland than we have been losing. I hope that that situation will continue. Certainly every effort will be made to ensure that it does. In 1997–98, Locate in Scotland concluded 87 inward investment projects coming to Scotland, creating and safeguarding 18,000 jobs. I welcome the expansion in Dunfermline by BSkyB. I am well aware of the reputation and excellence of the work that is carried out by Solectron.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Does the Secretary of State expect unemployment in Scotland to fall or to rise between now and the establishment of the Scottish Parliament?

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Gentleman, like me, will have to wait and see. Thanks to the determined line that is taken by the Government—for example, taking £20 billion out of the borrowing requirement and the way in which we have held down inflation—we are certainly very much better placed than many competing countries to ride out the turbulence that has resulted from the collapse of the far east economies and from events in Russia. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would want to pay tribute to that and join me in hoping that we can continue the excellent record to which I have referred.

Dr. Fox: The right hon. Gentleman's evasiveness is matched only by his willingness to blame other people. Let us go through what the Government are doing. With exporters facing continuing difficulties; with the failure of the new deal to attract sustainable jobs; with tax rises of the equivalent of 5p in the standard rate since the Government came to power; with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in an hour's time, about to downgrade his own growth forecast; with an increase in borrowing; with a tax raid on pensions; and with a soon-to-be-announced extra 23p per gallon on petrol, which will further damage confidence in the rural economy, does not the Secretary of State accept that the price of the Government's incompetence is bound to be paid for in lost jobs, and that the next get well card that he writes will be to the Scottish economy?

Mr. Dewar: The hon. Gentleman should try to come into the real world. I am prepared to debate with him as long as his arguments are in any sense creditable. As a start, for his education, he should consider the previous Government's record and the problems that they experienced over a long period. I am confident that Scotland will ride out the troubles and that the fortunes of the Conservative party in Scotland will always be much worse than those of the Scottish economy.

Higher Still

4. Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): If he will make a statement on progress towards implementing the new Higher Still exams. [56104]

The Minister for Education, Scottish Office (Mrs. Helen Liddell): The Government are committed to re-establishing Scotland as a world leader in education. As part of the agenda to raise standards in schools and levels of achievement, the Government are committed to the start of the Higher Still programme by August 1999. The Government recognise the professional concerns of teachers and we have responded vigorously to those concerns. Funds of more than £24 million have been committed to support classroom teachers, on top of the £20 million already invested centrally to ensure that the start of Higher Still is a success.

We have also approved an extra two in-service days for Higher Still training and provided an unprecedented amount of national training, support materials, assessment exemplars and information leaflets, and a telephone helpline for teachers.

Mr. St. Aubyn: Given that the new access intermediate 1 and 2 courses will be phased in over three to five years, why has not the Minister taken the trouble to introduce the Higher Still exams over a phased period? Is not the truth that she would rather spend her time playing party politics for the Scottish Labour party?

Mrs. Liddell: Oh dear, Madam Speaker! I am glad that the people of Guildford are taking such an interest in Higher Still, but perhaps I can pass on some accurate information. The introduction of Higher Still is phased. It has been delayed twice. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) is shaking his head; I doubt whether he even knows what Higher Still is.

The phasing of Higher Still is designed to ensure that, in the upper years of Scottish secondary education, we widen the opportunities for young people of all abilities so that they learn certain key core skills. Those with special educational needs can do highers at access level and those who are very able can do advanced highers that prepare them for university. Higher Still, which began in 1992, is a phased programme, as it should be because it is one of the most radical changes in Scottish education for many years.

I have been conscious of teachers' anxieties, and with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I met the Educational Institute of Scotland. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on."] Conservative Members are yawning because they do not find the subject interesting. I am today inviting the Educational Institute of Scotland to participate in a liaison group that will consider further phasing where there is explicit proof that exceptional difficulties exist in a specific subject or in named schools. Any request for additional phasing must have the support of the head teacher and the local authority. [HON. MEMBERS: "This is taking for ever."] Although Conservative Members may not be interested, parents and teachers in Scottish schools are extremely interested.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): Does my hon. Friend share my amazement at the comments of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) about Higher Still? The problems with the higher levels of Scottish education were identified at the beginning of the 18 years of the previous Government. It is only now that a vigorous programme to modernise the curriculum is being introduced. Does my hon. Friend share my concern about how long it takes to introduce major changes in the Scottish curriculum? It has taken many years, and there is a danger that a long time may pass before changes are introduced to deal with a problem that has been identified.

Mrs. Liddell: My hon. Friend makes a valid point. The route to Higher Still began in 1992, which is why it is not acceptable to the Government further to delay its implementation. My hon. Friend is right also to draw attention to the lamentable performance of the previous Government, who for 18 years downgraded Scottish state education. This Government are determined to ensure that Scottish state education returns to its rightful place as a world leader. That is how we shall modernise Scotland and raise standards and achievement in Scottish schools.

Mr. Andrew Welsh (Angus): In view of Scottish teachers' low morale and increased work load, will the Minister now repudiate the Daily Record headline which referred to Labour's war on teachers? Surely this negative attitude must be replaced by co-operation with the teaching profession, which understands the problem and offers the only means of delivering for Scottish education. The Minister's liaison group comes rather late in the day; such action should have been taken much earlier.

Mrs. Liddell: I greatly welcome the fact that the hon. Gentleman is taking such an interest in education; perhaps we shall soon hear some education policies from his party. The teaching profession has welcomed Higher Still, and I share the profession's commitment to it. My main priority is to raise the standards and levels of achievement of the children in Scotland's schools. That is the aim of all those who are properly concerned about Scottish education, unlike the hon. Gentleman's party which seems committed to the dumbing down of Scottish education.

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): What the Minister says is encouraging, in as far as it goes, since the Government have averted a possible conflict with the teachers' organisations. I hope that the Minister will continue to show some sensitivity towards the problems outlined by teachers, especially modern language teachers, who cannot understand why modern languages are not a core subject for Higher Still. As the Minister knows from other correspondence, many English teachers are very concerned about the content of the syllabus. Will she treat sympathetically those genuine concerns?

Mrs. Liddell: I am happy to tell the hon. Gentleman that I will indeed take these matters on and treat them sympathetically. I know of his interest in them. I am anxious that the guidelines for modern language teaching should be improved. HMI's report has shown that, in many instances, teachers were unclear about what the guidelines recommended, which suggests that the guidelines themselves were not sufficiently clear. As for the introduction of Higher Still in English, I have taken on board some of the points made by teachers who had professional concerns, especially about assessment. We have therefore altered the arrangements for the assessment of English. I hope that Higher Still will be introduced in August 1999. Indeed, the Government are committed to that, and I look forward to Scottish education returning to its rightful place as a world leader.

Employment (Southern Scotland)

5. Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): What additional steps he proposes to assist employment creation in the south of Scotland. [56105]

12. Mrs. Caroline Spelman (Meriden): If he will make a statement about the economic prospects for the borders. [56113]

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Donald Dewar): I have just returned from a series of meetings in the borders and last week I undertook a similar visit to Dumfries and Galloway. I heard at first hand about the problems that are being encountered. My Department is working with local organisations to address those problems. A number of initiatives are in hand, including additional support for both local enterprise companies. To give another example, I was able yesterday to confirm approval and funding for the A7 traffic relief scheme at Hawick, which should offer important economic development benefits.

Mr. Morgan: Further to that reply, does the Secretary of State agree that transport costs are a vital factor in job creation in the south and south-west? Will he undertake to urge the Chancellor to reverse his current policy of increasing road fuel duty by some 6 per cent. annually above the rate of inflation—a policy that will result in petrol costing £4.50 by the end of this Parliament and which will cost jobs in the south and the south-west? [Interruption.]

Mr. Dewar: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I am interested to hear Conservative Members shouting that the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. The Conservative Government, for very understandable reasons, followed a policy of introducing real increases above the rate of inflation for many years. Their words either show an inability to remember the past, or else drip with hypocrisy.

As for Dumfries and Galloway, I had extremely constructive talks with the council, the local enterprise companies and other interests there. We are trying to help them to build for the future. I recognise the importance of tourism and job-creation measures. I assure the hon. Gentleman—I suspect that he will have heard this from others—that we are properly engaged in finding a way forward.

Mrs. Spelman: Agriculture is in deep crisis in the borders, and currently, I understand from my relatives, about 1,700 jobs are at risk. Will the Government accept responsibility for the mismanagement of this sector, or continue to blame the rest of the world and the people of the borders?

Mr. Dewar: On the hon. Lady's question about accepting responsibility for mismanagement, the answer is no. I hope that she is following the BSE inquiry with close attention, because she might find it instructive. I certainly accept that there are difficulties in the agricultural sector. Sadly, they affect almost every section of the industry at the moment, which is a particular problem.

As the hon. Lady knows, we spend about £500 million a year in Scotland on agricultural support of one sort or another, and a successful effort was made last year to find additional help for farmers. If she likes to study the advanced arable area payments, the order on split ewe carcases, the increase from 60 per cent. to 80 per cent. on advance payments on the special beef premium and a number of other measures that have been taken over recent weeks and months, she will see that a great deal is being done. We are in constructive dialogue with the National Farmers Union of Scotland.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will my right hon. Friend reflect on the success of the task force established in Haddington in my constituency, following the loss of 510 jobs at the Mitsubishi factory seven months ago? The task force, which involved the Employment Service, the Benefits Agency, the local enterprise company, the Scottish Office and the local authority, succeeded in getting 450 out of 510 people into alternative employment or training places, and is still working on getting the remaining 60 people placed. Should we not be talking about positive achievements of that kind, rather than listening to Jeremiahs from Meriden or the Scottish National party?

Mr. Dewar: I have not visited Meriden to count the number of Jeremiahs, but that may be an interesting expedition for the future. My hon. Friend is right to point to that success, following the great disappointment of the Mitsubishi closure in Haddington. It is perhaps a reminder that, when there is a Government with a bit of energy and initiative, a great deal can be done and that, despite what we often hear from Opposition Members, the economy is not in free fall. We have not plunged into deep recession and we are much better placed than many of our competitors to ride out these problems.

I should comment on Viasystems, because of the bitter blow to the borders economy. I had a useful and constructive meeting with the shop stewards last night in Selkirk. They are also trying to look to the future in a way that does them great credit.

Scottish Parliament

6. Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): If he will make a statement on publicity for the elections to the Scottish Parliament in May 1999. [56106]

The Minister for Home Affairs and Devolution, Scottish Office (Mr. Henry McLeish): Next May's elections to the Scottish Parliament will be the first to be held in Scotland under the additional member system. We believe that the right to vote must also mean a right to understand, and we therefore intend to make sure that voters are properly informed about the change.

Mr. Gray: Some commentators have scurrilously suggested that the £2 million campaign which the Government propose is designed to shore up their flagging support in the forthcoming elections. Leaving that on one side, does the Minister not agree that that expenditure falls into roughly the same category as expenditure in Government information campaigns before referendums? If so, does he intend to be as dismissive of the Neill Committee in that area as he was last week? [Interruption.]

Mr. McLeish: I am reminded from my Back Benches that we also read the polls. They would be instructive reading for the Conservatives, should they keep reading them, especially between now and the May elections in Scotland next year. There is something ironic and paradoxical about such an attitude coming from a party that will be sent a life line through the additional member system because it has not a hope of winning in a first-past-the-post contest in Scotland in the near future.

We are creating a Scottish Parliament, which is a new institution, and a new method of voting, which is a simple, commonsense way forward. Surely it must be right that people understand that system, and we are seeking to hold a public information exercise that matches the aspirations of the Parliament. It will help the people of Scotland in the run-up to the elections, and I certainly hope that all parties represented in this House will endorse the principle that we need to educate the people of Scotland in relation to the specific additional member system, which involves not only one, but two votes. It is vital that that is made clear.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): My hon. Friend will be familiar with the problems of elderly people who have to try to get to a polling station that is up a steep hill or about a mile from their home, even though they may have a school next door to them. Will he consider what influence he can bring to bear on the electoral registration people to ensure that that sort of nonsense is brought to an end, especially for the first elections to a Scottish Parliament?

Mr. McLeish: I can reassure my hon. Friend that we are considering those issues. It is vital that there be no practical or physical impediments to people voting. We are concerned about older people, and we are also targeting younger people and those with special needs, so that they can use the ballot boxes in the polling stations to the best advantage. That is high on our agenda, and I reassure my hon. Friend that we are closely considering any possible improvements that we can make.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): In the light of the Minister's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray), and his response and that of his colleagues to Lord Neill's report, does he understand the widespread scepticism about the Government spending millions of taxpayers' pounds on a mass information campaign? Will he give the House a categorical assurance that, before it is published, the Government will put the entire campaign before Lord Neill for him to review its neutrality?

Mr. McLeish: We do not recognise such widespread scepticism, because there is none. That is Conservative Members' interpretation. They obviously do not visit Scotland or speak to Scots, because they are out of touch. The basic issue is that the public information exercise is about a new institution and a new method of voting. I urge the Conservatives and members of every other party to endorse the principles of a public information exercise. At the appropriate time, there can be discussions with Opposition parties. This exercise is in the interests of Scotland: it is not about the narrow political interests being pursued by the Conservative party.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok): Does the Minister recognise that there is substantial under-registration in many areas of Scotland? That is the legacy of the poll tax, for which the Conservatives are remembered. Will he enable as many people as possible to register by ensuring that local authorities are given a proactive role in chasing up people and giving them the opportunity to vote in the first election for a Parliament in Scotland?

Mr. McLeish: I can tell my hon. Friend that that has already happened. We were keen to target older people, younger people and those with special difficulties. We have worked with local authorities on a registration campaign in Scotland. I am convinced that that will increase the number of people registered. That is highly appropriate, given the historic setting of the elections for the Scottish Parliament next year.

Beef

7. Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): If he will make a statement on the beef industry in Scotland. [56107]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): The Government appreciate the fact that beef producers are particularly exposed to the present difficulties in the farming industry. That is why we are providing record support to the farming industry, approximately half of which goes to the beef farmer. Scottish beef producers also benefit from the Government's financial support for specified risk material controls and for the cattle tracing system set-up.

Mr. Paterson: Does the Minister agree that Scottish beef is now the safest in the world, and that there is no proven link between bovine spongiform encephalopathy and new version Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease? Does he further agree that there are no human health or animal health grounds to maintain the beef ban? The ban is flagrantly political, and a grotesque abuse of our trading arrangements with our European partners. Instead of coming up with such complacent answers, the Government should take the case of the Scottish farmers to the European Court.

Mr. Macdonald: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has forgotten, but the beef ban was one of the legacies of the Conservative Government.

Mr. David Stewart (Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber): My hon. Friend will be aware that I recently carried out a survey of 400 restaurants and hotels in my constituency. It showed that 90 per cent. stock and are a source of Scottish beef, and 99 per cent. are very satisfied with the quality of Scottish beef. Does my hon. Friend agree that the imminent lifting of the European beef ban will provide a vital new niche in the market for Scottish farmers and their high-quality product?

Mr. Macdonald: Indeed, I am encouraged by the report of my hon. Friend's constituency survey. Although cattle prices have been lower everywhere in the past year, Scottish quality beef products are fetching a premium in the market. When the beef ban is lifted, the prospects for Scottish beef exports will be good.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): Does the Minister share the optimism of the United Kingdom's Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food that the beef ban should be lifted by the turn of the year? The Minister was in the Chamber last week when the agriculture Minister said that he hoped, sooner rather than later, to announce what I think he described as a significant package of additional help for the hard-pressed agriculture sector. Will that be reflected in the Scottish Office vote, and in what the Scottish Office is able to give the Scottish agricultural community?

Mr. Macdonald: The hon. Gentleman will have to wait for future announcements. We are working flat out to lift the ban on beef exports; there has been considerable progress since the Government took office, and we are continuing to work on it. It should also be said that the Government are providing record support for the agriculture industry: £500 million a year is going into farming, and during the year we have increased that by £50 million.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Given the drop in farm incomes and the apparently increasing gap between farm-gate and supermarket prices, will the Minister consider three fairly non-controversial steps? First, will he ensure that rigorous carcase checks are carried out for residues so that, now that our beef is the safest in the world, no consumer is put at risk by imported beef? Secondly, will he ensure, through labelling, that consumers see clearly how they can support the domestic industry? Finally, will the Government actively encourage supermarkets and caterers to procure home-produced food? Those three simple measures would go a long way to improve the environment for farmers.

Mr. Macdonald: As the hon. Gentleman will know, action has already been taken in regard to beef labelling and supermarkets. The gap between prices paid to farmers and prices paid by consumers has caused concern, but, as the hon. Gentleman will be aware, the Office of Fair Trading is preparing a report on the major supermarkets, which should be published before the end of the year.

Local Government Housing

8. Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): If he will make a statement about the level of council house debt in Scotland. [56108]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): As at 1 April 1998, council house debt in Scotland was estimated to be £3.9 billion.

Mr. Taylor: Who is financing all that debt? Can it be that the taxpayers of the rest of the United Kingdom, including my constituents, are underwriting housing debt in Scotland?

Mr. Macdonald: The hon. Gentleman is wrong on both counts. In fact, council tenants service debt through their rents. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to attempt comparisons between England and Scotland, I can tell him that the average council house debt is pretty similar in both countries. The total council house debt in England is £20 billion.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South): I congratulate my hon. Friend on the forward-looking policy that the Government are about to introduce in order to bring about much-needed investment in Scottish council housing through the new housing partnership. Will he confirm that that falls very far short of privatisation? It is nothing to do with privatisation; it is about giving council housing back to tenants and local communities, so that they can invest the money that they need to make their houses better.

Mr. Macdonald: I can give my hon. Friend an absolute assurance to that effect. We are increasing investment in housing by 40 per cent. over the next three years from the level of investment that we inherited. The object of new housing partnerships is indeed to modernise Scottish housing stock, to lever in new investment on top of the public-sector investment and to provide real community control over housing, along with real powers for tenants, in their own neighbourhoods, over their own houses.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Can the Minister answer a simple question about the Government's approach to housing? If it is possible to offer, as a carrot or incentive, the writing off of debt for private partnership companies, why is it not possible to offer the writing off of debt to councils throughout Scotland?

Mr. Macdonald: There are two reasons for the transfer to community ownership. First, it will allow the new community landlords to lever new investment into housing, on top of the public-sector investment that is already being provided. Secondly, it will provide real powers for local communities and the tenants who live in them.

Film Industry

9. Mr. Tom Clarke (Coatbridge and Chryston): When he next expects to meet Scottish Screen to discuss the potential for film production and exhibition in Scotland. [56109]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Sam Galbraith): My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has no present plans for a formal meeting with Scottish Screen. I met the chairman of Scottish Screen, James Lee, on 2 June and again on 2 September.

Mr. Clarke: Does my hon. Friend recall the film review that I co-chaired, which published in March "A Bigger Picture", focusing on the absolute need for more investment in film production, especially in Scotland? Does he have a view on the three projects that are being proposed for major film studios in Scotland? Will he bring together the various agencies as well as Scottish Screen to ensure that, in the interests of Scottish culture and, indeed, of our economy, films about Scottish subjects are produced in Scotland?

Mr. Galbraith: I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend's expertise in this subject and, in particular, to his report, "A Bigger Picture", which has given considerable guidance and great vision to the film industry throughout the United Kingdom. I welcome moves towards its location in Scotland. It is for Scottish Screen to consider the options for funding and location in the light of what is in the best interests of the whole of Scotland when developing the film industry in our country.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

The Minister of State was asked—

Debt (Late Payment)

28. Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): For what reasons legal aid debts are being exempted from legislation on the late payment of debts. [56131]

The Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The money that is paid by the Legal Aid Board to lawyers is currently outside the scope of the Late Payment of Commercial Debts (Interest) Act 1998 because the amount of legal aid payments is decided by Parliament through regulations. Claims for payment have to be taxed by a court or assessed by the board before they can be paid. Therefore, there is no direct contractual relationship on which the late payment legislation could operate.

Mr. Chope: That answer just will not wash. The Law Society has made representations to the Government saying that they are guilty of sleight of hand in relation to this. If Law Society payments were to be exempted, they could have been exempted in the main legislation. Masses of small firms of solicitors throughout the country were waiting for the Lord Chancellor's Department to pay debts outstanding for more than six months. They were looking forward to the legislation. At the last minute, they have been excluded from the rights under it. If a debt is incurred for the Lord Chancellor's wallpaper, that will carry interest, but a debt for a core legal service that is provided to the Lord Chancellor's Department does not.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman has this wrong. Provision of legal aid does not currently come within the legislation simply because there is no direct contractual relationship. There will be a direct contractual relationship if the Government carry through, with Parliament's approval, plans for reforming legal aid to establish contracts. In those circumstances, there will be a contract against which late-payment legislation can bite.

Public Records

29. Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): What assistance is given by his Department to persons who cannot afford to pay the prescribed fees for the issue of public records. [56132]

The Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): There are no prescribed fees for the issue of public records; the records are made available free of charge at the Public Record Office. The only fees that are payable regarding public records are those prescribed by the Public Record Office (Fees) Regulations 1998 for the provision of copies of records and for other services that are offered by the Public Record Office.

Mr. Kidney: I thank my hon. Friend for that answer. I refer him to birth certificates. Clearly, most people need to buy a full certificate at some time during their life and some people have difficulty in affording even the modest fee for such certificates. Therefore, I urge my hon. Friend to consider some formal scheme for exemption from such fees. Looking to the nearer future, will he think about using the internet more to make copies of documents available, where they will be directly accessible to more and more people?

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his suggestion. The Public Record Office is microfilming an increasing proportion of its most popular records. That will enable visitors to print out copies at a reduced cost and non-visitors will benefit from lower charges for prints from film. Increasingly records are available electronically in schools, libraries and in people's homes via the internet. I hope that that development will continue.

Legal Aid

30. Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): If he will list those insurance companies selling insurance products to underpin conditional fee agreements. [56133]

The Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Insurance products to underpin conditional fee agreements have been available since July 1995 when conditional fee agreements first became lawful. The number and range of insurance products are increasing with new products becoming available all the time. I am aware of at least eight providers of insurance to underpin conditional fees. I am aware of at least two other products that are likely to be brought on to the market over the coming months. I doubt that a comprehensive list exists or, indeed, could be put together, given the vibrant and expanding nature of the market.

Mr. Paterson: The insurance industry will currently underwrite only personal injury cases for conditional fee agreements. What does the Minister intend to do about the public who take any other case to court?

Mr. Hoon: A wide variety of insurance products are available. There are insurance products available to cover any sort of risk, but the premiums to cover significant risk are available at a significant cost. Obviously, as the market develops, we will see a lowering of the cost of those premiums.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I congratulate the Minister on his promotion in the last Government reshuffle and I offer him my commiserations on his inability to extract himself from the grip of the Lord Chancellor.

According to the Consumers Association report, "Legal Expenses Insurance: Realising its Potential", which was published this year, only 17 per cent. of adults in Great Britain have legal expenses cover. That compares with the 1990 figure of 27 per cent. It also appears that mostly the more affluent and middle-aged households take out this insurance. Given that the Government are taking away legal aid from the least affluent and leaving them to rely on their own limited resources, can the Minister say whether his proposals will increase or decrease access to justice for the poor?

Mr. Hoon: We have made it clear that legal aid will not be withdrawn from anyone in our society unless and until there are effective alternatives and effective access to justice. The extension and development of conditional fees will allow that to take place in due course, but we have made it clear that we want to see an extension of legal expenses insurance. We believe that that is appropriate for the great majority of people. Equally, we have made it clear that no one will lose out unless and until there is effective access to justice for them.

Immigration Appeals

31. Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): How much spare capacity exists in magistrates courts in the Greater London area and nearby; and what assessment he has made of the extent to which this could be used to help to tackle the backlog of immigration and asylum appeals. [56134]

The Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): It is important to emphasise that magistrates courts are locally managed services. Each of the 22 magistrates courts committees in the Greater London area is primarily responsible for the use of the courtroom accommodation in their individual area. However, we are currently examining ways of using spare capacity in the magistrates courts to assist in bail hearings in detention cases. I should emphasise that the key restraint in reducing further the backlog of immigration and asylum appeals is not accommodation, but the shortage of adjudicators, which we are tackling vigorously.

Fiona Mactaggart: As my hon. Friend is aware, I have asked this question because the suggestion was in the recent review of immigration appeals paper. I am concerned to find out what progress has been made in dealing with the large backlog which means that these cases are delayed.

Mr. Hoon: The Government have put a great deal of effort into reducing the backlog of appeals. I can assist my hon. Friend by setting out the relevant statistics. In July 1997, the figure for outstanding appeals by adjudicators was 34,907 and by September 1998 that had been reduced to 22,298. We anticipate that by the end of March 1999, that figure will have been reduced again to some 16,000 cases.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, such is the backlog of immigration matters, for all sorts of different and understandable reasons, the law is being brought into disrepute? Will he examine the method used in Holland for dealing with illegal immigrants where adjudicators are on the spot the whole time so that cases can be dealt with immediately and do not block up the magistrates courts?

Mr. Hoon: I do not accept that the law has been brought into disrepute. However, the appeals process is currently under review and I would welcome the hon. Gentleman's suggestions for other ways in which these matters may be resolved more effectively and, certainly, more speedily.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I welcome the Minister's actions so far in dealing with the backlog. However, does he accept that one way of dealing with the backlog—which clearly causes enormous distress to applicants—is to appoint more adjudicators? What action is he taking to ensure that more adjudicators are appointed to deal with the ever-increasing number of cases?

Mr. Hoon: The Government have appointed new adjudicators since our election in May 1997. There are currently 34 full-time adjudicators and 212 part-time adjudicators. A recent recruitment board for full-time appointments is expected to result in the appointment of at least eight new adjudicators. A board for part-time appointments is due to commence shortly, to which 77 candidates have been called to interview. We shall continue to increase the number of adjudicators with a view to reducing the backlog.

Legal Aid

32. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): When he last discussed his legal aid reforms with the Lord Chief Justice and the other heads of divisions of the High Court. [56135]

The Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The Lord Chancellor and I meet the Lord Chief Justice and other senior judges regularly. We discuss many areas of mutual interest, including legal aid.

Mr. Amess: In the light of the Lord Chief Justice Bingham's remarks that any legal aid reform should be proceeded with cautiously and slowly, is it wise of the Government to rush ahead with their reforms, which many experts believe are ill thought out and will make the situation worse?

Mr. Hoon: It is not for me to comment on what the Lord Chief Justice thinks of the Government's proposals. However, I note that Lord Bingham, at his recent press conference, expressed support for our plans to refocus legal aid and to extend availability of conditional fees. I certainly welcome that endorsement.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I am happy to congratulate the Minister on his recent promotion. Last night, the Lord Chancellor made a speech on the proposed community legal service. What legal services will the community legal service be providing, first, for those who now qualify for legal aid, and, secondly, for middle-income Britain?

Mr. Hoon: Yesterday, the Lord Chancellor outlined our plans to establish a community legal service, which will improve access to justice by refocusing the traditional legal aid scheme and provide more help, and more effective help, to the most vulnerable people in our society, particularly in relation to social welfare law and employment, housing, debt and benefit advice.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Inverclyde): I hope that those legal aid developments and reforms will be of positive assistance to the witnesses who hope to give evidence to the Bloody Sunday inquiry, which is chaired by Lord Saville. Many of the witnesses, both in England and in Northern Ireland, are on low incomes. They need and deserve such assistance.

Mr. Hoon: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's suggestion, and shall ensure that whichever member of the Government is responsible for the matter is made aware of his observations.

Magistrates Courts

33. Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): What criteria are used to determine whether a magistrates court should close. [56136]

The Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): There are no statutory criteria. Magistrates courts are locally managed by magistrates courts committees under the provisions of the Justices of the Peace Act 1997. It is for individual MCCs to identify their own criteria when deciding their own accommodation needs, after consultation with the local paying authority. My Department has no role other than to determine any appeals arising from a local dispute.

Mr. Russell: Does the Minister agree that magistrates courts committees are quangos, and that they are strangled by the amount of money that is provided by the Lord Chancellor's Department? Does he agree also that the vast majority of cases dealt with by magistrates courts committees could be dealt with locally, and that there is a hidden plan to close magistrates courts across the country—as hon. Members on both sides of the House know?

Mr. Hoon: I assure the hon. Gentleman that there is no hidden plan. I was also slightly surprised at the tone of his question, which effectively challenged the importance of local decision making. I should remind him that "far too much power has been concentrated in Westminster and Whitehall", and that

"democratic government should be close to ordinary people".

Mr. Russell: Rubbish.

Mr. Hoon: The hon. Gentleman says that, but those words should sound vaguely familiar to him, as they are from the Liberal Democrats' manifesto, on which he was elected in May 1997.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): Surely one of the problems with magistrates courts is that sufficient numbers of cases are not being referred to them. Is there nothing that the Government can do to ensure that matters such as juvenile crime are dealt with more in magistrates courts, and that we shorten the time that it continues to take between charging and an appearance before a magistrate?

Mr. Hoon: As the hon. Gentleman will know, one of the Government's basic promises to the electorate was to speed up youth justice. We are doing that, the work is under way and we are seeing the results up and down the country.

Civil Justice Review

34. Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): If he will make a statement on progress in the implementation of the Civil Justice Review. [56137]

The Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): Our plans for introducing the first phase of civil justice reforms on 26 April 1999 are on target. The new rules will be finalised by the Civil Procedure Rules Committee this month. After approval by the Lord Chancellor they will be laid before Parliament in December. We plan to publish them with supporting practice directions and key forms in January 1999.

The latest edition of the Lord Chancellor's Department's bulletin, "Implementing Civil Justice Reform" contains further details of the work in hand and will be available in the Library today.

Mr. Dismore: Does my hon. Friend agree with my view—from experience of 20 years in practice—that the reforms will necessitate quite substantial retraining and re-education for practitioners and some re-tooling in terms of new technology? What assistance will his Department give practitioners to meet the deadline for the introduction of the new rules?

Mr. Hoon: The latest draft rules have been available on the Department's website and in hard copy form since July, so practitioners have had a great deal of time to prepare themselves. There is no reason why the reforms should not go ahead as planned in April. Indeed, any delay would cause uncertainty to the practitioners about whom my hon. Friend is concerned.

Pre-Budget Statement

3.30 pm

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): In this year's pre-Budget report, we seek to steer a course of stability amid a world economic downturn. We set in place measures to improve productivity and provide support for enterprise, we introduce new measures to make work pay for all our people and we show how we will invest in health, education and our infrastructure to provide the modern services on which people rely—in each case taking long-term decisions that will equip our country for the future.

The background to the report is the global downturn. It started in Asia and has reverberated throughout every continent. Not only has it shifted the balance of risks in the world economy from fears about inflation to fears about growth, but it has forced every country, continent and international financial institution to cut its estimates for growth.

World trade growth is set to fall by two thirds. Forecasts for world growth have now been virtually halved. One quarter of the world is in recession and in this uncertain world, my objective for Britain is that we steer a stable course and, by building our long-term strengths, we are more than equal to any and every challenge that the global economy presents. Because in the past 18 months inflation has been brought down to its target of 2½ per cent. and because Britain has set in place a long-term monetary framework with the independence of the Bank of England, Britain is better placed than in the past to face the global difficulties. Because, too, Britain has tackled its structural deficit in public finances, we are more able to steer that stable course, but as all forecasts around the world have made clear, there is acute uncertainty about the eventual outcome of global financial instability. We are conscious of the balance of risks: on one hand, the risk of a sharper slow-down in the world economy as a result of instability and the effect on confidence and, on the other hand, the risk that inflationary pressures might persist. So the pre-Budget report is set with this firmly in mind: no denial of short-term difficulties and no diversion of policies for long-term strength.

Our challenge in the year ahead is to strengthen the three essential foundations for long-term strength and success. First, Britain now has for the first time a credible long-term framework for both monetary and fiscal policy. It has an inbuilt capacity to respond credibly to short-term pressures and we shall not be deflected from it. Secondly, with business, in order to build on that stability, we are putting in place a strategy to tackle a fundamental long-term economic weakness—the 40 per cent. productivity gap with our most successful competitors. These measures will include investment in education and innovation, and new encouragement for enterprise and for competition.

Thirdly, with our welfare-to-work programme and by ensuring that work pays, we are extending opportunity to all in our country, creating a Britain where no one is excluded, no potential is neglected and everyone has a contribution to make. It is a Britain that is both enterprising and fair.

First, I shall deal with the foundation for long-term economic stability. Official figures show that by spring 1997, with consumer spending growing at an unsustainable pace, inflation was heading way above the country's 2½ per cent. target to twice the level of our competitors—4 per cent. and above—and that at that time, Britain was set to repeat the boom-bust cycle that led to 15 per cent. interest rates for one whole year in the early 1990s.

Because immediate action was taken, making the Bank of England independent and tackling the inflationary pressures, inflation is today at our target of 2½ per cent. I can announce that for future years our forecast is that inflation will stay on target. As a result, Britain's long-term interest rates have come down from more than 7 per cent. in May 1997 to 5 per cent. The differential between Germany and Britain has narrowed by nearly 1 per cent. Long-term interest rates are now at their lowest for 35 years and the lowest since Britain's boom-bust cycle first became entrenched.

Because Britain has brought inflation under control, it has been possible, as the world has turned downwards, for interest rates to respond more quickly and in a more forward-looking way than in past economic cycles. In the previous economic cycle, interest rates remained in double figures for more than four years. In contrast, the Bank of England has already been able to reduce interest rates to respond to a changed international environment.

Long-term monetary stability is a precondition of our economic success. I reaffirm my support for the Bank of England's independence, for its remit and its membership. I do not believe that any political party, putting the long-term interests of Britain first, will, on reflection, bring party politics and short-termism back into interest rate decisions.

It is also because Britain has a new long-term fiscal framework with clear disciplines set out in the code for fiscal stability that we are laying before Parliament this afternoon that, as world growth slows, fiscal policy is able to make its contribution to stability and future growth in Britain. The official figures published today confirm that in our first year, we cut the budget deficit from the £28 billion that we inherited to £8 billion. That tightening has continued throughout our second year—a total fiscal tightening in two years of 3¼ per cent. of national income. So, fiscal policy has played its full part with interest rate policy in tackling inflationary pressures.

Because we have concentrated on priorities and cut waste, spending this year will be £2 billion below the ceilings that we inherited. As a result, our current budget this year is expected to be £5½ billion in surplus. What in the Budget was prudently projected to be net borrowing of £1 billion this year is now expected to be a debt repayment of £1½ billion.

The golden rule is that over the cycle we balance the current budget. In other words, on current spending, we eliminate the structural deficit that we inherited. Again, I can report to the House that because of the tough action that we have taken since we came into government, that is exactly what we are now achieving.

Now that we have broken with short-termism and created for the long term a stable monetary and fiscal framework with an inbuilt capacity to be more responsive to the economic cycle, fiscal and monetary policy can together contribute to stability and growth in the coming years.

My forecast for 1999 of 1 to 1½ per cent. growth in our economy will see Britain steering a stable course, even when one quarter of the world is in recession. As the economy returns to its sustainable growth path, we expect growth to be between 2¼ and 2¾ per cent. in 2000, and between 2¾ and 3¼ per cent in 2001.

It is because we are cautious about the balance of risk in the economy that we have based our public finance forecasts on assumptions deliberately more prudent than those made under the previous Government. First, our public finances are planned on an estimate of a 2¼ per cent. trend rate of growth—¼ per cent. lower than the assumption that we inherited. Secondly, our forecasts have revised downwards the ratio of VAT receipts to projected consumer spending, reducing estimated revenue by nearly £4 billion over the next five years.

Thirdly, revenues from tackling fraud have been set at a more cautious level than in the previous Parliament. Fourthly, we have discontinued the highly imprudent practice of assuming revenues from privatisations that have not been agreed. In each case, our assumptions have been audited by the independent National Audit Office, and because of the experience of the early 1990s we have adopted a more prudent approach to forecasting income tax and corporation tax revenues, including a cautious estimate of revenues from self-assessment.

Even after making those prudent assumptions, and taking into account the world downturn, we meet our first rule—that of balancing our current budget over the cycle. We expect the current surplus to be £1 billion next year, £3 billion in 2000–01, £8 billion the year after that, and £10 billion and £11 billion for the two years to follow. For the same years, net borrowing is expected to be £4 billion, then successively £5 billion, £2 billion, £2 billion and £1 billion.

Those figures are better for every year of this Parliament than those for any year of the previous Parliament. They represent an estimated current surplus for the coming five years of £33 billion—a margin that shows that we are equipped to cope with further uncertainties. That £33 billion surplus contrasts with what happened under the previous Government—a deficit of £149 billion over the economic cycle, as national debt doubled.

Our second rule, the sustainable investment rule, requires that as we borrow for investment, debt is set at a prudent and sustainable level. In the last year of the previous Government, the debt ratio was 45 per cent. of national income. In the next three years, to meet the needs of a modern infrastructure, public investment will rightly double. Yet as a result of our overall prudence, debt as a proportion of national income is set to fall below 40 per cent.—to 39 per cent. next year, then to 38 per cent., and then to 36½ per cent.

Hon. Members who take a special interest in the Maastricht criteria will want to know that in each of the next five years Britain will be comfortably within the Maastricht guidelines.

Long-term economic stability, from which we will not be diverted, is the foundation for future success, but we shall achieve our long-term goals for growth and employment only through an even more radical modernisation of our economic policy in favour of opportunity, enterprise and work.

We now need to push ahead with modernisation in each of the following areas—improving productivity, expanding opportunity and investing in our future. So in every one of those areas our economic policy will be based on getting the best out of all our people and their potential—in other words, maximising economic opportunity for all. What makes for a good economy also makes for a good society—one that is fair and cohesive.

I turn to the first conclusions from the review that we have conducted with British business into removing the barriers to productivity. As our seminars with business have revealed, the only way for Britain to be at the forefront of the new knowledge-based economies of the future is by modern policies for education, employee participation, small business development and science and innovation.

Our first recommendations concern the quality of education. With our £19 billion investment in educational reform, we have set out demanding targets for literacy, numeracy, teaching standards and higher qualifications. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has announced today a £250 million investment in a new traineeship programme for teenagers. In this way, we have now made it possible for every young person after the age of 16 to stay on in part-time or full-time education, to get the qualifications they need and to have the opportunity of a job.

To meet that productivity challenge for our economy, we must do more to encourage the ambitions of all our children, not least by bringing the world of education and the world of work into closer contact. Over the next year, we plan to enlist business leaders throughout the country to take the world of work and business into our classrooms. To encourage businesses to offer expertise and management help to our schools and colleges, I can say that the Budget will allow businesses to claim tax relief when they second staff to schools and colleges.

Britain can do more to remove the barriers to opportunity and ambition—the ambition to work your way up and use your creative talents, the ambition to start and build a successful business and the ambition to see the firm in which you work succeed, and you succeed with it. Today, only a fraction of British employees—and an even smaller minority of those outside senior management—own shares in the companies that they work in. Yet the evidence is that employee commitment is a vital strength for companies competing, and then succeeding, in the global economy.

I want, through targeted tax reform, to reward long-term commitment by employees. I want to remove, once and for all, the old "them and us" culture in British industry. I want to encourage the new enterprise culture of teamwork in which everyone contributes and everyone benefits from success.

In the next Budget, we will make it easier for all employees—not just a few—to become stakeholders in their company. I want to double the number of firms in which all employees have the opportunity to own shares. Many employees already hold shares through their pension funds, so I will propose to our pension funds and other institutions that they should provide better and more direct public information to their members and investors.

In future, more of our wealth and jobs will come from small and growing businesses. In just 18 months, we have announced cuts in the rate of corporation tax on large companies twice—to 30p in the pound, the lowest level of corporation tax ever. For small companies, we have cut the rate twice, too—to 20p in the pound. In the Budget we will consider a further tax reduction for small businesses. In particular, we will consider converting the temporary investment allowance we introduced last year into a permanent tax cut.

I have in mind a bigger reform to cut the burdens of tax and red tape. Small businesses getting started and growing lack not only the resources to pay tax, but the back-up to administer national insurance, income tax and VAT payments and their payroll systems. From April 1999, the Inland Revenue and the Contributions Agency will be merged. We propose to roll out on a nationwide basis a new, comprehensive service for all businesses, helping them to replace time-consuming book-keeping by offering a one-stop advice service, administered by local offices and a national helpline. So, from now on, every Government Department will have an obligation to encourage enterprise and entrepreneurs.

I can confirm to businesses that we are also re-examining planning regulations and building control to identify barriers to productivity and job creation, and how the planning system in Britain can be speeded up to help us to emulate the success of high-tech clusters and corridors, such as America's Silicon valley.

Access to bank finance is critical to the success of every small business. Therefore, I have asked the banks to work with Mr. Don Cruickshank, formerly of Oftel, to assess what steps can be taken to serve more effectively the needs of businesses in the economy.

To open up and enhance competition, we will ensure, with a 20 per cent. increase in its funding, that the Office of Fair Trading has the necessary resources to break down barriers that prevent new firms from entering markets and keep prices unacceptably high for consumers. Further announcements on how the new arrangements will work will come from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, who will soon publish his competitiveness White Paper. Our policy is pro-small business, pro-share ownership, pro-tax simplification and pro-competition.

Our policy is also pro-skills and pro-science. To turn scientific inventions in Britain into jobs for Britain, we need to do more to honour the spirit of invention, facilitate the exploitation of invention and encourage the commercialisation of invention. More than ever, innovation is the key to higher productivity. We must ensure that inventions created in Britain are developed and manufactured here too.

The first step is a higher quantity and quality of research and development. So, the Government will consult small business on supplementing the current tax relief on research and development with a more effective tax credit for small business, based on the volume of research and development investment.

Three months ago, we announced a partnership with the Wellcome Trust that will invest more than £1 billion to re-equip university science in Britain. It is the largest ever public investment in Britain's science base. Having received an overwhelming response from universities to that and to our new university challenge fund, which is a public-private partnership for commercialising scientific inventions, we are now inviting further private sector involvement.

I now want to complete the path that takes inventions from the science lab through high-tech venture capital and then to the national and global marketplace. So I am announcing that to develop business expertise in science and to transfer technology from the science lab to the marketplace, we will endow up to eight new institutes of enterprise in British universities. That is a further signal of our determination that the genius of British invention will once again become an engine for growth and job creation.

The strong venture capital industry, supporting high-tech, high-risk investments, is also critical to the future of Britain. Today, we have only 6 per cent. of the early stage, high-tech venture capital of the United States, so we will consult on and consider new incentives, including how to encourage our more successful companies to invest in start-ups and how we can provide new sources of venture capital and management expertise for entrepreneurs.

The productivity challenge is one that must be met by the public and not merely the private sector. Next month, for the first time, the Government will publish public service agreements that set clear targets for improved performance for all Departments. To help them meet those and to monitor performance, we are today establishing an advisory panel from business and management.

Absenteeism costs the public sector up to £6 billion a year. Specific targets are being set for each Department to reduce absence rates by 20 per cent. by 2001 and 30 per cent. by 2003.

We are working with business, not merely to promote higher productivity, but to secure policies for a sustainable environment. Today, I am publishing the report by Lord Marshall, formerly president of the Confederation of British Industry, into the role of economic instruments and the business use of energy. I thank him for his work, which moves the debate forward substantially. After public consultation, the Government will fully consider the recommendations as part of their wider strategy on climate change. I am also publishing today a consultation document containing proposals for a £50 reduction in vehicle excise duty for the smallest and most environmentally efficient cars.

Just as the Government are modernising our industrial economy, so too we are modernising employment policies. The House will be pleased to know that by next April, 300,000 people will have benefited from the new deal, which gives a new sense of hope to men and women previously left out and excluded. Already 29,000 companies have signed up to the new deal, and we are now ready to extend it.

From 30 November, 60,000 opportunities will be created for the long-term unemployed in 28 areas of our country. In Northern Ireland, in support of the peace process, we will guarantee new opportunities to all men and women who have been unemployed for 18 months or more. We will also extend nationwide the new deal skills shortage programme and offer up-front support for training to help to fill the vacancies that come on-stream every month. To tackle skill shortages, I can confirm that by March next year, there will be 120 centres for information technology and high-tech training in every part of the country.

Side by side with the new deal, there will be new guarantees that work will pay more than benefits. From April, as a result of abolishing the entry fee to national insurance, all employees will receive a tax cut of £66 a year. Business will be pleased to know that I can announce that from April, employers will not pay national insurance on earnings below £83 a week, the 1999 level for the personal tax allowance. When it is economically right to do so, and so that work pays more, we will introduce the 10p starting rate of income tax.

From 1 April next year, 1.9 million employees, including 1.3 million women, will benefit from the minimum wage. I can confirm today that the minimum income guarantee for a low-paid family in work, which as a result of the working families tax credit was announced at £180, will be raised to £190 a week from October next year, as a result of the minimum wage and changes that we are making in tax and benefit. Work will pay a guaranteed minimum of £190 a week for a family, with no income tax to pay on incomes below £220 a week. That will guarantee a minimum income of at least £5.50 an hour for a lone parent in work with one child, and £6.37 for an adult with two children.

To enable parents and carers to balance work and family responsibilities, we want to provide extra help for child care. We have provided the resources for up to 1 million new child care places over the next four years. Consistent with our national child care strategy, we will extend our new child care tax credit to cover all children up to the age of 14 and in the case of disabled children, who have greater needs, up to the age of 16.

We will match the working families tax credit with a new disabled person's tax credit that will ensure that work pays for a disabled man or woman who takes a job. A disabled person with one child moving from benefit to full-time employment will be guaranteed a minimum income of £220 a week, with no income tax payable on income below £274. Disabled men and women taking up work will be as much as £78 a week better off.

Under this Government, disabled men and women who want to work will be guaranteed fair treatment at work, and work will pay. Matching the minimum income guarantee for disabled persons in work there will be a new disability income guarantee of £128 a week for severely disabled people out of work.

We are guaranteeing pensioner couples a new minimum income of £117 a week. That will be followed in the Budget with a guarantee that pensioners will have no income tax to pay unless their income rises above a new specified level. As a result of other measures that we have taken—by following our cut in VAT last year with tougher regulation and new winter fuel payments—I can say that pensioners are saving £108 on their fuel bills and the poorest pensioners are saving £140.

Our task for the country for the coming year—steering a course of stability—is to meet the productivity challenge, to extend fairness and our welfare-to-work programme and to make the modern investments we need in our future. I am pleased to announce that, following the modernisation of the private finance initiative, there will be new investment in our infrastructure—in more than 1,000 schools, 25 hospitals and in dozens of public transport projects—over the coming three years amounting to an additional £11 billion. Over the three years from next April, public investment will double—and will do so at the right time. That is the right decision and the right course of action for our country.

I have one further announcement. Because of our prudence in the management of public finances, Government spending is well within its limits. Our prudence is for a purpose. Therefore, to ensure in every part of the United Kingdom the health care that people—and especially the elderly—need this winter, I am today making an additional and immediate winter cash allocation, to be spent in the next five months, of £250 million for our national health service. I can confirm that, because this Government believe in the best health and the best education not just for a few but for all our people, we will invest an additional £40 billion in the modernisation of education and health over the next three years. Those public services, in the months and the years ahead, will be safe in this Government's hands.

The Government are steering a stable course, prudently investing in our future, proudly building strong public services and consistently keeping our promises to the British people. I commend this statement to the House.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): We have just heard from a complacent and arrogant Chancellor—a Chancellor who is locked into denial. We have heard fantasy forecasting and Peter Pan economics. How can anyone take seriously the Chancellor's prediction of growth next year when the Treasury's own collection of independent forecasters anticipate growth well below—0.6 per cent. below—his forecast? How can we take the Chancellor seriously when his Department's figures are at odds with his own? His are fairy-tale figures because the Chancellor will not take responsibility.

There was no recognition—not even a glimmer—that the Chancellor's own blunders are to blame. He offers nothing serious to prevent higher unemployment and more business failures—not a single measure that will save a single job. He had a chance today to give hope to people whose livelihoods are on the line, but he blew it because he is too arrogant to admit that he had got it wrong.

For the Chancellor and the Prime Minister—who are smugly and arrogantly sitting there exchanging complacent grins—any talk of downturn is "idiotic hysteria". The Item Club, using the Treasury's own model, predicts that 500,000 manufacturing jobs will be lost. Is that "idiotic hysteria"? The National Institute of Economic and Social Research, whose director the Chancellor has put in charge of sorting out his statistics, warns of a one in three chance of recession. Is that "idiotic hysteria"? The Chancellor's adviser, Gavyn Davies, says that the economy is

Is that "idiotic hysteria"?

If it is all global, as the Chancellor claims, why does The Economist poll of forecasts show that Britain's growth next year will be lower than that of all industrial nations except Japan, which is locked in the middle of a deep slump? Even the European Commission, to which the Chancellor is usually eager to defer, predicts that Britain will slump to the bottom of the European growth table. So let the Chancellor tell us: why will Britain's growth next year be less than half that of the next weakest economy? It will be less than half. Why?

Why have Britain's forecasts been cut by so much more than any others? Why, when it comes to the downturn—[Interruption.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer sits on the Front Bench grinning and smiling. The constituents of his right hon. and hon. Friends, whose jobs and livelihoods are on the line, will be disgusted by his complacency and arrogance. Let the right hon. Gentleman tell us why, when it comes to the downturn, Britain is in first and in worst. There is a simple answer and it is sitting on the Government Front Bench. Everything that the right hon. Gentleman is doing is making things worse.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer goes on about the current budget and public finances. Why does not he tell us about the real budget, the cash budget, and how much he is actually borrowing? The right hon. Gentleman says that the black hole in public finances does not matter. But what does he say to the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, whose director he relies on so much, which predicts borrowing of not twice but five times that which the right hon. Gentleman predicts?

The right hon. Gentleman says that he can jack up borrowing and no one will get hurt. Does not he understand that higher borrowing means higher interest rates? Does not he understand that for every £10 billion of extra borrowing, interest rates will be a $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. higher? How is that helping small business and innovation?

The right hon. Gentleman says that it is all right to borrow more in the downturn. Does not he understand that the harder he presses on the fiscal accelerator, the harder the Bank of England will press on the monetary brakes? Does not he even understand the effect of his own policies?

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): It says here.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman will have to go back to his constituency next weekend and look in the face those whose jobs are on the line because of the Chancellor's arrogant blunder. Let him make jokes with them then and listen to what they have to say to him.

In the Chancellor's own wonderland of economics, he says that it is all right to borrow as long as it is for investment. But the right hon. Gentleman is not borrowing for investment. He is not borrowing for health or education. We welcome Labour trying to match our record, but the right hon. Gentleman is borrowing not to pay for health and education but for social security. The Government's own figures show that social security spending, having fallen in recent years, is set to rise. The Government will borrow all right, but they will be borrowing to pay for social security, for the bills of Labour's social and economic failure.

The right hon. Gentleman has talked of productivity—that is right, he is blaming it all on Britain's workers and managers, and the banks as well now. But his proposals, most of which are now being announced for the third or fourth time, are just moving the deckchairs around on the Titanic. The right hon. Gentleman's taxes and regulations have put a £40 billion hole below the waterline of British businesses—that is £1,500 for every person employed.

With power comes responsibility. So the Chancellor must now answer these specific questions: will he give an unequivocal assurance not to introduce the new taxes on people's pensions foreshadowed in yesterday's Daily Mail? Tell us, yes or no? We are waiting to hear, yes or no? If the right hon. Gentleman is so bothered about productivity, will he stop raising the cost of employing people by £1,500 a year? Yes or no? Will he now tell us by how much unemployment will rise next year as a direct result of his policies?

This was the Chancellor's first big test. It was his chance to start to put right what he has got wrong. He has failed that test. They told us that things could only get better, but they are getting worse, much worse. The price of Labour's blunders will be lost jobs and closed businesses. There will be no more boom and bust; just the bust. There will be no more stop-go; just the stop. Truly, this downturn was made in Downing street.

Mr. Brown: The Financial Times on Monday said that Conservative economic policy was "on an escalator into absurdity", and Conservative Members have reached the top of the escalator this afternoon. The Leader of the Opposition said that this would be the first big attack on the Government since the election, but unfortunately he put it into the hands of the shadow Chancellor.

The right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) did not even welcome our £250 million for the national health service and he wants to cut into the £40 billion that we are spending on health and education. The policies that he advocates are exactly those that brought the country into stop-go recession when he was a Treasury Minister in the early 1990s.

The right hon. Gentleman complains about borrowing, but does not acknowledge that next year's borrowing requirement is £4 billion, when the Conservative Government's borrowing requirement went up to £50 billion. He complains about interest rates that have come down from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to $7\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. Under the Conservatives, interest rates were at 15 per cent. for a year and over 10 per cent. for four years, including all the time that he was a Treasury Minister. Conservative Members complain about the pound. The pound was at DM2.95 during the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's time at the Treasury. This Government have brought down debt from the 45 per cent. that we inherited to less than 40 per cent. and now to 38 per cent.

A serious Opposition party would tell us where it stood on the basic issues of economic policy. First, would the Conservatives keep the Bank of England independent? We say yes to that question; what is their answer? They do not know and they are totally divided. A sensible Opposition would agree with the Confederation of British Industry's view that spending should rise next year as part of the automatic stabilisers. We say yes to that; the right hon. Member for Horsham wants to cut public spending, but his health and education spokesmen want it to rise. A sensible Opposition would say that welfare to work was in the interests of every constituency. We say yes to welfare to work; Conservatives are against it and the means by which it was created. A sensible Opposition would support the working families tax credit at £190 a week instead of trying to abolish it.

The previous Government were in office for 18 years. They were found out and thrown out. In 18 months, Conservative Members have proved to the country that they are not fit even for opposition.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): Does the Chancellor recall that in the House on 27 November last year, I warned him that by 1999 we would be facing not an inflationary boom, but a recessionary deflation and that he dismissed that proposition with scorn? Is it not now clear that he and his appointees in the Bank of England have, for the past year, been fighting on the wrong front so that our manufacturers and farmers have been faced with unnecessarily high interest rates and a dangerously damaging high pound? Does he accept any personal responsibility for that grave economic misjudgment?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman would not have made the Bank of England independent—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] I am answering the question. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question."] The Conservatives are getting very excited this afternoon, but after the failure of the shadow Chancellor.

The policies that we have put in place are exactly right to deal with the problems of the British economy. The hon. Gentleman would oppose the Bank of England's being independent. He would have opposed our taking action to deal with the inflationary problem in the economy. He gave us no support when we cut the fiscal deficit by £20 billion. They were the right decisions for Britain. They were right because they put us in better stead to deal with any problem that the global economy presents. Had we pursued the policies that the hon. Gentleman was following, we would not be able to respond as we are now to the global downturn.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Liberal Democrats favour recycling, and there was a great deal of recycled material in the Chancellor's statement. We shall of course give our own response to the detailed proposals during the consultation process, which we welcome because we think it is a better way of doing Budgets. Of course, we welcome the £250 million for the national health service, which we hope will mean that we are able to get through this winter without waiting lists rising again.

Nevertheless, does the Chancellor recall telling the House in his first Budget statement, in July last year, that the goal was to rebalance the economy so as to control inflation

"without damage to industrial and exporting prospects"?—[Official Report, 2 July 1997; Vol. 297, c.305.]

Since then, is not it his lack of policy that has led directly to an over-valued pound, which is higher than in the 1990 recession, and to real interest rates that are higher than during the 1980 recession? Has not there been a gap between diagnosis and cure? Is not it now clear that it is the Chancellor's own policy gap, rather than industry's own productivity gap, which explains the economic downturn that we are now experiencing and the risk of manufacturing recession next year that he is forecasting? When will the Chancellor stop blaming other people? When will he end the blame game and not duck his own responsibilities?

The Chancellor also told us in his previous Budget seven months ago that the United Kingdom's direct trade with the troubled Asian economies is not particularly large, which is not exactly what he said today. Does the Chancellor agree with the CBI, which said yesterday that it was not productivity but "the strength of sterling which has undermined the ability to compete at home and abroad"?

The Chancellor's new forecast is that manufacturing industry may just miss recession next year and that any overall slow-down will be mild and short. Is he aware that, as the shadow Chancellor said, many independent forecasters outside the House regard that as complacent and unrealistic? Does he agree with the House of Commons Library that manufacturing job losses—[Laughter.] It is interesting that Labour Members below the Gangway should laugh when manufacturing job losses are running at the rate of 300 a day, and, according to the House of Commons Library, will be running at 600 a day next year. Does the Chancellor realise that today's new tax loopholes, dressed up as well-meaning tax tinkering, will have only a marginal effect on that outlook?

Despite his optimistic forecasts, will the Chancellor take this opportunity to accept that the balance of the policy to date has been wrong? Will he promise to change that policy and make it an overriding priority to create the conditions necessary to enable the Bank of England to bring down interest rates, even if that means delaying his 10p tax rate? Would not it be a tragedy if complacency today were to lead to thousands of job losses in industry next year?

Mr. Brown: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, I am grateful that he, unlike the Conservatives, has welcomed what we have done in respect of national health service expenditure, but I must say that we have done far more than the Liberal Democrats ever put forward as their policy at the general election. We have made available £2¼ billion extra this year and £21 billion in the three following years.

As for the hon. Gentleman's points about the general economy, he must be one of the first to admit that when US $3 trillion has been wiped off stock exchanges around the world—10 per cent. of world GDP—it is bound to affect people's investments and companies' decisions about jobs.

The hon. Gentleman will also agree that, when world trade growth falls from 11 per cent. this year to 4 per cent., and is scheduled to be the same next year, there will be problems which every industrial country has to deal with. If he went to America, to the rest of Europe or to Japan, he would see other countries facing up to exactly the same problems. The issue is whether Britain is properly equipped to tackle the problems—indeed, any and every challenge from the global economy.

The hon. Gentleman should go back to our first Budget, which he has quoted. I said that we were creating a long-term framework for monetary policy and fiscal policy in this country. That is what we have done. As a result of the decisions that we have made, through the Bank of England becoming independent and tackling inflation, we are meeting our inflation target. Everyone expects us to meet that target in the time to come.

As a result of cutting the fiscal deficit from £28 billion to £8 billion in the first year, and taking further action this year, we are eliminating that current structural debit—something that the Conservative party never did all the time it was in government. We are creating the conditions—the long-term framework—for monetary and fiscal stability. It is on that that we will be tested, which is right.

On employment, the hon. Gentleman should acknowledge that, over the past 18 months, nearly 400,000 extra jobs have been created in our economy; that welfare to work has got into jobs thousands of young people who would not otherwise be in work—without any help from the Conservative party, which opposed the windfall tax; and that the Government are doing more, not only to create job opportunities and training, but to help to make work pay. I should have thought that the Liberal party would start to support that as well.

On the hon. Gentleman's taxation proposals, they seem to be very different from the proposal for a £30 billion tax cut that he made to the Liberal party conference.

Madam Speaker: Order. I should be obliged now for brisk questions and brisk answers.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I thank my right hon. Friend for his remarkably good statement, especially with reference to those who are poor, have disabilities or are without hope.

I urge my right hon. Friend to make sure that the new deal project is a total success, so that those without hope and those without training can be sure of his support so as to ensure that all the programme's targets are met. Will he remind Conservative Members that, in the early 1980s, Mrs. Margaret Thatcher, Sir Keith Joseph and Sir Geoffrey Howe destroyed more than 2 million jobs in two short years? They also created Europe's largest redundancy ever, in my constituency—8,000 steel jobs between a Christmas and an Easter. My right hon. Friend's statement is much welcomed in the country.

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He knows at first hand what is happening in Wales and in industry throughout the country. He is absolutely right about what happened: manufacturing output fell by 7 per cent. in one year, manufacturing investment in that year fell by 15 per cent. and a million manufacturing jobs were lost. It is precisely because we do not want to return to those conditions that we will not make the mistakes that are proposed by the Conservative party on economic policy.

On the new deal, I have heard Conservative Members sniggering and sniping at something in which they also were invited to play a part.

Mr. Maude: It is a failure.

Mr. Brown: The shadow Chancellor, after a few months of the new deal, which started last April, is now ready to say that it is a failure. That is what the Conservative party wants to happen: it never supported the new deal and refused to back the windfall tax on the utilities, and it is now suggesting that the new deal is failing young people around the country when thousands of them have been joining the new deal every month. I hope that, on reflection, the Opposition spokesman will withdraw those comments.

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): The House will have noted that the Chancellor's calculations depend very much on substantial increases in growth in the last two years of the cycle, which are some way away. How can anyone believe those figures when the Chancellor's projections last year, and the ones that he is making now, are so different for next year, and when our growth performance in the European Union means that Britain is moving from its position as one of the higher growth countries to the lowest next year?

Will the right hon. Gentleman answer this question, which he has failed to answer so far? Given the importance of pension funds, and increasing take-up of them, will he confirm that he has no further plans to raid pension funds or to reduce the tax incentives for those contributing to them?

Mr. Brown: First, there is no such proposal, nor is there any proposal for a windfall tax on the banks, as the Conservatives suggest. The Conservative Government introduced a windfall tax on the banks, and it is unfortunate that they did not support our tax on the utilities.

Secondly, on the general question about the economy, it is because we have got inflation under control and have taken action to eliminate the structural deficit that monetary and fiscal policy can now work together. The right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) will remember the position faced by the Conservative Government in the early 1990s. Even at the worst stage of the economic cycle, interest rates had to be above 10 per cent. for years because of their failure to control the inflationary tendencies in the economy. As a result of their failure to control public spending, at the worst point of the spending cycle the deficit was £50 billion. I could give Conservative Members more figures to show what happened.

The Conservative Government failed to take action to eliminate the deficit. Because we have taken early action to tackle inflation—which the Conservative Government never took—and because we have been eliminating the structural deficit, monetary and fiscal policy can work together—I think the right hon. Gentleman understands that point. That is the basis on which we have made our forecasts for the economy. The right hon. Gentleman will find that sensible economic commentators agree with us.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's commitment to enterprise and innovation, and his recognition that high-tech companies require special financing measures. Will he undertake to study carefully the collapse of Ionica last week to see whether special lessons can be learned from that innovative, high-tech company, whose collapse had nothing to do with interest rates—[Interruption.]—or with the exchange rate?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend has done a tremendous job working with the science industries in her constituency and throughout the country. It ill befits Conservative Members, who know nothing about what is happening in individual constituencies, to sneer at my hon. Friend's comments. She is absolutely right. The high-tech industry faces problems of financing. There have been particular difficulties in attracting and developing science-based industries in this country.

My right hon. Friend the Trade and Industry Secretary is examining these matters. I acknowledge the work that my hon. Friend has done in pushing this process along. We shall deal with these problems, and we shall look practically at the barriers to job creation and to opportunity in this country. We shall not pursue the dogmatic policies of the Conservative party.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): The Chancellor has just said that he will look practically at problems. What in practical and real terms do the Chancellor and his colleagues intend to do effectively to reduce the costs of employment over the next crucial two or three years against a background of almost certainly rising unemployment? The Chancellor knows that, together with his colleagues in government, he has already increased the costs of employment, thus contributing to the real problems of the manufacturing and service sectors.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman implies that the situation is all bad. He should acknowledge that there has been a 19 per cent. fall in unemployment in his constituency since the general election. There has also been a fall in the constituencies of many other hon. Members, who should acknowledge that employment has been rising.

As for future policies for employment, the right hon. Gentleman should also acknowledge that we have cut corporation tax to 30p, cut small business corporation tax from 23p to 20p, introduced a new 10p rate of capital gains tax, are cutting national insurance employers' contributions for low-paid employees, and have cut national insurance for employees. Those measures will help employers take on additional workers. The right hon. Gentleman will find that many employers say that they wish a Labour Government had been in office years ago.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Does my right hon. Friend know why Opposition Members make no mention of help for the disabled in jobs, help for minimum income families, and help for small businesses? Why do they make no mention of the venture capital industry, one-stop VAT and national insurance, linking enterprise and universities, the new deal, and extra cash for health and education? Is it because the black hole is between their ears and they cannot hear?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding us of the range of policies that we have introduced and which the former Government failed to introduce. Yesterday, when the House considered the international financial system, the Conservatives had absolutely nothing to say. On monetary policy, they cannot tell us what they would do about the Bank of England. As for fiscal policy, against the advice of the Confederation of British Industry and almost every sensible commentator, they want to cut health and education expenditure over the next year. The sooner the Conservative party wakes up to economic realities, the sooner it will have a chance of being listened to by the British people.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Will the Chancellor of the Exchequer understand that people listen with some doubt to his talk of a solid, long-term strategy for the economy, given that that strategy has altered considerably since the original announcement in the Budget 16 months ago? As we move into recession, there are few who would have considered that he could squander a golden inheritance quite so quickly.

Will the Chancellor answer one question? We know about the increase in education and health expenditure to which he has referred, but we should also consider a number of other announcements that were included in his statement. Will he give us some figures showing what increase in expenditure they will involve? The statement included no costing of that expenditure.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman talked of the so-called golden legacy. I have to tell him that the "golden legacy" was a £28 billion public deficit—3.5 per cent. of national income—which the last Government had failed to tackle, and which we had to tackle on coming to power.

The right hon. Gentleman also talked of the long-term strategy. Our long-term strategy is this: to have eliminated the current structural deficit, to have reached our target on inflation, and to enable monetary and fiscal policy to work together for stability and growth in the economy. It is because we have made those tough decisions on public finances, and cut the deficit—something that the Opposition never supported and have never done—that we are now in a position to spend £40 billion—[Interruption.] The Conservatives left a deficit of £28 billion, claiming that that was a golden scenario. They are now saying that to borrow even £1 is an absolute disaster. What is the view of the Opposition?

As for the health service—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Do stop shouting. I shall have to use my powers to remove Members from the Chamber if the noise continues.

Mr. Brown: As for health and education, the right hon. Member for East Devon (Sir P. Emery) was right to ask whether we had budgeted for the money that we are going to spend. The answer is yes: the prudent assumptions are the ones that I have listed. Moreover, because we have underspent as a result of choosing priorities and cutting waste, we shall be able to spend an extra £250 million before the end of the financial year.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): The whole House welcomes the extra £250 million that is to be spent on the health service, but may I ask a question about monetary policy? My right hon. Friend will know that today Sainsbury marked down its profits forecast, citing the exchange rate and the approaching turndown as part of the problem. We all support my right hon. Friend's intention to bear down on inflation, and most of us understand that Eddie George is doing his best within his narrow frame of reference; but does my right hon. Friend accept that, in the very long run, there may well be a case for looking at the framework in which the Monetary Policy Committee operates, and putting on that committee people who are known to have some understanding of and feeling for industry in the north, the midlands and elsewhere?

Mr. Brown: The Monetary Policy Committee is not to be made up of representatives of this pressure group or that. It is a group of people chosen for their expertise in certain areas. What I have been intent on doing—in the knowledge that I have of the Bank of England, and of what it has been intent on doing—is building up in every region, and in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, an expertise in all areas of the economy, so that that expertise can be fed into decisions on monetary policy. That is the right way forward. It is the way in which independent banks have worked in other countries—and I venture to suggest that no political party in the House would end the independence of the Bank. I believe that, on reflection, the Conservative party will change its mind, and stop opposing it.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher and Walton): Of course some matters of detail that the Chancellor has announced today, such as the encouragement of science, innovation, technology transfer and employee share ownership, are sensible; but on the wider economy, I wonder whether the Chancellor is sanguine about the fall in interest rates that will be necessary if we are to converge with the rate that is set by the European Central Bank. In that context, how will he set his active fiscal policy, to use his words, over the next year or two—or does he think that, as a result of the meeting in Austria last weekend, the change in the economic and stability pact will mean that more borrowing on the continent will force the European Central Bank to put rates up to converge with ours?

Mr. Brown: I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a special interest in matters European, even if that sets him against his Front-Bench team, but on this point, I disagree with him. The worst thing to do would be to rush headlong into monetary union by cutting interest rates just for the sake of dealing with the present situation. The Liberal Democrat party is proposing interest rates at 3 per cent., or something similar.

We have to base the decision on monetary union on the economic tests that have been set down and with proper preparations, leaving the final decision to the British people, but the reason why I believe that economies will, over time, converge is that we are taking action to remove the boom-bust cycle in this country and we will, in time, have a smoother economic cycle than ever existed under the 18 years of the Conservative Government.

Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): I congratulate the Chancellor on his statement, which reaffirms confidence in his handling of the economy. Will he make a statement, first, on the curious reaction of Opposition Members who, when they hear that we have not been set off course, display a mixture of mirth and consternation; and secondly, on the role that he envisages for regional development agencies in taking forward his important agenda of support for business, including technology transfer and commercial development of the knowledge in our universities, so that we can ensure that all the regions benefit? I remind him that, as part of their negative approach to anything that brings jobs and employment, the Opposition opposed the setting up of such agencies.

Mr. Brown: When the record of this Parliament is written, the Opposition's opposition to the regional development agency proposals, the minimum wage, the working families tax credit, the independence of the Bank of England and to spending sensibly on health and education will be a blot on their record for all time.

I met the chairmen of the new regional development agencies and, with the Deputy Prime Minister, talked to them about their work. I believe that, like Scottish Enterprise, the Welsh Development Agency and the Northern Ireland Development Board, an immense contribution can be made at a regional, Scottish, Welsh and Northern Irish level to the development of the economy.

On my hon. Friend's comments about the Opposition, in all their difficulties—when they had the poll tax, all the problems over the health service, sleaze and everything else—it used to be said of the Conservatives by some of the press that they were at least competent in the management of the economy. That can no longer be said of the statements that are being made.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Will the Chancellor accept that manufacturing industry is the main source of sustainable non-inflationary economic growth? Will he therefore take seriously the request made of him by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms Abbott) relating to the criteria on which the Monetary Policy Committee takes its decisions—because without manufacturing industry, this country is lost? Is it right that, with inflation at 2.5 per cent., business should be paying around 10 per cent. or more in interest to the banks for money that they borrow to invest in employment?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman has spoken on manufacturing industry throughout the time of his Government and ours. The review that we are setting up with Mr. Don Cruickshank will look at how the banks are servicing the needs of industry, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will want to feed in his comments to that.

On interest rates and the Bank of England, as someone who has followed that matter for many years the hon. Gentleman should understand that the causes of low growth and high inflation in the British economy have been the same. They have included the lack of capacity in the economy; therefore, every time there has been growth it has been unsustainable because of the development of inflationary pressures. It is by tackling that problem head on—the independence of the Bank of England helps that—and by creating a credible framework for action that we can begin to address the long-standing problem of stop-go.

As regards individual instances in innovation, investment, training and skills shortages, we are doing what we can, working with manufacturing industry, to deal with some of the problems it faces. I think that the hon. Gentleman will know that the pound is now 10 per cent. down from its peak and is now lower than it was when we took office.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I, too, congratulate my right hon. Friend on his statement, particularly the emphasis on research and innovation. Bearing in mind that even his predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), acknowledges that Britain's debt to GDP ratio is one of the lowest in the world, will he consider further investment in public sector infrastructure, particularly housing and transport? That would benefit business confidence and help to ensure that the gloomy predictions of a rise in unemployment of 500,000 over the next three years do not come true.

Mr. Brown: Employment has risen by 400,000 and many of those who have been making predictions every month for the past year that unemployment would rise were found to be wrong in February, March, April, May, June and July. On future public investment, I think that my hon. Friend will acknowledge that not only have we doubled public investment over the next three years, but we have enhanced the private-public partnerships to invest £13 billion more in the economy, thanks to the work of the Paymaster General in moving that project forward.

On capital receipts and housing—my hon. Friend mentioned housing in particular—at the time of the comprehensive spending review, we announced a further release of capital receipts to enable house building and house repair to move ahead. When my hon. Friend looks at the figures in the pre-Budget report, she will see that public investment next year rises considerably, which means that investment as a whole in the economy continues to rise. My hon. Friend will want to acknowledge that the Government have done a great deal to move public investment forward. We are never complacent, but we will continue to take the necessary action.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): When the right hon. Gentleman first became Chancellor, the OECD in Paris forecast that British growth of GDP would be the highest in the European Union and was likely to continue to be so for the foreseeable future. Will he accept any responsibility for the fact that it is now forecast to be the lowest, and that we may have recession? If he is so interested in research, why did he slash the funding for the research councils this year to the point where, in university after university, there is no money to fund postgraduate research?

Mr. Brown: When I became Chancellor and walked into the Treasury one of the first things I was told was that the inflation target could not be met, that inflation would rise to 4 per cent. and above and that inflation—

Mr. Maude: Not true.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman does not seem to understand basic economics. When one sets interest rate policy, it is set with a view to the next 12, 18 and 24 months. If action is not taken early enough, interest rates will have to rise later to deal with the problem of inflation. The truth is that when we came into the Treasury, we were told that inflation would rise and that it would be twice that of our competitors.

We also know—the Bank of England had been saying it for the previous six months—that the previous Chancellor had failed to raise interest rates when it was necessary to do so to deal with inflation. It was exactly that problem of short-termism in the making of interest rate decisions that we dealt with by making the Bank of England independent. I would have thought that, as a sensible Back-Bench Member of Parliament, the hon. Gentleman would have supported our action.

On science, the hon. Gentleman should acknowledge that the provision of £1 billion to the Wellcome Trust and investment in our universities and science laboratories has been widely welcomed throughout the country. Now that we have in place measures for the commercialisation of inventions through the university challenge fund and the new institutes of enterprise that I have announced today, science has been given a boost by the Government that it never had under the previous Administration.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Does my right hon. Friend recall the winter of crisis in 1996–97 under the previous Government, when in hospitals in north-west London people were not simply in the waiting room or stacked on trolleys, they were stacked back on to ambulances? Does my right hon. Friend understand the joy and relief that will greet his statement today at the further £250 million to avert a winter crisis in our hospitals? Given the apoplexy among Conservative Members that has greeted his statement today, will he consider bringing forward those payments to meet the pressing need that would appear to be found on the Opposition Benches?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is absolutely right about what happened to the health service under the previous Administration. The total increase in spending on health as a result of all the measures we are taking will be nearly £32 million per constituency over the next three years. I think that the measure we have announced today, to give £250 million to the health service for the next five months to deal with the winter problems that may and sometimes do arise, shows that the Government want to see the national health service safe in our country. It is simply a pity that the Opposition cannot welcome it.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): Can the right hon. Gentleman give a brisk answer to a question to which he has not even given a long-winded one so far? How will raising public borrowing help to reduce interest rates?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman should look at what the Bank of England said on this matter. It said that the public spending decisions that we have made were in line with what it was expecting. If the hon. Gentleman looks at the August inflation report, he will see that it says exactly the opposite of what the hon. Gentleman is suggesting.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): Does the Chancellor recall that in 1991 the then Conservative Government denied responsibility for the recession and blamed it on world economic affairs? Will he contrast that with their attitude now that they are in opposition: that the current slowdown in growth has nothing to do with world economic affairs? Does he believe that they were misleading then or now? Does he think that the bizarre—

Madam Speaker: Order. The Chancellor is responsible only for his economic policies, not for the Opposition's.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The Chancellor referred earlier to the development of the Welsh economy. Can he confirm that his spending plans will provide for the Treasury to pay match-funding in the event of the European Union according objective 1 status to west Wales and the valleys?

Mr. Brown: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that the comprehensive spending review dealt with those problems. The generous settlement made for public spending for Wales will allow industry, training, education and, of course, all the economic agencies to benefit from public money.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): Does the Chancellor accept that most people represented by Labour Members, and possibly most of those represented by Opposition Members, accept that the purpose of his prudence in preventing overheating of the economy is being delivered in the public expenditure announced today and in previous Budgets? Does my right hon. Friend accept that what was described as wonderland economics is a joy compared with the blunderland economics of the previous Government?

I want to deal with the connection between inventiveness and enterprise and the university challenge fund. Is my right hon. Friend aware that some university representatives are saying that the venture capital organisations in the United Kingdom are slow in taking up the offer of intellectual property? Can he give us an assurance that he will look closely at the transfer of intellectual property so that it does not leave the country but is a boon to the country; while at the same time encouraging venture capital companies to form partnerships with the universities, which are very willing to do so?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has taken a special interest in the matter. In the seminars on productivity that we held with business men and women, which drew on expertise not only from Britain but from across Europe and the United States, it became clear that the venture capital industry could do more in Europe, and Britain, to service high-tech and scientific inventions that may give rise to commercial products. The venture capital industry is doing far more in the United States, and people sometimes doubt whether Britain would have been able to cope with a company such as Microsoft, as the initial venture capital support would not have been available. We have taken some of the measures that we have taken for those reasons.

The university challenge fund is very much over-subscribed, as there was massive interest in it. I hope that we can extend the private partnership, so that there is backing for the public funds that were made available to the tune of £60 million. Our institutes of enterprise, which we are establishing today, will do a great deal to help transfer technology and bring scientific inventions to the marketplace. I hope that, over the next few months, my hon. Friend will be able to follow developments in those matters.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I thank the Chancellor for the role that he played in the Industrial Development Board's recent trip to the United States. However, will he consider the views of the CBI Northern Ireland on a possible industrial fuels tax? Northern Ireland's road freight industry is already suffering, and power is much more expensive for people in Northern Ireland. Even an industrial fuel tax applied uniformly across the United Kingdom would place an extra restriction on Northern Ireland industry's ability to compete. Such a situation would create problems for the Chancellor in fulfilling his guarantee to give employment opportunities to the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's first remarks, and welcomed the opportunity to join some of his colleagues in the United States for the launch of the investment programme for Northern Ireland. I believe that there is a willingness on the part of business in the United States to make new investment in Northern Ireland, particularly since new incentives—including our action on education, training and work—will make it very attractive to invest there. I shall regard the hon. Gentleman's second set of comments, on industrial fuel, as one of the first Budget representations.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on holding fast to his spending plans, which are just and will create jobs. The Government intend to be a Government of the left and a Government of enterprise. For regions—such as my own in north-east England—that are facing the sharpest pressures of world markets, can he offer the prospect of any specifically regional programmes of public spending and development, to underpin the great work that he is set upon?

Mr. Brown: We are a Government of enterprise and of fairness. Conservative Members who believe that enterprise is achieved only at the cost of fairness, and that fairness is achieved only at the cost of enterprise, are living in the world of the 1980s—when it did not work, and Britain ended up as an unequal, unfair and, eventually, economically unsuccessful society.

Our proposal for regional development agencies—with which my hon. Friend has long been involved—is a means by which we can bring expertise to helping develop industries in the north. Our proposals on training and employment are also working at a regional level. Moreover, I think that my hon. Friend will agree after hearing some of today's scientific announcements that there is encouragement for regions to think of how they might apply for some of the funding.

Iraq

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Robin Cook): With permission, I should like to make a statement on the latest developments in Iraq.

Last August, Iraq informed the Security Council that it was suspending co-operation with the United Nations Special Commission and the International Atomic Energy Agency other than on monitoring. The effect was to prevent both agencies from carrying out surprise inspections at sites that they suspected were part of a programme for weapons of mass destruction. The work of both agencies was confined to monitoring the status of sites that they had already cleared.

The Security Council responded with resolution 1154, which provided both a penalty for that violation of Saddam's agreement, and an incentive for him to comply. As penalty, we suspended the regular review of the continuing need for sanctions. As an incentive, we offered a comprehensive review if Baghdad returned to full compliance. Nevertheless, on Saturday, Iraq notified the Security Council that it would no longer co-operate with UNSCOM, even on monitoring.

As the outgoing President of the Security Council, Britain convened an emergency session, which agreed to a statement condemning the Iraqi action. It records the view of the Security Council that Baghdad's decision is a "flagrant violation" of Security Council resolutions and of the agreement it made with Kofi Annan on his visit to Baghdad in February. The Security Council's support for the statement was unanimous. It was fully endorsed by Russia, whose spokesman has said that Russia was "deeply concerned" about the Iraqi decision.

Baghdad's attempt to close down the work of the inspectorates coincides with evidence that Saddam Hussein continues actively to pursue his ambition to maintain his capacity to produce weapons of mass destruction. Only two weeks ago, a group of experts received the results of tests performed in French and Swiss laboratories to corroborate the US finding of traces of VX nerve gas in fragments of Iraqi missile warheads. The French laboratory found evidence consistent with the presence of nerve gas in the warheads, and both laboratories confirmed that Iraq had tried to decontaminate the warheads. For years, Saddam has maintained that Iraq had never achieved a deliverable VX weapon. Those discoveries expose his denials as one more lie.

Even greater anxiety relates to Iraq's programme for biological weapons. UNSCOM has concluded that Baghdad's most recent declaration of its biological weapons capacity fails to give a "remotely credible" account of the programme.

We are in close consultation with our allies to maintain a united front and to achieve the most effective pressure on Iraq. Today, a resolution will be tabled in the Security Council that will demand that Iraq immediately restores co-operation with both UNSCOM and the IAEA. That strong resolution has been drafted by Britain, and we will be working to achieve unity around it. We want to find a diplomatic solution, but we have always made it clear that all options remain open.

The latest decision by Baghdad is particularly perverse, as the Security Council agreed only last Friday on the terms of a comprehensive review of Iraq's compliance with its undertakings. Those terms held out the prospect of a time frame for completion of the work of UNSCOM and the IAEA, and could, in turn, lead to the lifting of sanctions on Iraq.

Any such progress can be achieved only with the full compliance of Baghdad. So long as Baghdad continues to conceal its capacity for chemical and biological warfare, and so long as it obstructs UNSCOM from revealing the truth about those programmes, there can be no progress towards the lifting of sanctions.

Our dispute is with Saddam Hussein. We have no quarrel with the people of Iraq. On the contrary, we have grave concern for the suffering that they are experiencing under Saddam Hussein. Only last month, Max Van Der Stoel, the UN special rapporteur on Iraq, presented his latest report, which concluded that there has been no improvement at all in the repeated violation of human rights by Saddam Hussein, including torture, summary execution, arbitrary arrests and persecution of minorities.

Britain took the lead at the United Nations in pressing for a doubling of the "oil-for-food" programme. Consequently, Baghdad can now sell over $10 billion of oil per annum to pay for food, medicine and other humanitarian goods. I am pleased to report to the House that the latest information available to the UN confirms that, as a result, there have been positive improvements in access to food and medicine.

Saddam Hussein appears to be gambling that the world will grow weary of his constant evasion and repeated confrontation. His calculation is that we will eventually give up and abandon the sanctions regime, without requiring him to abandon his ambitions for regional supremacy through weapons of terror. We must remain ready and resolute to prove him wrong.

It would be too dangerous for Iraq's neighbours in the region to leave Saddam Hussein with the capacity to produce weapons that could wipe out whole cities. It would also be too damaging for the authority of the United Nations if Saddam was allowed to break the agreement he entered into with its Secretary-General. He cannot, and he will not, be allowed to win.

Mr. Michael Howard (Folkestone and Hythe): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement, and support his expressions of resolve. The House will appreciate that this is not the first time that Iraq has severely tested the will of the international community. It was only last February that, in order to avoid military action, it undertook to co-operate fully with UNSCOM and to provide immediate, unconditional and unrestricted access to inspectors. Iraq is now breaking that undertaking.

At the time, the Secretary of State rightly told the House:

> "If Saddam were now to be permitted to set aside all those decisions of the UN, and if we were to walk away and allow him to do so with impunity, there would be no point in invoking the power of the UN the next time we are confronted with a dictator threatening the security of his region or the lives of his people."—[Official Report, 17 February 1998; Vol. 306, c. 909.]

Does the Secretary of State stand by those remarks today?

At the time, the Prime Minister said that only had brought about the agreement, and that nothing else would ensure its satisfactory implementation. Are the Government prepared to display equal resolve through the international community now? Can the Secretary of State say something about the deployment of British forces in the region, and about any preparations that may be under way to despatch more forces to the Gulf?

"effective diplomacy and firm willingness to use force"—[Official Report, 24 February 1998; Vol. 307, c. 174.]

Can the right hon. Gentleman give the House an assurance that his final warning to Iraq will be more effective than his final warning to President Milosevic during the Kosovo crisis in the summer? Can he tell us more about the terms of the resolution to be tabled in the Security Council today? Is it the Government's view that a further resolution is necessary before force can be used if diplomacy fails?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also comment on the resignation of Richard Butler's deputy, Scott Ritter? Mr. Ritter accused the British and American Governments of turning a blind eye to Saddam Hussein's transgressions, in the vain hope that, if they gave way, Saddam would lay off. Does the Secretary of State think that, if those warnings had been heeded, the present crisis might have been avoided?

Finally, will the Foreign Secretary confirm that Iraq cannot pick and choose the people who are appointed by the international community to enforce its will? Does he agree that it would be a tragedy if Richard Butler and his work were cast aside in a futile attempt to placate Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Cook: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for what I shall take as support for our position. He is, of course, absolutely right to say that this is not the first time that Saddam Hussein has tested the will of the international community—nor is it the first time in the past eight years. Saddam Hussein's testing of the international community did not commence after the general election. Whenever the previous Administration stood firm to him, we gave them our full support.

It is important that we remain patient, strong and resolute. We might as well be clear now that this will not be the last time that Saddam Hussein tests our resolve. We have to be firm and clear that he has to comply, and we shall have to be resolute the next time he seeks to test that resolve. There is absolutely no intention on the part of the Government to walk away from either the crisis in the Gulf or what we said on the previous occasion.

We remain ready to use all options. We have a dozen Tornados already in the Gulf, and we have maintained that presence ever since the previous crisis. We are confident that we have the basis on which, if required, we could put them into use. Resolution 1154, which endorsed the agreement reached by Kofi Annan in Baghdad, warned that violations would be met with the severest consequences.

Finally, in respect of Mr. Ritter, it is a bit rich to accuse the United States and the United Kingdom of being weak and irresolute in standing up to Saddam Hussein. Those two countries have been the firmest in making it clear that Saddam Hussein has to comply with the resolutions, and it would give us a better prospect of Saddam Hussein recognising our resolve if the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not at every possible opportunity seek to undermine that resolve.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement has not only regional but global implications, in view of the potential threat to world stability posed by the acquisition of nuclear and other non-conventional weapons by Iraq? Does he agree that the crisis has been coming for a very long time, and that, on recent statements that he has made, I have warned that things would not get better, and could get worse, without firm action?

Will my right hon. Friend confirm that there is now no scope for further negotiation with Iraq, because the United Nations Security Council resolutions in place require not negotiation but compliance by Iraq, and we have seen that, if negotiation does take place, Saddam Hussein violates any agreement he makes? Having confirmed that UN resolutions authorise the use of force, should that be decided on, will my right hon. Friend accept from me that, unless Saddam now backs down, there is no alternative to military action, which must come sooner rather than later?

Mr. Cook: My right hon. Friend is absolutely correct to say that what is now required of Saddam Hussein is compliance with the UN resolutions. The Security Council has no business and no power to enter into negotiations with Baghdad as to which bits of the resolution he chooses to comply with. The resolutions have been carefully considered and carefully calibrated.

Saddam Hussein must now comply with them in full, and he should reflect on the fact that, on this occasion, the Security Council has been united not only on the text, but in private comments and public statements criticising Baghdad. I have already told the House that all options remain open. Today, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence met Mr. Cohen from the United States Administration, and they have issued a joint statement stressing that we are ready to use force if force is required.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): May I express my support for the terms of the statement, and the firmness in which it is couched? While not expecting the Secretary of State to trade intelligence reports across the Floor of the House, does he agree that, to justify the option of the use of military force, it is necessary to have hard current evidence of continued wrongdoing by Saddam Hussein? Is he satisfied that there is such current evidence? Does he further agree that military force should never be used in revenge or frustration, no matter how extreme the provocation, and that, if it is used, it must be proportionate and have clear political objectives?

Mr. Cook: I entirely concur with the hon. and learned Gentleman that, if force is used, it must be used not as an expression of personal frustration or revenge, but in a way consistent with the UN resolutions, seeking to secure the objectives of those resolutions. Sadly, however, the evidence of non-compliance by Saddam Hussein mounts by the month. He has not been in compliance with the resolutions since the start of August, when he suspended co-operation with inspections, and he is no longer in compliance even with those parts of the resolutions that provide for monitoring.

[Mr. Cook]

Perhaps even more pertinent to the case of Saddam Hussein is the fact that not only is he in clear violation of the UN resolutions, but he is in flagrant violation of the agreement that was signed in Baghdad following personal exchanges between himself and Kofi Annan, the UN Secretary-General. We should all keep firmly in front of us the fact that Saddam Hussein in his action on Saturday and in August is not just challenging the United States and the United Kingdom, but defying the agreement that he made with the United Nations, and challenging all members of the United Nations.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): Are the oil exports from Iraq to Turkey by lorry, travelling by road through northern Kurdistan, in compliance with United Nations resolutions?

Mr. Cook: Baghdad has authority under the Security Council resolutions to export up to $10 billion of oil to purchase food, medicine and humanitarian goods. Some of the oil that is exported from Iraq comes under that programme. There is ample evidence that substantial volumes of oil are being exported from Iraq illicitly and illegally, and that the funds used from that do not go to purchase any humanitarian goods required by the Iraqi people; they support the extravagant life style of the elite in Baghdad, and pay for the weapons of mass destruction that are at the root of our concerns.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that it is important that we should secure Security Council authority for any action? Does he further agree that it is important not to threaten that which we are not ready to perform? Does he further agree that, if military action is undertaken, we may have to contemplate a substantial and extended air assault? Finally, does he agree that every step should be taken to secure the support of middle eastern states?

Mr. Cook: I entirely agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's last comment. It is important that we work with our allies and friends in the region to keep Iraq isolated. They may have some difficulty in expressing the fact publicly, but they understand that they are in the front line with Saddam Hussein and are the countries most at risk if the international community walks away and leaves Saddam with the capacity to produce weapons of mass destruction. Of course we must have proper authority for any action that we contemplate. It is equally important to maintain the unity of the international community, which is stronger than it was last February. That is a source of great strength and leverage for us with Baghdad.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Kelvin): Is not the problem the total bankruptcy of UNSCOM as a credible player? A senior United Nations official recently described the head of UNSCOM, Richard Butler, to me as a "congenital liar". That is based on knowing him for decades. Scott Ritter, who was lauded from the Opposition Front Bench, has admitted since his resignation that he was working with Israeli intelligence, while being the deputy head of a UN mission in Baghdad.

In the past few hours, it has been revealed that four inspectors working in Iraq under pseudonyms and carrying false passports were Colonel Khadouri, Lieutenant Shamani, Colonel Rabscon and Jador Dalal Shamoni—all operatives of Mossad, the Israeli intelligence service. We all hope that the inspectors can get back to work monitoring the awful weapons that exist not only in Iraq but throughout the region, not least in Israel; but a new and credible leadership of UNSCOM and transparency in its work will be a precondition for the restoration of credibility.

Above all, we need a time frame for ending the sanctions, which are killing 6,000 Iraqi children every month—not Ba'athists, not Saddam's officials, not the elite, but 6,000 Iraqi children every month—according to Mr. Dennis Halliday, the recently resigned UN official who quit his job in Baghdad because he said that the policy that he was being asked to implement was completely bankrupt.

Mr. Cook: I have heard of the reports that Baghdad has alleged that four people in UNSCOM were working for Israel, but I have had no corroboration of those reports, which stem from Baghdad. Of course, I shall happily answer any written question that my hon. Friend wants to put to me on the issue. Indeed, I undertake to write to him once we have clear information.

I strongly disagree with my hon. Friend's characterisation of Mr. Butler. I have known Richard Butler since long before he became the head of UNSCOM. I know him to be a diplomat committed to building a successful international community. My hon. Friend and most Labour Members would find a lot of common ground with Mr. Butler's wider views on foreign policy—and possibly even domestic policy. I therefore utterly acquit him of the charges that have been made against him. Baghdad's main complaint about Mr. Butler is that he has been too robust in carrying out the job that the UN asked him to do.

Finally, there is a simple remedy for the dire situation of some children in Iraq. It lies in the hands of Saddam Hussein. He could use the oil that he is smuggling out to maintain his elite and his programmes of weapons of mass destruction and put it into the oil-for-food programme, on which he has continually failed to meet the targets. Those resources could be used to meet the needs of his people instead of the needs of his military machine.

We have closely monitored the food and medicines going into the country. They are exempt from sanctions. There have never been sanctions on medicine. At the same time as there are complaints that there are not sufficient antibiotics in Iraq to treat the children, Saddam Hussein has imported specialist surgical equipment to carry out cosmetic surgery on those around him. Those are his priorities, and he is to blame for the suffering of the children.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that, following the Annan agreement, the workings and timetable of UNSCOM were severely compromised? The present state of weaponry of the most dangerous sort in Iraq may be worse than we had reason to believe earlier.

Secondly, will the right hon. Gentleman say a little more about the point raised by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) on the importance of securing the support of our friends and allies in the Gulf? Is he aware that there is a great deal of suspicion of American motives in the Gulf states, which find it particularly hard to swallow the discrepancy between the way in which the Americans deal with the Israelis and the way in which they deal with Iraq? Although those are largely matters of fantasy in their minds, it is important that the issue should be clarified, and that our support for the Americans in securing their safety should be well understood.

Mr. Cook: I disagree with the hon. Gentleman on the Annan agreement compromising the work of UNSCOM. The agreement led the way for UNSCOM to carry out intrusive inspections on presidential sites. A number of such inspections took place. I cannot give the hon. Gentleman an assurance that the position is not worse than we fear. Even if it is only as bad as we fear, that is severe enough to justify us in maintaining the pressure on Iraq to come into full compliance before there can be any move to remove sanctions.

I welcome the progress that has been secured in the middle east peace process. It is a modest step, but it is the first step that we have had for two years, and as such is particularly welcome. We must build on the momentum created by that agreement. I assure the hon. Gentleman that Britain, Europe and the United States will make it clear that we want compliance with the Security Council resolutions that affect Iraq, and agreement and progress on the middle east peace process.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Leaving aside the voice of Baghdad that we heard a moment ago, is it not encouraging that those countries that were reluctant to act earlier this year are now realising the cat-and-mouse antics of the criminal regime, and taking a more forceful position? If it was right—as it obviously was—a few weeks ago for the international community to give an ultimatum to the Serbian leadership, should not the United Nations very quickly give Saddam Hussein an ultimatum that he should comply entirely with the United Nations weapon inspections, or military action will be taken? Unfortunately, force—or the threat of force—is about the only thing that the bloody dictator in Baghdad understands.

Mr. Cook: There is no need for any fresh ultimatum. Resolution 1154 made it clear that a violation of the Security Council resolutions or a failure to comply with the memorandum of understanding signed with Kofi Annan would lead to the severest consequences. I also entirely endorse my hon. Friend's comment in the earlier part of his question. In the past few days, the countries that have felt most indignant about the action by Baghdad are those that have hitherto pleaded for understanding of Iraq's position and the need to offer light at the end of the tunnel. We entirely agree with them about the need for light at the end of the tunnel, but it is now becoming apparent to all that Saddam Hussein has no intention of responding to that incentive, and will continue to test our resolve until we make it plain that there is no other way out of the sanctions regime for him.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Will the Foreign Secretary make it clear that Iraq should have no doubt that the House is united in standing up to ensure that the United Nations resolutions are carried out? While making that clear, however, is it not important to be absolutely fair and acknowledge that, although there is complete and proper condemnation of the non-compliance with the work of UNSCOM, it is acknowledged that the IAEA work on nuclear weapons has been carried out? Last week, the IAEA gave the Science and Technology Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly the assurance that, at that moment, it had no criticism. When we present a case, we must ensure that we do not over-egg the pudding.

Secondly, why is another United Nations resolution necessary? Surely resolution 1154 gives us the power to take action, and the resolution last Friday—or was it on 29 October?—showed the Russians and the French backing the proposed action. Why do we need another resolution?

Mr. Cook: Saturday's statement was a statement, not a resolution. I think, and I am sure that the whole House would agree, that there is merit in making it clear to Baghdad that there is unity in the Security Council around the strong resolution that we have drafted, which condemns the violation of the agreement and demands immediate compliance with both the resolution of the Security Council and the Annan agreement.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the different portfolios. There are four under examination, one of which is the nuclear file. Substantively, he is correct; the agency reported last month that it could now move from intrusive inspection to on-going monitoring and verification. It might also be possible for us to contemplate a similar step concerning the missile portfolio.

None of that, however, removes any of the points of concern that I have expressed concerning the state of the chemical and biological weapons portfolios. On both those fronts, it is clear that Saddam Hussein has the capacity to produce deliverable weapons of mass destruction, and until all four portfolios can be closed, sanctions must remain in place.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): My right hon. Friend has correctly pointed out that Saddam Hussein presents a serious danger to his middle eastern neighbours. What is their response to that danger? What are the attitudes of some of those neighbours, such as Iran, Syria and the Gulf states?

Mr. Cook: We seek a close dialogue with those countries, and will undertake our own diplomatic efforts in that regard. Mr. Cohen, the United States Secretary of State for Defence, is on his way to the Gulf to consult those allies and discuss their approach to the present crisis.

I remind the House that, when we last had a confrontation with Baghdad, in February, there was considerable understanding from the Gulf states, which adopted a strong statement making it clear that, if force were used, responsibility for its being required would lie squarely with Baghdad. I hope that we will see the same degree of understanding and support from those countries now. After all, they know that, if the United Nations walked away, they are the ones that would be at risk from Baghdad's military machine.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Given the devastating allegations made earlier this year by Scott

[Mr. Tim Collins]

Ritter, will the Foreign Secretary place on record the fact that, henceforth, his office and his officials will give absolute and unequivocal backing to any and all requests for assistance from UNSCOM in its vital work on behalf of the world community? Will he also make representations to his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence that now may not be the best time to cut defence spending and reduce the number of combat aircraft available to the RAF?

Mr. Cook: Whether Mr. Ritter's allegations are devastating depends on whether one regards them as credible. I have no need to give the hon. Gentleman an assurance that henceforth we will give full support to UNSCOM; we have always done so, and Britain has been among the leading supporters of its work. After everything that the previous Administration did to cut the finances and resources of our defence forces, a period of silence from the Opposition on that score would be welcome.

Mr. Ernie Ross (Dundee, West): May I assure my right hon. Friend that everyone in the House will agree with the actions that the world community has taken? The latest episode shows that Saddam Hussein is a past master of using events in the region to his advantage. We have only to consider the fact that King Hussein is in America receiving medical treatment, and that the middle east peace talks, although there was agreement at Wye, have yet to move forward, to see why Saddam Hussein felt confident enough to test the will of the world community.

Unless the world community is absolutely resolute in its determination to oppose Saddam Hussein and bring him to heel, he will continue to flout the resolutions, with which he still has not complied. The message must go out from the House that we are united in seeing through the antics of that idiot.

Mr. Cook: I agree that Saddam will continue to play box and cox with the world community, in the hope that on some occasion we shall give up and go away, and leave the ring to him. It is important that he understands that we will not do that this time, or any other time. The secret to our carrying conviction when we say that is to appear united both as a nation and as a member of the international community.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Given the grave nature of the capabilities of Saddam Hussein that are now being discovered, and the desire that our defence policy be foreign-policy-led, will the Secretary of State make representations to the Ministry of Defence to ensure that we maintain a nuclear, biological and chemical capability in the Territorial Army? Does he agree that the decision of the United States to create 170 such units is instructive in that context?

Mr. Cook: I am not entirely sure that the hon. Gentleman is rising to the gravity of the international issue that we are considering. We have no evidence that Saddam now has the capability to hit the United Kingdom. None the less, we are determined not to leave him in possession of the capability that he has.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Will my right hon. Friend utterly reject the propaganda by Radio Baghdad, and any little echo of it in the House or elsewhere, and make it clear that there can be no suggestion of equivalence between Israel and Iraq? That is first, because there is an agreement between Israel and the Palestinians made at the Wye plantation, which we greatly welcome, and secondly because the Israeli people can throw out their Government, whereas the Iraqi people, despite what their friends seem to think, cannot, because they have a dictatorship that has never been elected.

Mr. Cook: My hon. Friend draws a clear and important contrast between Iraq and Israel. In Israel there is a lively, open and free debate about the peace process and the next steps that the country should take. That underlines the stark contrast between the two. None the less, I hope that it will be possible for us to build on the recent agreement to achieve progress in the middle east peace process, and that it will provide stability for the region. I hope that we shall be able to demonstrate to the countries involved the fact that we seek even-handedly to build stability and security throughout the region.

Mr. Crispin Blunt (Reigate): Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that we are now in a more serious situation than in February, because of Iraq's violation of the will of the international community? Backed by UN Security Council resolution 1154, are we not back to the position as of February, except that the agreement with Kofi Annan has also been violated? Will the right hon. Gentleman address again the concerns of my right hon. and learned Friend the shadow Foreign Secretary about the Security Council resolution that he is tabling today, and ensure that it is at least as strong as resolution 1154, so that no one can take the view that the international community has stepped back from the position that it took last February?

Mr. Cook: I can certainly assure the hon. Gentleman that we have no intention of weakening the position of the international community at the present time, and that will not be the effect of the draft text that we have prepared for debate within the Security Council. He is right, in the sense that the international community is in a stronger position now than it was at the start of the year because of the passage of resolution 1154 and the signing of the memorandum of understanding. It is now quite clear what Saddam Hussein has to do. It is quite clear that he accepted that in February. It is also quite clear what the consequences would be of his violating that understanding.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): Is it not clear that giving effect to those aims may eventually require more than air strikes, which are in danger of becoming the 20th-century equivalent of sending a gunboat? Will the Foreign Secretary ask his colleagues in the Ministry of Defence to revisit the assumptions that they have made in the strategic defence review on sustainability across all three services and in our defence industry, as the Americans are doing at this very moment?

Mr. Cook: I must remind the House that this Government took office after a period of substantial and continual cuts in Britain's defence capacity. Those cuts have now been arrested. We have produced a strategic defence review which meets the real needs of Britain in the modern world. It is about time that those hon. Members who cut British defence spending in office stopped trying to preen themselves as the people on the side of the forces.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I am sure that almost everybody in the House would commend the Foreign Secretary on his resolve. However, he speaks of patience—does he not think that the world has been patient for long enough? Will he confirm that all avenues of the UN have been explored over eight years, yet Saddam Hussein still undermines the stability and peace of the region and terrorises his own people?

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that Saddam Hussein's regime has no legitimate authority, but only the authority of force and the de facto authority that that gives him? The Foreign Secretary has said that he believes that we have no argument with the people of Iraq. Will he therefore take steps, through the UN, to arraign or indict Saddam before either a specially set up international tribunal or the projected International Criminal Court?

Mr. Cook: Saddam Hussein is the best single case for the International Criminal Court which we supported in Rome in the summer. I very much hope that it will be possible for us to make as rapid progress as we can in getting that court set up. In the meantime, we remain open to proposals for an international tribunal specifically to consider Iraq and Saddam Hussein. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that Saddam is plainly guilty of major atrocities and offences against humanitarian and international law, and it is entirely regrettable that, at present, there is no international mechanism to hold him to justice. We would wish to see that there was such a mechanism.

BILL PRESENTED

WILDLIFE

Mr. David Lepper, supported by Mr. David Chaytor, Mr. Cynog Dafis, Mrs. Helen Brinton, Ms Julia Drown, Jane Griffiths, Mr. Roy Beggs, Mr. Matthew Taylor and Mr. Tom Brake, presented a Bill to provide for conservation purposes to be furthered by any person discharging a function under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981; to make new provision for the protection of certain species and sites; and for related purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Thursday 19 November, and to be printed [Bill 252].

Conduct of Referendums

5.33 pm

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to set up an election commission with powers over the conduct and financing of referendums.

Referendums have not been a traditional part of our democratic system. It is regrettable that, under the present Government, they are becoming ever more frequent. It is sad that a Government with so large a majority do not have sufficient confidence in their own policies to accept responsibility for them.

I accept that, in certain cases—where major constitutional change is involved—it is right to consult the people. However, a referendum is not a mere opinion poll to be used at the whim of the Government of the day. Opinion polls and focus groups have become popular with the Government, and we all know that if one asks the right question, one gets the right answer—or, rather, if one frames a question in a certain way, one will get the answer one wants.

That is all very well if the object of the exercise is to determine which soap powder washes whiter, or which instant coffee tastes most like the real thing. Such a cavalier approach is not acceptable when the point at issue is whether there should be a fundamental change to our voting system, whether the pound should be merged with the euro, or whether the composition of this Parliament itself should be altered. We are likely to be faced with referendums on all three of those issues, among others, some time in the near future.

It is truly incredible that the Government are willing to conduct referendums on such fundamental aspects of our democratic system, but are unwilling to entrench that very process of consultation in a properly determined framework. I hope that the House will agree that it is not only desirable but necessary to establish fair and clear rules, and to appoint an independent arbiter to govern the conduct of referendums.

The Bill will give legislative effect to the reasoned plea for real referendums—a campaign which was launched by my Conservative colleagues, and which has the support of hon. Members from all parties in this House, several Members of another place, the Electoral Reform Society, Charter 88, the Constitution Unit and the Institute for Constitutional Research. The Bill will also implement the recommendations of the Neill committee on standards in public life, which were published last month.

The main effects of the Bill will be: first, to set up an independent commission, the members of which shall be nominated not by the Government but by the Speaker; secondly, to give a remit to the commission to report within three months on a clear set of rules to govern the conduct and financing of referendums, including such issues as who is eligible to vote, what constitutes a sufficient majority, how the question can be worded and how access to public service broadcasting shall be determined; thirdly, to prohibit the holding of any referendum except those conducted in accordance with the rules laid down by the independent commissioners.

The Electoral Reform Society has called this a level playing field for referendums. It is hard to imagine why anyone who upholds democracy would wish to see a referendum conducted other than on a fair and level playing field. If the purpose of consulting the people is to secure legitimacy for important constitutional decisions, first, voters must be well informed about the arguments on both sides of the campaign, and, secondly, the side which loses must be confident that the fight was fairly conducted.

For those two conditions to apply, the information campaigns must be adequately funded, and the funding must be equally balanced. It will therefore be necessary to provide for public funding for the campaigns, as the Neill committee recommended. It is utterly absurd that, at present, we have a democratic system which conducts general elections under strict rules—to our great credit in the UK, as one of the oldest and most stable democracies in the world—yet we have, over the past year or so, condoned a situation in which the Government have been able to spend substantial sums of taxpayers' money promoting only one side of a referendum campaign—for example, in the outrageously one-sided campaign in Wales. There can be no argument—it simply is not fair.

It is essential that an independent commission should lay down reasonable, clear and fair rules for funding on both sides of referendum campaigns as a matter of urgency, and certainly before another referendum is called—which, given the new-found enthusiasm of some Ministers for a single currency, could be at any minute.

I am pleased to have the opportunity to ask leave of the House to bring in this important Bill, but it should not be left to a humble Opposition Back Bencher to bring this matter before the House and to attempt to put into legislation a framework for the fair conduct of referendums. If, by any chance, the Bill fails to become law, and I suppose there is every chance that it will not—[Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."] I am grateful for the support of my hon. Friends. It is a pity that we are nearing the end of this Session. I sincerely hope that every hon. Member who believes in defending the democratic process will join me in calling on the Government to produce a Bill that will have the same effect in the next Session.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mrs. Eleanor Laing, Mr. Martin Bell, Mr. Simon Burns, Mr. Nigel Evans, Mr. Michael Fabricant, Mr. Christopher Fraser, Mr. Bernard Jenkin, Miss Julie Kirkbride, Mr. Oliver Letwin, Mr. John MacGregor, Mr. Desmond Swayne and Mr. Shaun Woodward.

CONDUCT OF REFERENDUMS

Mrs. Eleanor Laing accordingly presented a Bill to set up an election commission with powers over the conduct and financing of referendums: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Wednesday 18 November, and to be printed [Bill 253].

Personal Pensions Mis-selling

[Relevant documents: The Minutes of Evidence taken before the Treasury Committee on 6th and 14th May, 25th June and 2nd July (HC 712-i to iv).]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Hill.]

5.40 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): I welcome the opportunity to debate personal pensions mis-selling. It is a matter that directly affects the lives of many people, but it also raises deeper questions that affect us all, about the way in which the pensions industry is run, how it is structured and what role it can and should play in helping people provide for their futures.

The scale of pensions mis-selling is profoundly shocking. Hundreds of thousands of people have been mis-sold pensions and as many as 2 million people's cases will need to be looked into. The sheer scale of the problem makes its resolution a priority for the Government.

The matter is also of central strategic interest to the Government. We are facing a future in which people increasingly need to save. Employment is less certain. Increasingly, people can look forward to long periods in retirement and it is not possible through the tax system alone to help everyone to enjoy the standards that they have come rightly to expect.

However, before saving, people need to have confidence in the products that they use and the companies that look after their savings. The pensions mis-selling episode of the late 1980s and the early 1990s was a terrible betrayal of that confidence and forceful action is needed to put it right.

Mr. Nick Hawkins (Surrey Heath): Does the hon. Lady recognise that she and her ministerial colleagues substantially damaged the very real hope that people have of providing for themselves by giving the impression that the whole industry is riddled, if not with corruption then certainly with incompetence? She has seriously damaged people's opportunity to provide for their future while at the same time the Government are constantly raiding the state pension.

Ms Hewitt: That is absolute nonsense. The damage was done to people's confidence in the financial services industry by those responsible for the mis-selling of personal pensions. It was compounded by the failure of the previous Government, whom the hon. Gentleman supported, to put right the scandal of that mis-selling when it was first discovered. I shall return to that matter.

The performance of the financial services industry is also a vital ingredient in the future success of the United Kingdom economy. Many of the failings that led to mis-selling, and indeed to the delays in putting it right, are symptomatic of deeper problems within some—not all—pension firms. Senior management have to take their responsibilities seriously and ensure that their firms have effective management systems and that due priority is given to proper customer care. Firms must deal with those issues in their own commercial interests. Any firm that fails to look after its customers properly can scarcely expect the public's confidence or custom.

Delay is one of the problems that has dogged the review. Mis-selling started in 1988, and the research that confirmed the extent of the problem was published in 1993. The review was started in 1994. The first deadline for completing the priority review was December 1996. The deadline came and went and only a tiny proportion of cases had been dealt with—delay after delay.

Thanks to my predecessor and to determined action by the regulators, the industry was finally jolted into action last year. Now, genuine progress has been made. More than three quarters of the most urgent cases—the priority cases—have now been resolved. The life companies in particular have made big strides. On average, they have now resolved approaching 90 per cent. of their priority cases, and some have done even better. By the end of the year, all firms must have completed their priority cases, or face the consequences.

Even after that milestone is finally reached, much will remain to be done. I intend to see that the momentum that we have established since the general election is maintained. Now, all the firms must gear up to tackle phase two of the review, which broadly speaking will deal with the cases of younger people. In other respects, it is simply an extension of the phase one process, although there is a new approach—an innovation—to identifying which investors should be in the review, building on the experience of the first phase. Because of that, the phase two review process should be less onerous for firms.

In maintaining the momentum of the review, I regret to say that the main challenge that I face—still—is resistance from parts of the industry. That is not to say that all in the industry are of the same mind. I am pleased that many, including some independent financial advisers, are now genuinely committed to the review process and see the benefits of getting on with the job. Some have even gone so far as to re-examine the way in which they do business and to learn the lessons of the past, because they know that that is the best way forward. I urge all firms to follow their example of constructive action.

The industry has to pull together if it is to haul itself out of the hole that it dug for itself in the late 1980s and shape up to the challenges of the new millennium. I believe—I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members would agree—that the life industry can and should be a world-class industry, but first it must face up to its weaknesses and deal with them. It is not all good news. There are still some deep pockets of resistance.

The message from the Government has been clear and consistent: all firms must get on with their reviews or face the consequences. I find it extraordinary that there are still some people in the industry who seem to think that they are different and that this message does not apply to them.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Does the hon. Lady agree that it is surprising that some firms against which no complaint was made and in which no fault was found in phase one, are still being asked to go through phase two, look into every policy that they sold as independent financial advisers and conduct a total review, when there is not a shred of evidence to suggest that they engaged in any mis-selling?

Ms Hewitt: I thank the hon. Gentleman for that comment. It is encouraging that there are firms that found in their phase 1 review that they had not mis-sold any personal pensions. That should give them confidence as they move forward to phase 2. However, the fact that they achieved a satisfactory result on the priority cases—the older investors—does not mean that they can be excluded from the process of reviewing the advice that was given to younger investors. The younger investors also matter, and are entitled to have their cases looked at.

Mr. Hawkins: Does not the hon. Lady understand that many of the smaller independent financial advisers, who are struggling to make ends meet and to run a successful business, do not have the resources or vast amounts of time to waste on investigating matters that there is no need to investigate? The ludicrous naming and shaming approach that the Economic Secretary has adopted, and the idea that no one could ever lose money in any circumstances, will have one result: there will be no independent financial advisory sector, because she will have put all the IFAs out of business.

Ms Hewitt: That is nonsense. I shall develop my argument about what is going on among some independent financial advisers. Some of them seem to think that their inaction during phase 1 of the review was defensible. Faced with phase 2 of the review, they still choose to blame everyone except themselves. There are hundreds of thousands of people—constituents of all of us—younger as well as older, who have lost out as a result of being sold products that were wrong for them, in breach of the regulatory rules that were in force at the time. The firms concerned have a clear responsibility to establish whether any of their customers deserve redress as a result, and to make redress where it is warranted.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): Does not the hon. Lady recognise that those regulations were not in place? They were applied retrospectively. That is the kernel of the problem for the small independent financial advisers, who acted in good faith and now find, with rules being applied retrospectively, that they are caught up in an awful debacle.

Ms Hewitt: I am extremely sorry that every Member of the House, whether in personal meetings with constituents who are IFAs or through the circular letters that have come from the Independent Financial Advisers Association, has repeatedly been misled as to the true situation.

The first thing that I did when I took responsibility for the review of personal pensions mis-selling and encountered the lobbying from the IFA Association was to press the Treasury and the regulators on the issue, to find out what rules were in force at the time. The regulations that were in force at the time, under the regulatory framework—inadequate though it was—put in place by the previous Government, stated that products that were sold by independent financial advisers or by life firms had to be suitable for the investor. The regulations also required those selling products to keep records of the sales. One of the difficulties facing many—not all—of the IFAs in the current review is that they did not keep adequate records—

Mr. Butterfill: Adequate.

Ms Hewitt: Adequate records. That in itself is a failure of regulatory compliance.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): When an assessment is made of the advice given to their customers, will IFAs be deemed to have acted reasonably in working on the basis of the market conditions at the time, or is the suitability of their advice to be assessed in retrospect, in the light of the extraordinary changes in market conditions that have occurred over the past 10 years, in particular the dramatic fall in annuity rates?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman, possibly, and the IFAA, certainly, are confusing two different issues. One is whether the product was sold in compliance with the rules in force at the time. The judgment as to suitability can be made only in the light of the regulatory conditions in force when the product was sold and in the light of the then market conditions. If it transpires that a product was mis-sold, the issue of whether there was a loss as a result of that mis-selling must be addressed. The loss can sensibly be calculated only by reference to what has happened since the product was sold. Those are two different parts of the test that must be considered before a decision is made to give compensation to the investor.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale) rose—

Ms Hewitt: I want to make a little progress with the argument. Every Member of the House has been lobbied—

Mr. Ivan Lewis (Bury, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that financial advisers who give good advice have nothing to fear from the regulations? Many of them will welcome the fact that good practice is being promoted and encouraged. Financial advisers who gave and give sound professional advice will benefit from a transparent system. Not only should we be on the side of the consumer and the investor, but we should aim to drive up good practice. Any financial adviser worth his salt will want to function in an industry where those who provide sound professional advice flourish, and those who do not are held to account.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right. That is the central argument that should be made by every right hon. and hon. Member in response to the misleading lobbying and representations from the IFAA. That organisation has made it clear—

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk) rose—

Ms Hewitt: I want to make some progress, if I may.

Mr. MacGregor: On the hon. Lady's point about loss, may I ask her a question? Losses will be calculated in the next year or two years. If market conditions change again, which is entirely possible, and the loss ceases to be a loss, and if the person concerned does not get the pension for another 20 years, which is very likely under phase 2, will redress be made at a later stage if the loss disappears?

Ms Hewitt: I shall return to that and other points. I want to develop the argument. However, I observe—I hope this will not be thought unfair—that the right hon. Gentleman is a director of one of the companies that was substantially fined by the Personal Investment Authority for not making adequate progress in the review.

Mr. MacGregor: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. As you know, I have indicated that I wish to speak in the debate. The first thing that I shall do is to declare my interest, of course.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): That is not a point of order for the Chair.

Ms Hewitt: The IFAA has made it crystal clear that it wants to stop, or at least delay or curtail, phase 2. The leaflet, which many hon. Members have seen, is clear about that. I do not find anything surprising—

Mr. Greenway: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Hewitt: No, I am not giving way at this point. I have seen the leaflet, and the implication is entirely clear. The IFAA is an organisation whose track record has been to put its members' commercial interests ahead of the rights and welfare of their customers. It went as far as to take the regulators to court over the priority review in 1995. It lost that action, but it held up the review.

In all our constituencies there are people who trusted poor advice by some IFAs, and whose future may well be much poorer as a consequence. On average, in each constituency represented by a right hon. or hon. Member, for each IFA firm in that constituency, there are about 100 victims of poor advice from an IFA or a life office. If the IFAA and its supporters had their way and delayed or even stopped phase 2, those people would be left high and dry. Neither the Government nor the regulators will allow that to happen. The second phase of the review will go ahead. We will not allow the IFAA to wreck people's entitlement to the redress that they deserve.

I take the opportunity presented by this debate to ask the industry as a whole to think long and hard about the consequences of seeking to frustrate progress on phase 2. What would happen if it succeeded? The first damaging effect is that the industry would prolong the uncertainty for the victims of mis-selling, adding insult to injury. Secondly, it would prolong the agony for the industry as a whole. Despite a slow start, many in the industry have come to the view that the sooner it puts the shameful pensions mis-selling episode behind it, the better. The last thing that respectable firms want—or should want—is further delay and postponement of the day when the reputation of the industry recovers.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford): The hon. Lady has asked many questions of the industry, but I have a fundamental question for her that she has not addressed so far. What is the sense or justice in persuading IFAs to compensate those who have been mis-sold pensions and extracting large amounts of money out of life offices and pension companies without making any attempt to get those managers and salesmen who were responsible for the mis-selling to make a contribution? As things stand, 90 per cent. of the burden of compensation in the case of proprietary companies and 100 per cent. in the case of mutual companies is being borne by other innocent pensioners. One category of the innocent is compensating another category of the innocent while the guilty—the managers and the salesmen who undertook the mis-selling, often very cynically and dishonestly—get away scot free. What is the sense in that?

Ms Hewitt: We have looked very carefully at where the costs of compensation should fall, and we have settled on a very clear and proper principle: the costs of compensating the victims of mis-selling should be shared and borne by those who profited from the mis-selling. Hence, the burden is distributed between policy holders and shareholders. Within mutual companies, it is borne by the policy holders.

Mr. Davies: The hon. Lady has clearly not understood my question. She is talking about distributing the cost of compensation between pension holders and shareholders. I am not talking about that. The really guilty ones are those individuals who did the mis-selling: the managers and the salesmen. There has been no attempt whatever to get them to pay up. Why not?

Ms Hewitt: I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman did not succeed—perhaps he did not try—in persuading the previous Government, whom he supported so strongly, to initiate the action that we are now taking to resolve this scandal. If the hon. Gentleman listens, as I do, to those who work in the industry, he will find that a substantial degree of pain has been experienced by those who have faced the consequences of their actions and, in some cases, lost their jobs as a result.

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I pay great tribute to the hon. Lady and to her predecessor for the vigour with which they have pursued the mis-selling of personal pensions. However, the Treasury seems to have washed its hands of the mis-selling of free-standing additional voluntary contributions—which seems to be the same sort of issue. Will the hon. Lady give an assurance that she will pursue the mis-selling of FSAVCs with the same vigour as she is pursuing personal pensions mis-selling?

Ms Hewitt: I thank the hon. Gentleman for making that point. The Financial Services Authority has just published the results of its research into the mis-selling of free-standing AVCs. However, it is important to stress—I am sure that the hon. Gentleman understands this—that the problem involving the inappropriate sale of free-standing AVCs compared with AVCs into occupational pension schemes is of a very different, and fortunately lesser, order than the mis-selling of personal pensions. The latter removed people entirely from their occupational pension schemes.

I return to my point about the Independent Financial Advisers Association. If it and its supporters were successful in delaying phase 2, they would send a clear message to the customers of all IFAs that they are dealing with a second-class part of the industry, which—if it possibly could—would deny them the usual regulatory procedures. It would send the message that customers are dealing with people who appear not to believe in the need to put right past wrongs and take responsibility for their actions. Any firm that puts its weight or its money behind that campaign should not expect—and will not receive—any sympathy from me or my colleagues.

Mr. Greenway rose—

Mr. Butterfill rose—

Ms Hewitt: No, I will not give way. I have done so repeatedly during my speech. The IFAA should not expect any sympathy from the public or from the more forward-looking parts of the industry. Following the IFAA would be an act of blatant folly and, frankly, commercial incompetence.

It is perhaps not surprising that the life companies that are sympathetic to the IFAA's cause have been rather slow to identify themselves. Perhaps they are embarrassed—I can understand that—or perhaps they are aware of the damage that it would do to their reputations. My advice to any life company or any IFA that is pondering whether to lend its weight to the IFAA's campaign is to consider whether a more constructive approach might serve its interests better.

Mr. Greenway rose—

Ms Hewitt: I have given way repeatedly and I have made it clear that I do not intend to take any further interventions at this point. Hon. Members will have a chance to contribute to the debate, and I shall respond to their points later.

The Association of British Insurers has taken a laudable lead in this area. In a display of considerable foresight, it is launching a lifeboat facility to assist IFAs with processing cases and financing the costs of redress. It is up to the industry to make that initiative a success. I regret the fact that support for the initiative among the life companies is apparently incomplete. It is a very constructive and cost-effective way forward, and it is disappointing that some elements of the life industry have not yet decided to support the ABI initiative.

It is fundamental to the industry's recovery that the contempt for the public that was shown in the past becomes a thing of the past. Support for the ABI's initiative, which will assist the process of starting, progressing and completing phase 2 successfully, would help to restore public confidence. I urge all right hon. and hon. Members to emphasise to their IFA constituents that the existence of their industry is precisely the stake with which they are gambling. The path that some of them are pursuing will only damage their business.

In the longer term—my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis) made this point well—if compliance is poor and remedial action taken grudgingly, if at all, will reputable providers continue to sell through IFAs and risk the recovery of their own reputations? Will the public want to buy from them? Why should people be prepared to buy from IFAs when they believe that their complaints will not be dealt with if things go wrong?

Looking ahead, the Government are determined to act to ensure that scandals of this kind cannot easily occur again. We have learnt the lessons of the past and our clear conclusion is that we need a more effective system of regulation. One of the main reasons why the regulatory system failed to prevent or deal more swiftly with the mis-selling of personal pensions was that firms simply did not abide by the regulatory rules. Proper enforcement of the rules must be the cornerstone of good regulation.

It is true that the regulatory structure for investment business established under the Financial Services Act 1986 is not capable of delivering the standards of investor protection that the industry and the public have the right to expect. The multi-regulator system—with the old Securities and Investments Board at the top and the self-regulating organisations, such as the Personal Investment Authority, on the front line—allows too much opportunity for overlap, gaps and confusion.

Some of the regrettable delays that occurred—and to which I referred earlier—in getting the pensions review off the ground were a direct result of one organisation, the SIB, setting out the framework for action but others, the self-regulating organisations, having to carry it through. The Government's published plans for reform will ensure that none of the problems associated with the two-tier structure arise again. The regulators will be given a structure and powers that are more conducive to speedy and effective action.

We also intend to ensure that the interests of consumers receive due weight in regulation and in Government policy development. The previous Government's failure to do that contributed to the mis-selling of pensions on a shocking scale.

We need also to empower consumers. People need to be much better able to understand what it is that they are buying. Education, combined with the regulatory requirement on firms to provide key information on the products that they are selling will have a powerful effect on consumers' ability to compare products and will help people to help themselves.

Looking to the future, the Government are reforming the way that financial services are delivered. I recently announced our plans to set CAT—charges access terms—standards for individual savings accounts. That will give consumers the information that they need to understand what they are getting, so that where necessary they can exert genuine pressures on providers to offer good value. Pension reform is also on the agenda. The lessons that we have learnt from the pensions mis-selling episode are very much at the front of our minds as we set about that task.

I am also pleased to say that the Financial Services Authority is working with the thrust of the Government's productivity agenda to develop a better understanding of the competitiveness of United Kingdom financial services and the ways in which intelligent, better regulation can be a key source of competitive advantage in the modern global economy.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Does my hon. Friend agree that that is the sort of phase that we want to see? We want to see this phase of financial services put behind us, with Ministers shouting at the industry and the industry shouting back. From my experience in other industries, I believe that co-operating to give a world-class service to consumers is what we should be about.

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. I have no desire to shout at anybody. I never shout at anybody. However, I am not prepared to let anyone in the industry get away with some of the misrepresentations and delaying tactics that have been used. My hon. Friend is right to stress that it is in the interests of a competitive world-class financial services industry, including the providers and the advisers within it, to get phase 2 under way and successfully progressed as quickly as possible.

The FSA will have a specific duty under our proposals to have regard to the desirability of maintaining the competitiveness of our financial services. It will be working also to promote disclosure and customer understanding of the risks and benefits of investing in different financial products and services.

The Government inherited a terrible scandal affecting very many people. The previous Government simply did not have the guts to put things right or to give the regulators the tools and support that they needed. Since May 1997 giant strides have been made. The pressure that my predecessor and the regulators put on pensions firms has worked. We will continue with that pressure and, if necessary, increase it until this sorry episode is at an end.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford): I welcome this opportunity to debate the issue of pensions mis-selling. The Economic Secretary was right to say that it is an important issue which has affected thousands of people. However, I have to say that I regret that the hon. Lady has continued the practice of her predecessor in concentrating on attacking those firms and individuals that were guilty of mis-selling, but failing to acknowledge that the vast majority of those working in the financial services industry do an excellent job for their clients in an honest and conscientious way.

I would have hoped that the Economic Secretary would take more seriously the real concerns of those in the industry about the next phase of the review. It is perhaps more understandable that the hon. Lady chose to say nothing about the Government's actions towards those trying to provide for their retirement, as on any account the Government's record is a disgrace.

Mr. Brian Jenkins (Tamworth): I am sitting in the Chamber taking lectures from the hon. Gentleman, but would he like to comment on the fact—I am referring to a reply in Hansard—that the Department of Health and Social Security ran a campaign about "breaking the chains" which cost taxpayers £1.2 million? It was intended to lead people in a new direction. Many in the industry feel aggrieved that they have not received an apology from the previous Government.

Mr. Whittingdale: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman raises that point because it allows me to say something about the background to the issue that we are debating, and in particular to point out that it was not the Social Security Act 1986 that was responsible for the mis-selling that occurred. Instead, responsibility rests with the actions of some of those in the industry who abused the opportunities that the Act provided.

The 1986 Act created personal pensions. For the first time, it removed the division between those who had the advantage of their own occupational scheme and those who did not. For those who were self-employed, for those who worked for employers who did not offer their own scheme and for those who moved frequently between employers, the Act gave an opportunity to have a pension scheme personal to them and fully portable as they moved from job to job. Not only did it give freedom and choice in pension provision to many who did not have it before, but for millions it meant that they are or will be better off in their retirement.

I entirely accept that for others, that was not the case. Mis-selling occurred as providers took advantage of the provisions of the 1986 Act to persuade investors to opt out of their existing occupational scheme or not to join one when it was clear that that was against their financial interests. In doing so, those providers were clearly acting in breach of the rules of the regulatory organisations of the time. The central principles of those rules were the requirements to ensure that the product was suitable to an investor's circumstances and that the advice was in his or her best interests. In too many instances, those principles were clearly breached.

As soon as it was apparent that that was the position, action was taken. The review announced in 1993 by the Securities and Investments Board was unprecedented. When the evidence showed that there had been systematic mis-selling, the SIB issued guidance which established the priority groups and which required its members to seek out all cases within them.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): The hon. Gentleman has referred to the rules that were breached in many instances. Will he take the opportunity to distance himself from the letter that we have all had from the IFA Association, which states that the rules were imposed retrospectively?

Mr. Whittingdale: I want to come on to the concerns of the Independent Financial Advisers Association, which I think are entirely genuine. Where mis-selling occurred, the IFAs are the first people who want to see that situation tackled and for redress to be given.

I return to the background to the issue that we are debating. I accept that initial progress was too slow. The information required was detailed and complex, making the process far too lengthy and bureaucratic. However, that, too, was addressed by the issue, in 1996, of simplified guidelines by the SIB to speed up the process. They were backed up by a statement of policy by the new Personal Investment Authority.

It is not true, as I think the Economic Secretary implied, that the Government stood by. Indeed, I would like to pay tribute to the work of Angela Knight, who when she was Economic Secretary, was assiduous in pursuing these matters and putting pressure on the industry to act. The only change since then has been the volume at which the words of the Economic Secretary have been delivered. All the regulatory mechanisms and sanctions that are being applied to the industry were put in place by the previous Government. The Economic Secretary is pursuing, as did her predecessor, exactly the same policy towards this issue as was established under the Conservative Government. The requirements on the industry to put right cases of mis-selling were laid down under the previous Conservative Government and the regulators were ensuring that they were put into practice.

Of course the Government are right to bring public pressure to bear, but they should acknowledge that the progress that has been made is as much, if not more, to do with measures taken before the general election as it is the result of accusations and threats made at press conferences by the Economic Secretary and her predecessor.

Mr. Greenway: If I catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I will expand on this declaration of interest. Many hon. Members know that I am the chairman of the Federation of Insurance and Investment Intermediary Associations, which includes the IFA Association. The federation is not saying that there should not be remedies under phase 2. Central to my hon. Friend's point is that the 1994 assessment of what should be done in the review on phase 1, which has been replicated in phase 2, is the cause of the difficulty. My hon. Friend is making the valid point that the previous Government took action. The IFA Association's quibble is not with this Government and the need for action, but with whether those 1994 rules should be applied without being reconsidered.

Mr. Whittingdale: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He has considerable knowledge and expertise on this matter, and I hope Mr. Deputy Speaker, that he will be successful in catching your eye later in the debate.

My hon. Friend mentioned IFAs and I turn now to phase 2 of the review, which is about to start. While the bullying and the intimidatory tactics of the previous Economic Secretary may not have been entirely necessary to achieve progress under phase 1, they are wholly inappropriate and unjustified for phase 2. The issues are much less clear cut and mainly concern younger people who are several years away from retirement, and we are considering advice that was given at a time when standards and market conditions were very different.

The burden of the phase 2 review is likely to be crippling for many small firms, but its justification is far less obvious. Under phase 2, advisers are required to seek out claims by writing to clients in envelopes that say on the outside, "Are you owed?" If investors request a review, it has to be conducted not according to the market conditions prevailing at the time, but according to the conditions of today's market which are vastly different.

In the 10 years since many of the transfers took place, annuity rates have fallen dramatically. The result is that those who took advice to transfer accrued benefits into a personal pension in 1988 today require 37 per cent. more in their retirement fund to provide the same pension. Nobody could have foreseen such a change, but under the rules, advisers are expected to provide compensation for its effects, although it is by no means clear that investors will ultimately suffer any losses as a result since investment conditions may well have swung back by the time that investors eventually retire.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham) rose—

Mr. Butterfill rose—

Mr. Whittingdale: I am spoiled for choice. I give way to my hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait).

Mrs. Lait: Does my hon. Friend agree that today's statement by the Chancellor and the increased public borrowing of which he spoke will lead to an increase in gilt interest rates and hence raise annuities again?

Mr. Whittingdale: I admire my hon. Friend's ability to find a silver lining in the cloud of the Chancellor's statement. In that at least I hope that she is correct.

[Mr. Whittingdale]

As I said, nobody could have foreseen the changes that have occurred. It is hardly any wonder that the industry is beginning to view the review as not about providing compensation where mis-selling has occurred, but about ensuring that no one loses any money under any circumstances.

Advisers are also being judged retrospectively on today's standards. In the vast majority of cases, advisers may well have made clear to their clients the potential risk involved, but 10 years ago, there was not the stringent requirement that now exists to keep records of advice given. The Economic Secretary said in her speech that the industry was misleading people by claiming that it was not required to keep proper records, but many of the IFAs that are now being criticised for not keeping records were at the time subject to several inspections by the regulatory organisations, and at no point did the regulators make any comment about the lack of records. Yet the burden of proof will now be placed on the advisers to show that they are not guilty of mis-selling rather than the reverse.

If phase 2 proceeds as intended, it will offend natural justice and lead to hundreds of long-standing and reputable firms going out of business. Unlike the big providers, they do not have policyholders or reserves to meet the costs of the review, let alone any compensation that might have to be paid.

It has been estimated that to assess the loss on any single case will cost about £1,000. The average cost for a firm of completing phase 2 is likely to be about £600,000, but the average annual turnover of an IFA firm is around £200,000—a third of that amount. On top of that, IFAs are now experiencing substantial increases in the cost of professional indemnity insurance, as a direct result of the potentially horrendous liabilities that they may face under phase 2.

The pensions advisers support systems scheme put together by the providers is welcome, but it deals only with the problems of phase 1 and it will not be enough to stop many small IFAs being tipped into bankruptcy if phase 2 of the review goes ahead under the present rules. Many of those firms, in the high streets of towns and villages across the country, have been providing sound and sensible advice to their clients over many years. They have never been found guilty of any kind of mis-selling and they are as anxious as anyone in the House for there to be redress for anyone who has been genuinely wronged.

However, as a member of one such typical small firm in my constituency said to me:

"We are being judged as guilty by everyone including the press before we have had a chance to prove our innocence and in any proper court of law we would not be subjected to the rules and regulations that we are in this current environment."

He went on to say that

"my fear is that there is a hidden agenda by this Government to actually wipe out the whole of the Independent Financial Market".

Such concerns appear all too real when one hears the belligerent noises made by Treasury Ministers. Statements such as the press release issued by the right hon. Member for Airdrie and Shotts (Mrs. Liddell), headed: are not helpful. Instead, they seem to confirm the industry's worst fears and undermine the public's confidence in the financial services industry.

I therefore appeal to the Government and the regulators to listen to the industry and work with it rather than shout at it. The industry is asking not for phase 2 to be stopped, but for its concerns to be dealt with. I am worried when I hear from the IFA Association that it has been seeking to meet the Minister to discuss its concerns and work out an acceptable solution, and has not been able to achieve even that. Of course we want proper redress for those who are entitled to it, but we also want a viable, successful financial services industry.

I turn now to the actions of the Government, who are themselves guilty of robbing pensioners of thousands of pounds. In the 18 months during which the Government have been in office, they have launched an unprecedented attack on those seeking to provide for their retirement and on savers generally. Within a few weeks of the election, the Chancellor introduced a pension tax that will cost pension funds over £5 billion a year. As a result, more than 10 million people will have to pay more into their pension schemes or else find that they receive less than they had planned when they retire.

Of course, the Government introduced that measure by stealth. They hoped that nobody would notice that they had been fleeced until many years later when they came to retire. Those are double standards of the worst kind. Millions of pounds are being devoted to an advertising campaign to alert investors to phase 2 of the pensions review, but investors are being deliberately keep in the dark about the fact that the Government have raided their pension schemes and cut the income that they can expect when they retire.

The full cost of the Government's pension tax is now becoming clear. The recent report of the trustees of the universities superannuation scheme estimates that the loss to the fund is approximately £70 million a year. That is not a possible loss; it does not depend on investment conditions or annuity rates; it represents a loss to the fund of about £500 each year for every beneficiary or future beneficiary of the scheme. There will be many more such trustees' reports to come.

On top of that, we now learn from the Daily Mail that the Chancellor may be planning a new stealth raid on our savings. In order to fill the black hole in his finances, he is considering restricting tax relief on pension contributions to the basic rate, hitting millions of higher rate taxpayers and providing a further disincentive to save. I ask the Economic Secretary to take this opportunity to make it clear that this report is untrue and to reassure investors that the tax relief at the higher rate will not be removed.

Mr. Hawkins: My hon. Friend has just been talking about double standards. Does he agree that the title of this debate ought to be "Government policy on pensions: mis-sold"?

Mr. Whittingdale: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. People will think that while many of those in the industry might have been guilty of mis-selling, in many ways what they have done pales in comparison with this Government's record in fleecing the pension funds of every single occupational pension scheme member.

If all this were not enough, the Government have also scrapped tax-exempt special savings accounts and personal equity plans, two of the most successful savings schemes ever devised, and are to replace them with an inferior, unpopular and ill-conceived product that is already being rejected by the public and the industry alike.

While the Government are saying that they are attempting to persuade savers to invest in equities, there is a deafening silence about the much-vaunted stakeholder pensions. Nearly a year after the discussion document was published, we appear to be no nearer to an announcement. Indeed, according to today's Financial Times, the whole scheme has now been torn up by the Treasury which has gone back to the drawing board. It is hardly surprising that the whole pensions industry is now beginning to suffer from planning blight.

The cumulative effect of the relentless attack on savings has been, not surprisingly, to reduce the amount that people want to save. Eighteen months ago, when the Conservative Government were in office, the savings ratio stood at 10.3 per cent. The latest figures show a fall of nearly 25 per cent., far steeper than was predicted in the Government's own Red Book. That is bad for investors, bad for business and bad for the country.

The mis-selling of personal pensions was a scandal that should be put right, but when it comes to defrauding those who are seeking to make provision for their retirement, the real offenders are the Government. Theirs is the real scandal, and it is they who should be providing redress.

Mr. Jon Trickett (Hemsworth): I thank the House authorities for arranging this important debate on a subject that affects the lives of very many people, and I hope to be able to correct some of the false impressions given by the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale).

Britain is justifiably proud of the size and strength of its financial sector. In this sphere, it can truly be said that Britain remains a world-class player. We can boast about the size of the sector and the excellence of the services that it provides. The phrase "City of London", which denotes the financial services sector in the United Kingdom, has also always been regarded as coterminous with the highest standards of moral rectitude. Sadly, a substantial part of the sector fell significantly below the standards to which it ought to aspire in the matter of personal pension mis-selling.

The sales forces of some of the most prestigious names in the City misled huge numbers of people. Furthermore, even when the scale of the mis-selling of personal pensions became evident to everyone, the same companies proceeded to drag their feet. They failed to meet almost every deadline, even those deadlines that had been agreed by the industry itself. What is more, they were aided and abetted by the Tories.

In government, the Tories had created the statutory regime that allowed the mis-selling to take place and then proceeded to prevaricate themselves, which allowed the issue to drag on for years. When Labour took office in May last year, only 2 per cent. of the pensioners who had been identified as having been mis-sold pensions had received compensation. That is the scale of the Tories' indolence or, worse still, complicity in the process.

It is to the eternal credit of this Government that they acted with determination and speed to bring a resolution to the scandal. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary on continuing to pursue the matter with energy and vigour. She will clearly need all that energy and vigour because, to judge from my case load and that of many hon. Members to whom I have spoken, it seems that many personal pensions companies will, I am afraid, continue to drag their feet and prevaricate for a long time.

I represent the former mining seat of Hemsworth. I wish to inform the House precisely how the pensions industry operated in the coalfields, especially the Yorkshire coalfield. Its record has been scandalous. The mis-selling of personal pensions was at its height at precisely the time when the coal mining industry was suffering an industrial cataclysm. For reasons that are known and which have been debated many times in the House, the coal mining industry was decimated. That was a great economic error but, in human terms, it represented a personal tragedy for thousands and thousands of families.

In my constituency alone, nearly 10,000 men lost their jobs in a matter of a few years. It was obvious that few miners in the communities that I represent would have immediate access to a new job. Many of the older men knew that they would probably never work again. Indeed, I am aware of the fact—it is more than anecdotal evidence—that many of the older men were told by the jobcentres and by the very civil servants who were meant to be finding them work that they would never work again.

The men had two assets. First, most of them were in receipt of a redundancy payment in the order of £20,000, or perhaps a little more. Secondly, they frequently had pension funds in the miners' pension scheme. However, as we know, the MPS has a rule whereby a pension does not commence until the pension-holder attains the age of 65.

The miners, their families and their communities saw the pit closures as a great tragedy, but the pension companies saw things a little differently. They saw redundant miners as a marketing opportunity. It does not take a mathematical genius to calculate that, in my constituency alone, 10,000 redundancy payments at £20,000 a piece resulted in a very large potential market of around £200 million, in addition to the funds already in the pension scheme.

The pension companies marketed their products hard. Many thousands of people in my constituency and elsewhere in the coalfields were sold inappropriate products. Miners had been told that society would be unable to find them another job, and now their only assets—their pensions and their redundancy moneys—were placed in jeopardy by some of the most prestigious household names in the country. That is a great scandal, but behind that scandal lies an even greater one, and that is the mechanism that the pension companies utilised to sell—or mis-sell—their personal pension schemes in the former mining communities. I shall describe the process to make sure that it is on the record.

It was quickly apparent to the pension companies that such communities are tightly knit and that there was little point in dispatching their conventional sales forces, with their gold cards, designer clothes, yuppie telephones and so on, to those areas. Instead, ex-miners were recruited by the pension companies, given rapid and inadequate training, and then sent out into their own villages and townships to prey on their former mates. Conservative Members are nodding their agreement.

[Mr. Jon Trickett]

The training that those people received was wholly inadequate. Those ex-miner trainees were supposed to pass exams before they went out selling, but I am aware, and can prove, that there was widespread cheating, aided and abetted by the companies, in that process. I have been told of the complicity of senior regional managers of nationally known and supposedly reputable pension companies in assisting former miners to complete exams so that they could go on the road to sell, or mis-sell, pensions to their former mates.

Such regional managers had been given sales targets by people higher up in the organisations. They considered the redundancies to be not a great human tragedy unfolding before this nation, but a golden opportunity.

Mr. Willis: What the hon. Gentleman is describing is not only a personal tragedy for the miners concerned, but an absolute insult to those communities, which no one would condone. Does he have evidence that independent financial advisers were working in those communities and mis-selling in the same way?

Mr. Trickett: I will come to the case of an independent financial adviser. It is clear to me that independent financial advisers were part of the mis-selling of pensions in the mining communities, but that was a different type of process from the one that I am describing.

The regional managers and the large companies, as well as the smaller companies, considered the redundancies to be not a great national tragedy, but a golden opportunity. They were prepared to close their eyes to such practices. As a consequence, ill-trained and inappropriately recruited former miners donned their Sunday-best suits and went back into their own communities to sell inadequate schemes, which they did not fully understand, to their neighbours, friends and former workmates. It is a great scandal that huge commissions were offered to that sales force to identify pension transfers from the miners' pension scheme.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The abuses that the hon. Gentleman is so vividly describing indeed took place, and he is absolutely right to say what he has said on that subject, but, in those circumstances, does not he think it quite extraordinary that those managers have kept their bonuses, those dishonest salesmen have kept their commission and his Government, as the Economic Secretary has told us, propose to do absolutely nothing about it? They intend that the full burden of compensation should be paid by innocent pension-holders.

Mr. Trickett: My point is that the culture of dishonesty, which is all that it can be described as, ran from top to bottom in those organisations. It is entirely inappropriate for the hon. Gentleman to say that the salesmen were dishonest. They were innocent dupes—ex-miners who were down a pit hacking coal and contributing to the wealth of this country one minute, and put into their Sunday suits and sent out with inadequate training the next. There was no dishonesty, other than the dishonesty of the pension fund managers.

Precisely the same process was in place in respect of the regional managers of the pension funds. I have spoken to some of them, and I understand the pressures that they were placed under. A culture of greed, which was encouraged by the previous Tory Government, infiltrated the industry throughout and led to the most scandalous processes taking place.

I have recently assisted one of my constituents, who operated in exactly the manner that I have described. He was promised massive earnings by a national company, which it would not be prudent to name. He was given training, encouraged to cheat in his exams and then put back on to the streets and into his own communities. He failed to sell—I should say mis-sell—pensions in adequate numbers. The company then lent him money in lieu of wages and of commission that should have been earned, which was a further disgrace.

When I met my constituent, he was being threatened with court action by one of the largest companies in the financial services sector in Europe. It was proposing to take him to court to recover the so-called loans with which he had been provided as a substitute for wages and for commission that he had failed to realise because he was not competent to sell the goods that he had been employed to sell. That is a disgraceful episode.

Mr. Davies: Go on, name the company.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order.

Mr. Trickett: I will not name the company, but I have given a clue, if the hon. Gentleman chooses to find it.

I then entered into correspondence, as hon. Members would expect, with the chief executive of the company, who is a public figure of some stature and whose company is a household name. Hon. Members might anticipate that such an individual would be ashamed of his company's behaviour. He was not, and he is not. The company wanted to recover all its so-called loan from my constituent. It used the interesting argument that it did not want to concede in my constituent's case, although it was accepted that he had been treated unfairly and badly, because of the precedent that that might create for others in the same position.

The logical deduction is that many people were put in the same position as my constituent. It is evident that the industry paid scant regard to the manner in which its products were sold in the coalfields and in the country at large. The high moral reputation of the financial services industry seems to have been little merited in relation to either its customers or even its own sales force.

Part of the industry is once again engaged in special pleading in respect of the second phase of the pensions review. I know that the Government will stand firm. On that issue, as on so many others, the Government will show that they stand on the side of the many, not just of the few.

I have no doubt that we will be remorseless in representing the consumer interest and that we will press on to phase 2. May I respectfully ask the Economic Secretary to find time to address the issue of the many pension-holders who have had their cases reviewed, but have not yet received compensation? They are having to wait inordinately long periods for their compensation to be paid. The procedure is necessarily detailed—I understand that, as do my constituents—but it is in danger of being over-bureaucratic and cumbersome.

I am particularly concerned about those pensionholders who go through the whole process only to find that the agency which mis-sold the pension is no longer in a financial position to pay compensation. I am aware of one such company. It is still trading and acknowledges that it should be paying a series of pensioners compensation for mis-sold pensions but, over the past few months, it has deliberately cancelled its indemnity insurance cover, thereby making itself unable to pay compensation. That means that my constituents will have to wait further inordinate periods to receive what is rightfully theirs. They are the poorest in a community drowning in poverty.

There is an investors' compensation scheme, which acts as a safety net in such cases. Unfortunately, it has been my experience that the scheme is operating far too slowly and, moreover, leaves too much responsibility in the hands of individual pensioners, who frequently face mighty financial institutions.

Today, I received from the investors' compensation scheme a further letter about a particular case. We are now back in a loop that we have already been around three times in relation to my constituent. I wonder why the scheme cannot take action to address his problems. Will my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary consider reviewing the scheme's operation, with a view to expediting matters for those unfortunate individuals whose situation requires them to have recourse to it?

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): I shall begin by declaring an interest. First, I was a non-executive director of London and Manchester and I have recently become a non-executive director of Friends Provident. I joined the London and Manchester board early last year. The fines that were applied to both boards related to periods well before I was a non-executive director. As the Minister raised this matter, I want to assure her that I have been assiduous in trying to ensure that we deal with pensions mis-selling as quickly as possible. I want to make it clear that I am not defending the previous position.

I am pleased to say that I am a non-executive director, because I believe that it is important that people who have some knowledge of what is happening out there in the industry contribute to such debates. I was delighted to join London and Manchester, because I have had a lifelong interest in the encouragement of long-term savings, especially in relation to owner-occupation and the property-owning democracy. That is what brought me into politics. I want to see the widest possible extension of savings, and I am very much aware of the importance of savings for the younger generations if they are to have a happy retirement.

Savings are particularly relevant for lower income groups, at whom the Government were aiming their pension reforms. London and Manchester has concentrated on those groups. I was particularly keen to play a part in carrying that forward. Friends Provident has strong Quaker origins, and the Quaker influence is still very strong. And I agree with the Minister's remarks about customer care in such companies.

My second interest is as chairman of the House of Commons pension fund trustees. We do not have personal pensions, but we have free-standing additional voluntary contributions. That experience gives me further insights into the responsibilities and some of the difficulties involved in these issues.

I want to make a balanced and positive contribution to the debate. I want to put my points to the Minister in a constructive spirit. I welcome her to her new post, and I congratulate her on it. She has a heavy responsibility to ensure that we get the balance right. That is what I want to try to explain in my contribution.

The starting point for all of us is the recognition that we need to encourage many more people to make long-term savings, particularly for their pensions. We all know that the state pension will be a smaller proportion of average earnings in 20 or 30 years' time. That is common ground between us: it is also the Government's view. We all want to encourage second pensions, and we all recognise the difficulties faced by low-income groups, people who frequently break careers or who never have a career. Encouraging long-term savings is one of the most important priorities for the Government.

I was going to say that we are looking forward to hearing what the Government have to say about building on the second pension, whether compulsory or not. I was also going to say that, when the proposals are presented, the help that the industry can give the Government will be important. However, I noted the headline story in today's Financial Times, which suggests that the Government have dropped their plans for sweeping pension reforms.

Ms Hewitt indicated dissent.

Mr. MacGregor: I hope therefore that, in her wind-up speech, the Minister will tell us that that is untrue, and that she will make the position clear. If there is any question of the Government dropping their plans for substantial reform, the need to establish a regime that will encourage many more people to save on their own and will encourage companies to introduce these schemes will be all the more pressing.

The omens are not particularly good. The surveys that I have seen show that a substantial proportion of people, including young people, realise that the state pension will be far from sufficient when they retire. About 85 per cent. of people understand that, so that message has got through, which is good. When they are asked whether they are doing anything about it on their own initiative, only about 12 per cent. reply in the affirmative. There is a huge gap, and thus an enormous challenge.

Final salary schemes, which are the most attractive schemes, will decline as a proportion of company schemes, because companies, for a variety of reasons, are moving to money purchase schemes. It is important that we promote money purchase schemes with company contributions, and that we encourage people to take out personal pensions. That will be right for them in principle if the pattern of their working life is different from what it used to be, and if they change career several times. The introduction of personal pensions was entirely right in principle, and we must build on them and increase their role.

The report in today's Financial Times showed the complexity of these problems:

"Members of the government admitted compulsion was 'dead' and that the review had shifted away from initiating low-cost, funded 'stakeholder' policies and towards modifying the regulatory environment to encourage industry provision of such schemes. 'We've been impressed how fast the private sector and trade unions have set up low-cost stakeholder lookalikes,' said a minister."

Friends Provident was one of the first into this market, and is working with trade unions. That is a highly attractive way of tackling the problem. The report goes on:

"'It's now a question of how we shape the market place and the Treasury is at the forefront of deciding this,' said another government member."

The hon. Lady may say that none of that is true, but if it is an indication of the Government's thinking, there needs to be strong co-operation between the Government and the industry to achieve the objectives we all seek.

I envisage two major problems. The first has been referred to already. The abolition of advance corporation tax and the reduction in the income of pension funds introduced by the Government last year will have a profound effect on the provision of pensions in the period ahead. Indeed, if there is a pension scandal, pension robbery or devaluation of benefits, the Government's action will, in the long run, be a stronger example of that than any of the pension mis-selling.

I have heard of companies that have already experienced the impact of these measures in their triennial valuations, because they considerably reduce the income stream. It is the income stream on which those valuations are based and from which the pensions eventually come. At the time, the Government argued that the valuation should be based on the capital of the funds, but we have seen in the past few months how fickle and dangerous that can be: it is the income stream that is important in the long term. The change that the Government made last year was a retrograde step.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): The right hon. Gentleman referred to pension robberies. Will he comment on the value of the basic state pension in 1976? Given what happened to SERPS during the Conservative regime, the state pension has been reduced to such an extent that someone retiring in 2028 will draw a SERPS plus basic state pension that is less than the value of the basic state pension was when the previous Labour Government left office.

Mr. MacGregor: The present Government have exactly the same policy, because of the difficulties of funding a state scheme. Hence the importance of ensuring that we get the corporate and private sector position right.

I heard about the reports in the Daily Mail yesterday of possible further moves by the Government to reduce pension contributions if they reduce the tax relief on contributions to private sector schemes. I asked the Chancellor this afternoon to make it clear that the Government do not intend to take further action on pension funds and contributions. He muttered quickly that there were no such proposals, and then talked about bank windfall taxes, which had nothing to do with the point I was raising. I suspect that he may regret muttering under his breath, but I profoundly hope that there will be no further moves to attack pension funds. I should be grateful if the hon. Lady confirmed that in more detail.

The second major problem concerns pension regulations and the mis-selling. I do not condone the mis-selling, and in no way do I defend it. People were taken out of occupational pension schemes—the NUM case is a good example—or, if they had the choice of an occupational pension scheme, they were persuaded to go for a personal pension without any company contribution. I do not condone that at all, and I recognise the need for compensation in all the relevant cases; but we must get the balance right. We must recognise the existence of many beneficiaries of the introduction of personal pensions, and its substantial contribution to the provision of pensions, improved living standards for many retired people, the encouragement of self-help and a reduction in what would otherwise be a much higher level of taxpayer-provided welfare benefits. The introduction of personal pensions is a positive development; it is the consequences of the mis-selling of a small proportion of the total that we must put right.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): According to the Financial Times, the latest estimate is that mis-selling will account for some £11 billion. How can the right hon. Gentleman describe that as a small proportion of the whole?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall come to the £11 billion later. My point is that, given the importance of personal pensions in the future and the need to attract many more people to them, the amount resulting from mis-selling will constitute a comparatively small part of the amount that must be raised. It should be remembered that the total value of the United Kingdom's pension fund industry—I know that that includes company pension schemes—is currently well over £600 billion.

Many companies were slow to embark on the pensions review, and did not recognise quite what enormous resources would be needed. That was clear to me when I first became involved. We must recognise that there will be a high cost—and here I refer not to compensation, but to complex administration.

The process is taking a long time, not just because potential beneficiaries do not always respond and organisations such as the national health service have, during the first stages, been slow to give details. It can take many hours of highly qualified work by those calculating the consequences of a single case of mis-selling to reach a conclusion. I have examined some cases myself. Qualified actuaries—including retired actuaries—often have to be brought in. I am very much aware of the effort expended by the company in which I was involved.

It is rather like the millennium and the computer industry, in that a whole new industry is being created in the short term to sort out the problems, with large salaries being paid. I make no complaint about that; I merely observe the phenomenon.

Other policy holders will often have to pay the cost. There is a balance to be struck there as well. As my hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) pointed out, those policy holders are innocent, and are looking forward to good pensions themselves. So we must exercise a sense of proportion in the future.

In the early stages, the regulatory bodies—especially the Securities and Investments Board—were slow to issue guidelines, and then kept changing them. To an extent they are still changing them, and that remains a problem for many companies. I understand that different life companies have been influenced by differing guidelines that they have received from regulatory bodies, which is adding to the confusion and uncertainty.

Against that background, let me make a specific point to the Economic Secretary. Just when it is crucial for the Government to create an atmosphere that encourages people to take out pensions, they are in danger of doing the reverse. Vilifying the industry makes consumers unwilling to consider the product. It is no good the Government saying that people should take out more pensions; an industry is needed to sell the pensions and to give appropriate advice, and if that industry retreats into its shell, or large parts of it disappear, the whole cause is badly served.

Mr. Kidney: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I am anxious to make progress, but I will give way once more.

Mr. Kidney: May I put the contrary view? How can the public have confidence in those who sell pensions until this whole unfortunate incident is put behind us? Does the right hon. Gentleman not agree that we need to crack on and finish the matter before there can be confidence in the industry?

Mr. MacGregor: That is precisely what I have been saying to the industry: that we must conclude the process as soon as possible. I think that that has almost happened with phase 1.

Let me make some positive suggestions. The first relates to phase 2. There are, I think, some issues to be revisited. As the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) implied, there is a danger that, if phase 2 lasts for a long time—it could well do so, given the way in which it is currently constructed—an image that is the opposite of what the Government want will persist for the next five years. Phase 2 is different from phase 1, in that it deals with different types of case and different types of person. It should not be subject to the heavy, costly, complex and time-consuming regime that affected phase 1.

There is a genuine difficulty, which needs to be resolved. Let me make two points. First, I think that it is worth looking again at the rebate-only cases. There cannot be much of a loss to individuals in such cases, because they made no extra contributions themselves. I have not had an opportunity to examine the losses in detail, but phase 2 involves many rebate-only cases; and I am not sure that, if they all had to be examined in detail and it was then found that the loss was de minimis, we would have achieved much of an objective.

Secondly—this was the point that I tried to make when I interrupted the Economic Secretary—we should look again at the assessment of loss. What should be considered are the conditions that obtained at the time the policy was taken out. Those conditions cannot be changed some years later. Let us suppose that I took out a life policy—as I have—and then found that we had moved into an era of low inflation and low interest rates. I would then receive a much smaller terminal bonus than I might have expected five years earlier, but that would be no reason for me to say that the policy had been mis-sold to me in the first place, or that I should be compensated for the fact that interest rates had fallen.

If the argument about loss is taken to extremes, the Government will start saying that the unit trust industry should be held responsible if at any time, when people cash in their unit trusts, they are worth less than they were two months or two years earlier. That is clearly absurd, but there is an element of it about the way in which loss has been calculated in relation to phase 2. My hon. Friend the Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford was quite right.

We now have low interest rates, low returns and low annuity rates. Let us suppose that a loss is being assessed now, 10 years after a policy was taken out. If the pension will not be paid for another 20 or 30 years—which, in many phase 2 cases, is quite likely—the person concerned is being compensated for a loss that may never actually happen, because the calculation was made at a particular time. It may be necessary to recalculate the whole thing two years later—because the programme is not finished—and it may then be found that the loss is no longer a loss. The Economic Secretary will have to address such problems.

Mr. Butterfill: Some cases were examined in 1995. It was discovered that those who had been sold the pensions were selling at a profit, in one instance a profit of £2,500. Because of changes in the market, however, that person is now shown as having suffered a £38,000 loss. Is that not ludicrous?

Mr. MacGregor: That is exactly the point that I am trying to make. There will have to be some way of dealing with the problem; otherwise there will be another scandal. It will be found that the whole matter was badly organised by the regulator, and by the Government.

Phase 1, of course, dealt with people who had retired or were close to retirement. In their case, the loss could be calculated, but that does not apply to most phase 2 cases.

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, with personal pensions, as well as financial considerations, two other benefits are to be taken into account? First, they are completely portable, and secondly, they allow for a 25-year retirement age. Many occupational pensions would not have those benefits. Should not that be taken into account when assessing their value?

Mr. MacGregor: Those are certainly some of the benefits of personal pensions. That is why it is right to go on making it clear that they have a large part to play.

In the whole of this regime, we do need the certainty of a set of guidelines that are laid down at the start and adhered to throughout the process. One of the difficulties has been that they have changed throughout the process and that many of the providers and IFAs—independent financial advisers—were not aware of what the guidelines were when they were operating their marketing.

Mr. Love: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sorry. I should go on.

We should avoid retrospective regulation; it is also important to ensure consistency throughout the whole regulatory system. If that is not done, my worry is this: there will be far fewer IFAs. The professional indemnity loss business that is coming through shows what the marketplace thinks about that. IFAs will be constantly at risk, including from people whose career changes may be significant, which may lead them to try to exploit the whole regime to the disadvantage, unfairly, of an IFA. IFAs will not have the resources to ensure that they can meet all regulatory requirements in future. That is why it is important to have certainty and a clear system from now on for them.

It would be a serious tragedy if there were a substantial reduction in the IFA industry. Of course, there are some poor operators in the industry—we all know that—but there are many genuine people who give good advice throughout, and that advice is needed by many of the people who should be taking up pensions.

I saw this particularly at London and Manchester, whose home service industry goes out and gives advice to people who would not otherwise think of taking out long-term savings. Recent independent market research shows how much that service is valued. If it disappears, something important disappears.

Incidentally, there is a danger in moving to exclusively multi-tied IFAs. I hope that the Government are not contemplating that because it would lead to a considerable loss of independence.

The next consequence will be that companies, both providers and IFAs, will concentrate on execution-only. That is already happening with Marks and Spencer's, Scottish Widows and many others, and it is driving a coach and horses through the regime.

It looked as though the Government were going to encourage execution-only in the low-cost stakeholder pension that they were going to introduce. Supposing those execution-only schemes did not give as good pension outcomes as those that were done with advice. Who is then guilty of the pension mis-selling scandal? The people who would be guilty would be the Government who had insisted on exclusively execution-only. That again shows the importance of recognising that advice is desirable; and that it comes at a cost, inevitably.

In many cases, the fact-finds that companies are undertaking through all their sales men will be counter-productive. They involve two long meetings and detailed reason-why letters. Often, it will simply be unprofitable to carry that process through. Why are the companies doing it? The answer is that they have to give themselves complete protection against any future, retrospective changes in the regulatory system. That, too, will lead to a diminution in the amount of pensions sold.

I recognise that the regulatory authorities—the Personal Investment Authority or Securities and Futures Authority, whichever it is—have a difficult job. I recognise that there has been mis-selling and we must avoid that, but we must ensure that we get the balance of the regime and phase 2 right because, at the moment, the risk is that the pendulum will swing too far in the other direction—which will be in no one's interests, least of all the Government's. The Government, like me, desire to see many more occupational pension schemes taken out and much more long-term saving. That is our objective, and we must ensure that we do not diminish or destroy it by an overburdensome and badly worked out regulatory regime.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I welcome this opportunity to introduce to the debate the need for personal pensions and how that fits in with the whole picture of personal pension misselling. The Ross report, which was commissioned by the Labour Government, makes it clear that there is a future for personal pensions, and recognises that it will always be true that personal pensions are not suitable for everyone and that the state continues to have a role. It recognises the continuing need for private-public partnerships in this sector, but also makes it clear that we must learn from the past; we must learn from the mistakes.

I tried to make the point in an intervention that what the previous Government had done to SERPS made it clear that some Government provisions were not free from Government interference. Therefore, if we want to encourage the public at large to provide for their retirement with confidence, we need far more robust vehicles in its place.

Pensions mis-selling—how did it come about? It started with encouraging people to opt out of SERPS. With hindsight, and in the light of actuarial assessment, the previous Government were somewhat too generous, certainly in the first 10 years, in the SERPS opt-out arrangements, which may have encouraged people to opt out who should not have opted out.

Similarly, when, in 1988, it was no longer compulsory to be part of an occupational pension scheme, that in many ways opened the floodgates for personal pension mis-selling. There was an argument that early leavers from occupational pensions paid too heavily, so that option should have been given, but the situation has been remedied to quite an extent.

What have we now? If my information is right, and I have no reason to doubt it, in this quarter, for the first time, the number of personal pensions being taken out has dipped, which is serious. Some people say that it is a sort of planning blight. Individuals are looking at where the Government are going with individual savings accounts and therefore holding back, but it shows a serious crisis of confidence in the insurance industry's performance.

Whose fault is mis-selling? It is interesting that the debate goes from greedy salesmen to insufficiently trained salesmen to the previous Government's hasty push of people into personal pensions, but no one suggests that it is the fault of policyholders; yet, when we look at who should pay for it, we ask the policyholders of the large companies to do so. The people who have the least fault in this fiasco are being asked to pay the bill. It is somewhat bizarre.

If an insurance company is owned by its shareholders, it is clear that, provided there is no with-profits policy in the company, the shareholders are involved in this. With mutuals, of course, it is the policyholders who have to pick up the whole bill, but one company is in a difficult position: the Prudential. It is a company with shareholders which also issues with-profit policies. That means that the return depends to some extent on the profits that are made by the company.

The Prudential is also the worst offender in terms of pension mis-selling. Last July, it had to increase its estimate of the cost of mis-selling from £450 million to £1.1 billion. It was suggested that, in the light of the whole size of the pension industry, that was not significant. I still suggest that for one company to run up a liability from mis-selling of £1.1 billion is extraordinary. Sir Peter Davis told the Treasury Select Committee that the mis-selling bill would be set against an estimated £12 billion surplus capital on its long-term life insurance fund. Of that £12 billion, about half is needed to meet policyholders' reasonable expectations.

In my innocence, I used to assume that, if I took out a with-profits policy with an insurance company, I got the profits made by that company. In fact, I get what that company's actuary deems to have been my reasonable expectation. It is a case of losing every which way. The figure involved for the Prudential was £12 billion. If one argues how much of that does not have to be met by reasonable expectations, the agreed figure is probably about £7 billion.

All that is rather quaintly called orphan assets. It is not clear who owns the orphan assets. This is beginning to remind me of a debate that was held in the late 1980s and early 1990s about who owned the surplus in occupational pension funds. It was the issue of the surplus in occupational pension funds that got me into politics, and I am beginning to suspect that orphan funds will keep me here.

Who owns the assets? The Consumers Association argues that the assets should be treated as an exercise of demutualisation, and that they should be paid out to the current shareholders or policyholders. I am reluctant to do that, because the orphan funds have been built up over generations, and they would be paid out over only one generation of fundholders.

There is a strong argument for the shareholders having access to the orphan funds. I understand that the Department of Trade and Industry is currently holding discussions with companies about what should be done with the funds. Alternatively, it could be left to the courts. It was ultimately the courts that decided that the surplus in occupational pensions should be seen as deferred pay. In that way, the matter was resolved.

What could companies do with the extra assets? They could pay extra dividends, help to fund acquisitions or help to expand the business. What is unacceptable is that the funds have been used to pay for pensions mis-selling. We are again asking those who have no responsibility to foot the bill.

I saw another problem when reading a press release from the Prudential insurance company. It refers to the company's appointed actuary. I understand that the duty of a company actuary is to represent the interests of the policyholders. The current Prudential actuary, Peter Nowell, has significant shareholdings and share options with the company. I believe that, even if declared, his interest as a shareholder is contrary to the interests of the policyholders. I ask the Institute of Actuaries to look at that because it is unsatisfactory.

Where do we go now? One of the largest and most respected companies is and continues to be one of the worst offenders. We have the unresolved situation of orphan funds being used to pay for the mis-selling, which is inappropriate. It is obvious that we need better and clearer information. We can look for benchmarking. If we look to see whether the insurance industry has learnt anything, the evidence is not encouraging.

A total of 1 million free-standing additional voluntary contributions have been sold, with an investment of about £4.5 billion. Recent newspaper reports suggest that we may be looking at compensation claims of up to £675 million, affecting some 50,000 to 70,000 people. How did free-standing AVCs come about? There were people in occupational pension schemes who could have paid AVCs into their own schemes, but who were encouraged to look at free-standing ones. It was argued that free-standing AVCs were preferable to company AVCs because of their portability, wide investment choices and privacy. They were also said to be convenient for people who move jobs.

In October 1998, Bacon and Woodrow said that the advantages of free-standing AVCs over in-house AVCs were "largely illusory". Something that was never mentioned on free-standing AVCs was that the salesman received commission. That was an unmentioned major advantage.

The major players in the selling of free-standing AVCs were Allied Dunbar, Pearl and Prudential. It was said earlier that companies making home visits may be thought to give better and more appropriate advice. That fact does not seem to be borne out if we look at the companies involved in free-standing AVCs. The companies that may be most implicated in selling inappropriate free-standing AVCs may be some of those companies making home visits.

Free-standing AVCs are not suitable for many people. For example, schemes such as those for the armed forces have high accrual rates, and those in the pension schemes quickly run up against Treasury limits. The industry feels that the area where one might find most mis-selling is where the trustees of a pension scheme have arrangements with a company to supply AVCs on special terms but the salesman does not pass on those special terms. The individual involved may have heard the name of a company and thought that it was a good deal without looking at the small print. I am not suggesting that the inappropriate sale of free-standing AVCs in any way comes close to pension mis-selling, but it is a clear indicator that the industry is not listening or learning.

The average return on an in-house AVC is 10 to 15 per cent. higher than for a free-standing AVC. Over 10 years, we could be talking about the equivalent of one year's premiums. So not only are the theoretical advantages largely illusory, but the financial returns do not come up to scratch. Any person considering free-standing AVCs in the future should be provided with clear information about how they compare with in-house AVCs. The trustees of occupational pension schemes could pay more attention to that issue, and provide clearer advice.

We are told that the industry is learning, that it is becoming more transparent and open. That has to happen if it is to deal with this. However, this week I saw a statement on personal pension PEPs from NPI. I compared it with a statement issued six months ago. The earlier statement was clear—it showed what was paid in, the current value and how the investment was performing. In fact, the returns on the policy involved meant that it was now worth less than the amount that had been paid in over 18 months.

Surprise, surprise, over the six months, the statement format had been changed. The categories and boxes had changed, and it took a great deal of leafing through to work out that the value had dropped. If we want to educate people so that they can make informed choices, we must be up front.

[Ms Gisela Stuart]

One of the biggest illusions about pensions is that there is a risk-free pension investment. Whether it is the Government, private industry or whatever, pensions involve risk. Unless we give people appropriate information, which we are not doing now, they cannot make choices on risk. The industry is still hiding facts from policyholders.

The Association of British Insurers came to talk to a group of Members of Parliament on occupational pension schemes. I questioned one of the representatives about the Which? report which had been published a week before. That report looked at 80 personal pensions, but found none of them satisfactory and would not recommend any of them. I asked the insurance industry for its response. I was told that the Which? criteria are phoney, and that the report made bizarre statements, such as that pensions would be a bad buy if cashed in within three years. I became angry, because it was on the very day that the Financial Times had run a huge article stating that 60 per cent. of personal pensions are cashed in within the first three years. Industry representatives therefore came to Parliament to talk to hon. Members about occupational pensions, and thought either that we do not read newspapers or that, if we do read them, we cannot match what we read with what we are being told. It shows the industry's unwillingness to be honest. Unless and until the industry is honest, there will be no faith in it.

Some pension companies have a worse track record than others in the number of policies issued for which payments are not up to date. Although I should not say that there is a direct relationship between track records on payments and the quality of advice given, it is interesting to note that Britannic Assurance, Old Mutual, Royal and Sun Alliance, Albany Life and United Assurance have a particularly high withdrawal rate in the first few years, because people stop paying in. Perhaps such high rates show that personal pensions were not the right policies for those people.

I very much hope that the Government's individual savings accounts will be a vehicle that allows people to build up assets. It has been interesting to see Opposition Members shake their heads and reject ISAs before the public have had a chance to give their verdict on them. Nevertheless, Radio 4 is running a wonderful competition to find a slogan to sell ISAs, and I should tell the House that the slogan "There is nothing nicer than a Government ISA" has been banned.

Where do we go from here? I think that it will increasingly be recognised that there will continue to be a public-private relationship in pension provision, and that the insurance industry has a significant part to play in it. It is no good the insurance industry continually assuring us that people trust their personal adviser but mistrust the industry. Such a statement tells me only that personal advisers individually are doing a good selling job. I think that people are right to mistrust the insurance industry.

There must be accountability and openness for people trying to build a personal pension. There must be a stage at which people of any age can ask, "How much have I built up? Will it pay for my old age? What are the likely returns?"

People must also be aware that investments are never safe, and that we take risks. However, the current system does not allow us to take risks. As there is an interesting selection of trustees of the parliamentary pension fund in the Chamber, I shall use myself as an example. Before deciding whether I should put everything into the parliamentary pension fund, I should know whether I will be re-elected. Therefore, in about three years, I will know what I should have done—which is clearly an unsatisfactory situation.

I welcome the Government's continued insistence on dealing with pensions mis-selling. However, some of the industry is still in denial and is not recognising its responsibility. Moreover, as events of the past few years have shown, the industry tries always to be one step ahead and just that little bit cleverer than everyone else. It must realise that it has to work within a very robust framework, which I hope the Government will create.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): It is somewhat intimidating to speak after two of the House's leading experts on pensions—the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) and the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart)—both of whom spoke eminently good sense in a non-doctrinal manner, leaving the rest of us with a rather reduced amount to say.

I should like to pursue the "who-who" question of who benefited from pensions mis-selling and who is now paying for it. It has been estimated that about £11 billion will have to be paid in compensation for pensions mis-selling, and it would be a useful exercise to trace where that £11 billion might have gone.

Four categories of people or institutions benefited from pensions mis-selling, the first of which—as the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) said in a couple of interventions—was composed of salesmen and executives. They benefited from mis-selling, but have fled the scene. Moreover, under the current regulation system, they were not liable for those transactions. They cannot be traced, and carry no personal liability for events.

The second set of beneficiaries comprises the companies, or some of them, that sold the pensions. They benefited from enhanced earnings, and therefore improved share prices and improved dividends. Nevertheless, there remains the fundamental question—which the hon. Member for Edgbaston pinpointed at the beginning of her speech—of where within companies the benefits accrued. Did they accrue to shareholders, or to current policyholders? Moreover, how should costs now be spread between those two groups? I shall return in a moment to the latter point.

Other groups of beneficiaries of pensions mis-selling have not been mentioned. One major group were employers generally. As employers did not have to make contributions, companies earned 5 to 12 per cent.—a large sum. Strangely, although we attach great stigma to those who gave bad or inadequate advice, it has never been suggested that employers in either the private or public sector were reprehensible for failing to warn employees of the cost of not maintaining their occupational pension scheme.

A fourth set of beneficiaries comprises occupational pensioners themselves. They have benefited from the fact that transfers out of occupational schemes were often made on very disadvantageous terms. Everyone with an occupational pension is therefore better off because of pensions mis-selling. They may not be aware of that benefit or feel a sense of guilt about it, and it is almost certainly impossible to trace them, but great income redistribution among pensioners has been occurring, for which there is no account.

The problem is that people in several of those categories can no longer be traced, so that the £11 billion cost will have to be paid by specific groups that can be identified and targeted. Although it is absolutely right that the Government should have aggressively pursued the compensation issue, and that pensioners should be compensated promptly when possible, as several hon. Members have already said, two specific categories have been forced to carry a disproportionate share of the costs.

One of those categories is independent financial advisers. Although I do not want to labour the point—my hon. Friend the Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) has the largest number of IFAs of any constituency and will speak later in the debate about that issue, which has already been clearly stated—IFAs are, in some but not necessarily all cases, being punished not for mis-selling but for lack of foresight, which is the crucial distinction. The only appropriate basis for compensation would be what an occupational pension scheme would have produced for the pensioner when the private pension was sold. That principle of compensation is not being observed.

As the hon. Member for Edgbaston eloquently said, the other category of people with whom we are concerned is current policyholders. Ministers have said that, as a matter of principle, within companies, shareholders should be carrying the cost burden of pensions mis-selling. However, it is not clear how the matter is being pursued, or whether the burden is being carried appropriately. It would be helpful if the Minister dealt with the matter in his reply.

I do not want unduly to delay the House, but I conclude with a couple of forward-looking conclusions. Although it is easy to be wise and virtuous in hindsight, the key issue for us is to determine what lessons we have learnt from the whole sorry escapade.

The first lesson should be the danger of dogma, and that a "one size fits all" approach to pensions was not right. Although personal pensions—which many of us have—were a good advance, and are appropriate for those who are occupationally mobile, they do not fit everyone, just as owner-occupation is not the only style of housing. I hope that we, and especially the previous Government, have learnt a lesson about such an approach.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Before the hon. Gentleman leaves the first conclusion, will he say whether he agrees that it suggests that, in pensions, CAT marking is no substitute for advice?

Dr. Cable: The hon. Gentleman is right. CAT marking creates an expectation, at least in some people's minds, that the Government stand behind a financial product. In 10 or 15 years, perhaps there will be people who believe that they have been sold products that had an implicit Government guarantee. We can all appreciate the dangers of that.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford has led me to my second and final comment. The conclusion that we should draw from the matter is that the principles underlying financial sector regulation are complicated. It is very difficult to strike the right balance between over-regulation and under-regulation. We have been through a phase when, arguably, financial services have been under-regulated, and the only relevant principle was caveat emptor. That is a correct principle, as people should be careful when they are buying, but we know what happens when that principle is dominant—there is dishonesty, and people lack the information to operate properly in the financial services market.

Now, however, there is a danger of lurching in the opposite direction, with the system becoming over-regulated so that products are priced out of the market, and providers do not offer new products. We have to get the balance right. That is why it is absolutely crucial to have legislation as soon as possible on financial services regulation. That will help us to understand whether the right lessons have been learnt and the right balance struck.

Mr. David Kidney (Stafford): As the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) said, we have heard a number of constructive speeches that have drawn on the lessons of the past and sought to apply them to the present and the future. Today's debate is particularly well timed as the Government are about to embark on some enormous policy changes. The first, which has been alluded to several times today, is the long-awaited Green Paper on pensions, setting out the next generation of pension policy for Britain. We are all looking forward to that important document, particularly to see whether it includes a new design of stakeholder pensions or citizenship pensions for those such as carers who are unable to make continuous contributions.

The second policy change, involving the new individual savings accounts or ISAs, starts next April and has also been mentioned in the debate. There are implications for ISAs as a result of pension mis-selling in the past.

The third development in the near future, to which the hon. Member for Twickenham referred at the end of his speech, is the draft legislation in respect of the Financial Services Authority. The hon. Gentleman looks forward to reading the Bill when it is published, but it will obviously be based on the draft Bill on which there is currently consultation.

Clearly, there are important lessons to be learned from how the regulations under the Financial Services Act 1986 operated when pensions were being mis-sold as to what should be in the next financial services and markets legislation.

Fourthly, I should mention almost as a footnote to the debate on pensions, that a draft Bill was published for consultation over the summer on pension sharing between spouses when marriages break down and how existing pensions should be split.

For all those reasons the timing of the debate is most apposite. However, for the Treasury Select Committee on which I am pleased to serve, the timing of the debate is slightly awry. As hon. Members will see from the Order Paper, although the minutes of evidence from hearings held over the summer are available to inform today's debate, the Select Committee report has not yet been published. Perhaps hon. Members will take it as a plug that the report will be produced very shortly. I hasten to add that what I say now is entirely my own view and not the view of the Treasury Select Committee or the contents of its report.

The value of the debate lies not in the apportionment of blame, although I am happy that many hon. Members accept that things went wrong and that there are lessons to be learnt. Rather it is to face up honestly to what went wrong and to identify the lessons to be learnt so that we can avoid making the same mistakes again and anticipate offshoots of those mistakes arising in future.

It is helpful, however, to ask what went wrong and to say, as my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury did, that between 1988 and 1994 some 5 million personal pensions were sold in Britain. Astonishingly, more than 2 million of them need to be reviewed for the possibility of mis-selling.

What is meant by mis-selling? According to current regulations, three criteria have to apply. First, did the seller breach a regulation requirement at the time of the transaction? In other words, was there a compliance fault? Secondly, has the buyer suffered a loss? Thirdly, was that loss caused by the seller's compliance fault? If the answer to all those questions is yes, it can be said that the pension has been mis-sold.

So how did buyers lose out? Overwhelmingly, as the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) pointed out, the problem affected people who were persuaded to opt out or not to join or to transfer away from an occupational pension scheme, thereby usually losing the benefit of employers' contributions. The Financial Services Authority estimates that about 1.4 million personal pensions sold at that time will be found to have been mis-sold at a total cost to the financial service industry of a massive £11 billion, including the compensation paid to individuals who were mis-sold pensions and the administrative costs to the companies involved.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) mentioned the actuaries Bacon and Woodrow, who estimated total costs of £22 billion, but most in the industry have difficulty with that estimate.

On the subject of what went wrong, one has to ask where the regulators were. As Opposition Members have said, there were regulators who visited premises and inspected paperwork, yet between 1988 and 1991 when mis-selling was at its height, we heard not a word from the regulators. When research disclosed that mis-selling was taking place on a huge scale across the entire country and the regulators announced that there would be action, which eventually comprised a review with a deadline of 1996, nearly everyone missed the deadline. Phase 1 of the review should have been completed by the end of December 1996, but at that time hardly anyone had started the process. It is now likely that phase 1 will be completed by the end of this year—two years late—and only then will phase 2 reviews start.

It is also important to recognise that the buyers who were mis-sold pensions were not the only ones affected, but that a great wrong was done to the reputation of Britain's financial services sector—in which we all take pride—as a world-beater. The industry has certainly been damaged. It is vital to complete the review, pay the compensation, learn the lessons and then to move on.

Although we are studiously avoiding apportioning blame, it is important in learning the lessons to see how the candidates for villain performed during the period in question. I intend to go through the cast of the Government of the day, the regulators, the insurance companies and their sales teams and the independent financial advisers.

It was clearly the policy of the Government of the day at the time of the Social Security Act 1986 to shift large numbers of people from the state earnings-related pension scheme to personal pensions. Apparently, there was the attraction of cost-free pensions paid for by national insurance rebates topped up in order to look as though they would represent a better deal than SERPS. In addition to the policy aim of persuading people to leave SERPS, there was an expensive advertising campaign to persuade people to do so. I refer the House to an excellent debate on the subject on 10 May 1995 when the present Minister of State for Social Security, my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham), made an excellent speech that still reads well today and was extremely prescient. I should like to borrow one reference that he made to a memorable advertisement of the day, which showed someone tied up in chains upside down, representing their existing pension provision. The advertisement said of the new personal pensions:

"employees will be able to choose their own Personal Pension scheme instead of staying in SERPS or an employer's pension scheme."

I accept that the Government of the day did not intend that people should be mis-sold personal pensions. It is a valid policy to want to persuade people to leave SERPS and take out personal pensions, but the unintended consequence was that lots of people were persuaded to leave occupational pension schemes in which they were well off and take out personal pensions instead.

Mr. Butterfill: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman recognises that there were occupational pension schemes in which people were not particularly well off or that were not suitable for them. It is wrong to suggest that everybody would have been better off remaining in an occupational scheme.

Mr. Kidney: I gladly accept that. When I was explaining how people made a loss I said that it was mostly those who left occupational schemes to which their employer had made a contribution. I accept that there were advantages for some people in having a personal pension rather than being in their employer's occupational scheme.

The final accusation against the Government of the day is that they set the regulatory framework that was intended to police the selling of pensions. The Financial Services Act 1986 established a mix of agencies and self-regulatory organisations—nine in all—which overlapped in some areas and left gaps in others on the policing of pension selling.

I shall now leave the charge list against the Government of the day and move on to the regulators. As Opposition Members have already said, every year the regulators made their checks of independent financial advisers and companies that were selling personal pensions, looking through their paperwork and making spot checks, and apparently found nothing to comment on, even though it is clear that there was an immense amount of pension mis-selling at the time. That is a clear failure on the part of the regulators. They failed to work in concert, resulting in overlaps and gaps in consumer protection. One memorable occasion was in 1994 when the Securities and Investments Board eventually issued its guidance, leaving the SROs to promulgate it as rules. The SROs took a further six months to convert the guidance into rules to be enforced.

Mr. Greenway: I commend the hon. Gentleman on the accuracy of his trawl through what went wrong. I know of one firm regulated by the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation that was commended in the late 1980s and had its records described as exemplary. In the post-1994 regime, even though it took time to get going, the firm was fined £200,000 for the same records.

Mr. Kidney: I thank the hon. Gentleman for illustrating my point. I do not encourage him to take that argument too far, because the Government of the day established the regulators. When research disclosed that there was a problem and the regulators finally swung into action to stem the problem, they took years to bring matters to a conclusion—indeed, we have not yet seen the conclusion. I remind the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) that the Government of the day did not give the regulators the power to impose fines on individuals, such as directors of companies, found guilty of mis-selling pensions.

I turn now to insurance companies and their sales teams. Did an unhealthy dependence on commission payments from employers to employees contribute to the problem? Employers paid by results, paying only for sales achieved. There was pressure on employees to complete sales because their pay depended on it. How did the companies check what their sellers were doing in their name and on their behalf? Where were the internal checks on compliance?

Mr. Laurence Robertson: The hon. Gentleman describes the employment of salesmen in those days. He will recall that they were often not employed at all, but were self-employed. That was legal. Does that not suggest that the conditions under which pensions were sold in those days were very different from the conditions now?

Mr. Kidney: I accept that. One of my hon. Friends who is no longer in the Chamber earlier made a compelling point about redundant coal miners who were trained and sent out. I accept that some of them were employees and others were classed as self-employed for taxation purposes. They had so much difficulty earning their commission that they had loans to tide them over. That would have been an added pressure to make sales.

The last charge against the insurance companies is that they were slow to respond to the regulator's requirements for a review. In recent years whacking great fines have been imposed on the companies—not the directors, of course—for missing deadlines that were imposed on them.

The last group in the cast are the independent financial advisers. I am a fan of IFAs and have a great deal of sympathy for their difficulties. I have met IFAs in my constituency to talk about the phase 2 review. IFAs claim that they are responsible for half the sales of personal pensions. Some of those pensions have been found to have been mis-sold. However, their share of mis-sold pensions is very modest compared with the insurance companies.

IFAs complained that there was not sufficiently detailed guidance in the rules when they made the sales, but they pride themselves on being—and advertise themselves as—the givers of best advice. It ill behoves them to complain if their advice sometimes fell below that standard.

Some IFAs have been slow to respond to the request for reviews of their cases. Had there not been such a delay in dealing with the reviews, they might have found that the cost of paying the compensation years earlier would have been less. I shall not go as far as my right hon. Friend the Member for Airdrie and Shotts (Mrs. Liddell), the former Economic Secretary to the Treasury, in calling them laggards, but I support the initiative that she took immediately on arriving in that post in calling in the major players in pensions mis-selling and laying it on the line to them that the Government intended to see the end of the episode.

What lessons can we learn from those experiences? I should like to take us through some of the same cast. The first lesson for the Government is to have clear policy objectives.

The Government of the day must also show sufficient competence in putting their policy objectives into effect, so as to avoid unwanted and unexpected side-effects. The third lesson for the Government is that it is their responsibility to set an effective regulatory framework for those objectives.

Curiously, the Financial Services Authority is carrying out much of its work of regulation under a set of contractual arrangements with the existing regulators, because the statutory backing for its activities is not yet in place. The first lesson for the regulator is that it must have the clear chief objective of protecting consumers. We shall return to that subject when we debate the Bill that will put the FSA on a statutory footing, but as things stand it is noticeable that several of its objectives appear to have equal standing, so there is a danger that priorities will become confused. The number one objective, at the top of the list, must be the protection of consumers.

Secondly, the FSA must have the flexibility to adjust to changing markets and new products. It is important that once the Government have legislated, there is sufficient ability, in terms of rule-making and secondary legislation, to move on from time to time and keep pace with the fast-developing market in financial services.

My third point for the regulators has already been commented upon several times. The authority needs the power to hit where it hurts, and to hit those whom it should hurt. Compensation must be ordered to be paid by those who should pay, such as companies whose shareholders stand their loss. The authority should also be able to impose fines on those responsible, including directors and controllers of the activities of individuals. It should be able to withdraw authorisation from those who repeatedly breach the regulatory requirements.

My final point in examining the lessons to be learnt by individual organisations is that the insurance companies need to review their policies on payment by commission. It is not for the Government to tell insurance companies how to reward their staff, but it would be right for the

[Mr. Kidney]

FSA to say that it wanted to know precisely how they intended to do so. If there appeared to be an unhealthy reliance on commission in making up a reasonable salary for employees, it would be fair for everyone to expect the authority to pay closer attention to the activities of such a sales force. If pensions mis-selling were then found, it would be fair to expect fines to be imposed and compensation ordered. Such an approach would make most companies think carefully about the proportion of pay made up of commission.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston said, insurance companies must also learn the lessons of what has gone wrong, and put in place proper internal compliance processes to check what their staff are doing—in their name—in the street and in people's homes.

My third point for insurance companies is that it is vital for them to pay more attention to persistency rates—to how long the pension policies that they sell last. It is good business for companies to want to follow up the sales of their pensions by going back to customers and checking whether their needs have changed, and if so, selling them more business. They would then have more contented customers, who would pass on the company's name to their friends and families.

There are three further issues, all of which have been mentioned by previous speakers. The first is that of kitemarking, benchmarking or CAT standards—CAT standing for charges, access, terms.

Ms Stuart: I urge my hon. Friend to draw a clear distinction between kitemarking and benchmarking. They are different, and one may be less desirable than the other.

Mr. Kidney: I shall gladly do so.

The second issue is consumer education, and the third is companies' so-called orphan funds.

I have come to the conclusion that kitemarking would be an unwise and unsafe development in personal pensions selling. Every personal pension needs to be tailored to the needs of the individual who buys it, and I do not see how kitemarks can assure buyers that the product suits their personal circumstances. If a product carries the kitemark, there is a danger that it may lead some people to believe that they have been given such an assurance.

Benchmarking is the other side of the coin. We want to see some kind of comparison between the products of different providers. The problem is that each provider devises its own brand of product. Sometimes it seems that providers go out of their way to devise a product, and the information that they give out about it, so as to prevent comparisons between their product and someone else's.

One challenge for the new FSA will be to work for more common standards between financial services products, to enable consumers to make informed comparisons. In furtherance of that aim, CAT standards may have a part to play in the debate. If there could be minimum components of a product, which people could be sure about, that might be of some help to consumers. It could go some way towards answering the Consumers Association's call for the new system to be a regulation of products rather than of the processes by which the products are sold.

That brings me neatly to the subject of consumer education. As the hon. Member for Twickenham said, all buyers have some responsibility to take care to ensure that the product that they buy is of some value to them. That responsibility is so well established that it still has its Latin tag—caveat emptor, or let the buyer beware.

However, buying pensions is a serious business, and I am not entirely sure that most of the public, including many hon. Members, have a full understanding of the pensions industry. We shall not be able to say to consumers, "You must take more care to inform yourselves about what pensions are available in the market," unless we also make the sellers of pension policies put their cards on the table and reveal precisely what their products mean.

That comes back to the point that I made earlier about common information and common standards, which would enable comparisons to be made. There is a role here for the Financial Services Authority, and it is more than policing the small print; it is promoting the kind of public debate that will encourage a greater understanding of the products between which people are being asked to choose.

Finally, we come to orphan funds. Companies are paying out billions of pounds in compensation, but where do the costs fall? Do they fall on shareholders or on the contributions made by other policyholders? Overwhelmingly, at present, it is other policyholders who pay.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston said, policyholders pay their premiums and expect their money to be invested for their benefit—but they may find that it is going to pay compensation to other policyholders instead. How can that be? Companies have amassed funds bigger than the sum that would be needed to satisfy the reasonable expectations of existing policyholders. Excess funds have built up over the years which are now being used to pay the compensation.

There is no legislative definition of what "reasonable expectations" means. There is no record of any Government intervening to disagree with a company's decision about what those "reasonable expectations" are. However, I concede immediately that every company must have a company actuary to defend the policyholders' fund, and the Government have an actuary who is available to be consulted by the company actuary about the "reasonable expectations". I believe that policyholders deserve their own champion—someone with a higher profile than those actuaries and with tougher powers to intervene.

It is a matter of intergenerational fairness—as the Chancellor of the Exchequer said in last year's Budget statement—that we solve the problem, once and for all. In the case of Prudential, the problem has gone on for 150 years. How many more years will it take before we grasp that nettle?

In summary, the pensions business has been through a decade of disaster. Innocent consumers—in their hundreds of thousands—have been sold pensions that have caused them loss. We are now many years later on, and more of those innocent buyers are still waiting for compensation than have received it. It is a stain on the reputation of the British financial services industry, and I hope that we, the legislators, will face the failings of the past 10 years honestly and fully.

As we prepare for a new pensions settlement and one powerful regulator for all financial services, it is essential that we learn the lessons of this dismal record. Only in this way can we look forward with confidence to a clean and efficient market in financial services for the next decade—nay, the next millennium.

Mr. Quentin Davies: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Twice now, in an otherwise extremely well-informed and excellent debate, an hon. Member, having delivered a speech, has simply walked out of the Chamber without waiting to listen to the successor speech. On one occasion, it so happens that it was a Labour Member—on the other, it was a Liberal Democrat Member. I take the liberty of drawing this to your attention, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because there is a general feeling that it would be a great pity if what is not merely a long-standing courtesy of the House of Commons, but also an essential aspect of the very notion of debate should be eroded without its being at all remarked upon.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not officially a matter for the Chair—it is a convention of the House. However, I have made it known privately that I feel that hon. Members should listen to the following speeches if they have taken part in the debate—particularly when they have been called early. It is bad manners not to do so.

Mr. Kidney: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I make it clear that the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) is not referring to me? I have not left the Chamber, and I have no plans to do so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is known that that is not so.

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) indicated to me why he would have to leave, so he did extend that courtesy to this side of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. My memory has returned. The hon. Member for Twickenham did mention to me that because of the debate on the pre-Budget statement, he would be going to a television studio. The point made by the hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) is on the record, and it should not be the practice of hon. Members to leave the Chamber after making a speech.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): It is very rare—perhaps, unfortunately, all too rare—that I find that I agree with almost every word spoken by Labour Members. The speeches from the hon. Members for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) and for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) have been quite outstanding and extremely well informed.

I speak as the chairman of the all-party group on occupational pensions, a position I have held for some years. I should declare that, for some years, I was an adviser to the British Insurance and Investment Brokers Association and the Independent Financial Advisers Association. I am also one of the trustees of the parliamentary pension fund. I have taken a long-standing interest in these matters; indeed, I am one of the guilty men who served on the Committee discussing the Financial Services Act 1986.

It is perhaps worth saying that we should take a broad view of the situation as it relates to pensions in the UK. It is true that we now enjoy a much more favourable position than almost any other country in the world in terms of the proportion of money in pensions savings. We now have more pensions savings than those accrued in the rest of the EU.

To a great extent that is due to the policies of the previous Government, who gave great encouragement to the acquisition of personal pensions and to savings in general. Although we are now debating a very serious issue—the mis-selling of personal pensions—it would be wrong to assume that, overall, the actions taken by the previous Government to encourage personal pensions have not contributed tremendously to our national well-being. We should put the problem in that perspective.

There has been a lot of criticism of the Financial Services Act 1986, which has all sorts of deficiencies—some of which I pointed out at the time of its enactment. However, it is also true that we would not be having this debate about mis-selling if the previous Government had not created the offence of mis-selling. It would not exist but for that Act. In most other western countries—and most other countries in the EU—the offence does not exist.

Ms Stuart: That reminds me of Mr. Al Fayed saying that had it not been for his honesty, the whole affair of his trying to bribe a Member of Parliament would not have come to light. It is disingenuous of the hon. Gentleman to say that had it not been for the mis-selling, the previous Government would not have set up that wonderful organisation which made that practice an offence.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Lady may have misheard me. I said that there would not be an offence had it not been for the legislation. In many EU countries, there is no such legislation, and what we are debating would not be considered an offence in most other countries. That fact does not excuse what took place, which was disgraceful, and I condemn it unreservedly. For all the faults in the legislation—and there were many—it was well intentioned and went a long way towards controlling a problem which could have been a good deal worse.

I was very much opposed to the multiplicity of regulators listed in the 1986 legislation. I made several speeches on that subject and argued that because there were far too many, that could lead to regulatory arbitrage—as, indeed, it did. The idea that we should have so many different bodies—including the Securities and Investments Board regulatory organisation itself—was a farce because people chose to be regulated by the regulator they thought would give them the easiest time.

That was wrong, and part of the industry is to blame. The large direct sellers said that they were highly respectable and would not need regulation. They would accept the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation or the Life Assurance and Unit Trust Regulatory Organisation, but they wanted nothing to do with the rag, tag and bobtail that could be shoved into the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Association.

It is extraordinary to note that the mis-selling which occurred under FIMBRA—the most underfunded regulator with the least resources and the greatest potential problems—was a great deal less than that conducted by those who were regulated by LAUTRO and IMRO, yet they were supposed to be highly respectable people who did not need regulating. At least that is what they told us when some of us went to see them.

We need to put the matter in perspective. First, I wish to deal with the direct sellers—the very large companies that said that they did not need regulation because they were all so respectable. They were clearly the worst offenders. That is not surprising because, as the hon. Member for Stafford pointed out, they engaged in much high-commission activity. Indeed, many indulged in commission-only sales, so they did not have employees as such, but people who could not eat unless they sold yet another product. People employed in such a way are hungry to sell and do not necessarily act in the best interests of the person to whom they are selling. I have made many speeches to the industry and in the House on that subject and have been a consistent opponent of high-commission and commission-only sales, which inevitably tempt salesmen into abuses. That is exactly what happened.

Labour Members have asked who pays. Their answer was right, as in most cases the policyholder pays—the people who bought the product. I declare an interest as I have two personal pension policies and I will be paying. In the case of the mutuals, no one else but the policyholders will be paying. Fortunately, the mutuals—I am a great admirer and supporter of mutuality—were less active in mis-selling than the proprietary sellers. Nevertheless, the mutuals engaged in it and to that extent their members will suffer as a result.

In the case of the proprietaries, the hon. Member for Edgbaston was right to point out there is a problem with who pays, and whether some people should be paid from orphan funds. My view is that those funds should exist to even out variations in the market. Surely their purpose is to act as a reserve. The market can change rapidly—we have seen tremendous changes recently. In some cases, the policyholder may be looking for a lump sum on maturity to repay a mortgage, but because of a downturn in market conditions there may be insufficient funds to meet his or her expectations. Presumably he was sold the product on the basis that it would generate sufficient funds to repay the mortgage. Therefore, to the extent that the orphan funds exist, surely one of their primary purposes ought to be to contribute towards bonuses in lean times. They could be built up again when times are better. The idea that such funds should be paid out willy-nilly to shareholders has been promoted in some quarters—notably by the Prudential—but should be resisted at all costs.

Ms Stuart: The problem with orphan funds is not merely excess profits but policies that have not been cashed in and have accumulated. In the Prudential's case we are talking about £5 billion to £7 billion, which is a significant sum. The question is, should one generation benefit from what has been accumulated over several generations? Clearly, the funds are not being used to even things out at the moment. They are being used as a nest egg for when times are bad. When times are good they do not pay out.

Mr. Butterfill: I entirely agree. That was the point that I was trying to make. The funds should be used to smooth things out and to meet the reasonable expectations of policyholders. That is what the actuary is supposed to ensure, but there seems to be a risk that that is not what the Prudential intends to do.

Mr. Greenway: Surely the point is that the so-called orphan funds exist in the large insurance companies. Those are the funds that will be used to pay the compensation and that is what is happening. Whether they should be deployed in that way or more fairly, the fact is that the companies have huge resources with which to pay. The central point as regards the current controversy is that the independent financial advisory sector has no such resource. It has professional indemnity insurance, the market for which is about to collapse.

Mr. Butterfill: My hon. Friend is, as ever, extremely well informed on these matters and I agree about the difference between the proprietary funds and IFAs. He is right to be concerned about the use of orphan funds for that purpose. If the directors of such companies condoned significant mis-selling for the benefit of their shareholders, those shareholders should suffer and may then exact their retribution from those who acted in that way. That is the proper and reasonable way to deal with the problem, rather than by raiding funds that have built up for generations.

I am concerned that the problem has been made worse by some of the Government's actions. The advance corporation tax changes were an enormous raid on the pension funds. Various estimates have been made of the cost of pensions mis-selling. The Association of British Insurers estimates that it is between £8 billion and £11 billion. Even if we take the upper range, that sum would be equalled in two years by the £5 billion a year raid that the Government have made on pension funds. Let us get the picture in perspective. The biggest raiders of pension funds are on the Labour Benches. It has been suggested that the Chancellor may tax lump sums, not to mention higher rate relief. If he did so, people who rely on products to pay their mortgages would be in even greater difficulties than some of them are already.

I am astonished at the crocodile tears shed by those on the Treasury Bench. The Government are abandoning the proposal of the former Minister of State at the Department of Social Security, the right hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), for second-tier pensions and taking steps to attack the entire industry for short-term profit for the Chancellor, yet they express such great concern about pensions mis-selling. They are right to express concern, but let us put their actions in context.

The Economic Secretary made an astonishing attack on IFAs which was not justified. That is not to say that some IFAs have not misbehaved. Of course, some of them mis-sold pensions and I hope that those who did so deliberately and blatantly and who were wholly motivated by greed will not be able to practise as IFAs again. However, there are some greyer areas. Perhaps, those advisers may not have undertaken the full fact find, or they may have missed something that they ought to have noticed when giving best advice. If it was an innocent or careless mistake, the penalties should not be as great. Those who deliberately sold to people who had no means of knowing that the advice that they were being given was wrong and who encouraged people to leave occupational schemes knowing that that would be grotesquely to their disadvantage should never practise as independent financial advisers again.

We must consider the record of independent financial advisers. The initial report by KPMG clearly showed that IFAs engaged in less mis-selling than direct sellers—the product providers. I did not find that altogether surprising, as they were professionals and were bound to make comparisons between one product and another, however inadequate those comparisons might have been.

If we look at the results of phase 1, we find that 86 per cent. of the mis-selling was by the direct sellers—the product providers—and only 14 per cent. of the mis-selling is attributable to IFAs, despite the fact that IFAs sold 42 per cent. of the products concerned. The incidence of mis-selling by IFAs is a tiny fraction of the incidence of mis-selling by product providers. For the hon. Lady to portray IFAs as the villains of the piece was to distort the truth a little too much.

Ms Hewitt: Does the hon. Gentleman accept, and will he make it clear for the record, that my remarks referred primarily to the campaign being run by the IFA Association, and were not, as I made clear to the House, directed at every IFA?

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful to the Economic Secretary for that clarification, although it does not take us much further. In my experience—she will know that I have been involved in the industry for some years—the IFA Association has probably done more to raise standards among IFAs than almost any other body that one can imagine. Of course the IFAA is a trade association and will seek to defend its members. It would not be doing its duty by its members unless it did so.

Let us examine some of the hon. Lady's accusations. First, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) said, IFAs do not have the cash that is instantly available to the direct sellers. Secondly, the hon. Lady said that the IFAs went to court against the regulators, as though that was some appalling act. They went to court to establish whether it should be possible for the regulator to require them to go back to people who had not complained and ask to investigate the possibility that they had mis-sold a product.

That would be in direct contravention of the terms under which the IFAs were insured for professional indemnity. The hon. Lady knows that it was the professional indemnity insurers who were telling the IFAs that they would be in breach of contract if they behaved in that way. The only way for the IFAs to resolve that through the IFA Association was to seek a court ruling, otherwise they would be caught between a rock and a hard place.

The IFAs did not go to court to avoid co-operating in the review or to delay the process. They went to court to clarify their legal position because they had been put in an impossible situation by the demands of the regulator. That does not seem an unreasonable way to behave. They need to clarify the matter, as the underwriters of their professional indemnity cover are saying, "We are in an impossible position. We will be asked to pay out on terms that are clearly in breach of the contract between you, the IFA, and us, the underwriters."

The underwriters are either refusing to give cover, which means that some IFAs cannot legally operate because they cannot get PI cover, or the underwriters are quoting such huge premiums that it is impossible for the IFA to operate. That is continuing problem which must be addressed by the hon. Lady and the regulator, in consultation with the IFAs, if IFAs are to continue to operate in the market. Clearly, as the IFAs were the least guilty of mis-selling, it is in the overwhelming interest of the public that independent advice should be available. I appeal to the hon. Lady to deal with this issue, which is vital for the industry.

The second problem, which I shall not labour as previous speakers have outlined it, is the basis of compensation. It has always been maintained in our courts that if someone has suffered damage, the measure of damages is his actual loss, as far as it can be quantified, and it is the loss at the time that the loss occurred, not the notional loss some years later.

Mr. Kidney rose—

Mr. Butterfill: I give way to the learned gentleman.

Mr. Kidney: Indeed, I was a lawyer before I came to this place, so may I tell the hon. Gentleman that the assessment of loss in a civil case is carried out at the time of the hearing, not at the time that the wrong was committed, which might have been many years earlier? That makes sense; otherwise courts would be in the absurd position of awarding sums of money that were completely wrong—far too large or far too small.

Mr. Butterfill: The hon. Gentleman is partly right. The assessment of loss takes place at the time of the hearing, but the object is to put the plaintiff back in the position that he would have been in if the wrong had not been done. That is not what is being proposed. The present proposal is that there should be the benefit of hindsight and that the loss should be assessed regardless of the fact that the economic circumstances have changed—in particular, the yield on annuities has changed dramatically.

The calculation of loss is a moving target, which changes enormously depending on the date chosen to assess the loss. As I mentioned earlier, in one case the policyholder would have been £2,500 better off in 1995, but because of the changes in the annuity market since then, he is now facing a £38,000 notional loss. If he gets that money, he will be substantially better off than he would have been if he had never bought the policy. Indeed, he was better off buying the policy in the first place.

I am not sure that we should enrich people by giving them the benefit of the hindsight that we would all like to have. We would all like to own something that we could have bought, had we had the necessary information five years ago. That is surely not what the Government intend as the basis for compensation.

[Mr. Butterfill]

Several leading actuaries have examined the issue and concluded that if we proceed as the Government and the regulator propose, a large number of people will be significantly better off than they could have been if they had not taken out a particular pensions policy. As the funds of the other policyholders will generally cover the cost of compensation, we would be rewarding one group of policyholders at the expense of another, with no real justification for doing so.

The Economic Secretary referred to the PASS initiative, which was welcome. It has assisted many IFAs to deal with the problem, but I understand that that is confined to phase 1. Phase 2 is a more difficult problem because the numbers involved are much greater. That means that the cost of carrying out all the investigations in phase 2 will be much greater, although the likelihood of mis-selling is proportionately much smaller, because the people to whom the products were sold were a great deal younger. The maximum cost will be passed on to IFAs for a much lower benefit to those who may have been mis-sold a pensions policy.

I intend to press the Economic Secretary on the issue of mis-selling. A significant group of IFAs have got through phase 1 and it has been shown that they were not involved in any cases of mis-selling in phase 1.

Mr. Greenway: Or very few.

Mr. Butterfill: As my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale says from a sedentary position, other IFAs were involved in a few cases of mis-selling. I am particularly concerned about those companies against whom there are no complaints of mis-selling. They will be required to sift through their entire portfolio of sales for the past 10 years at enormous cost—£600,000, on average. That is a colossal sum for some small firms. One IFA told me that it would take his whole staff three years to complete the process. He said that they would not be able to do any other work and that the company would go bust but for the fact that he was prepared to support it financially through the process. This exercise will drive an enormous number of IFAs out of business when there is little likelihood of mis-selling having been proven.

It would surely be correct in phase 2 to say that, if there are no complaints about potential mis-selling and if there has clearly been no mis-selling in phase 1, the test should be different. Will the Minister agree to the proposition that the Government should reimburse IFAs for the cost of the process if no evidence of mis-selling is found? That is another possibility: the Government could compensate IFAs for having impugned their professional integrity. I doubt that that proposition will be attractive to the hon. Lady, but it is one that I postulate.

I am very worried about the Government's attitude to this issue. They have demonstrated an extremely aggressive attitude towards IFAs, who have been the least guilty parties in this process by a considerable margin—86 per cent. compared with 14 per cent. That aggressive attitude leads one to believe—and my suspicions are reinforced by personal conversations that I have had with Treasury officials—that the Government do not care about the IFA market. They think that IFAs are a bit of a nuisance and would sooner that the public dealt with direct sellers—we know that some of them are cronies of the Prime Minister—particularly if they happened to be selling kite, CAT or some other product.

I am concerned that the Government are exhibiting a cavalier attitude towards IFAs. I am equally concerned about the principle of kitemarking, which could lead to more mis-selling. I am particularly worried also about the possible abandonment of polarisation. I have long held the view—I argued to this effect in 1986 when we were considering whether there should be hybrids in terms of sales—that the public must know the status of the person selling the pensions. People must know if they are talking to a tied salesperson who can put his hand on his heart and say, "I am telling you what I am telling you, but I am the paid sales representative of company X". In those circumstances, people would know exactly where they were and how much weight to put upon his or her advice.

When people deal with IFAs, they know that IFAs should—if they are doing their job properly—look at the whole range of the market, identify the product that is best for the individual and make an informed expert choice on the customer's behalf. If we have a hybrid situation, whereby people sell the products of five or six companies, sellers are neither IFAs nor single tied agents. Let us look at the situation where hybrids exist. In Australia, for example, the results have been disastrous. A small group of hybrid sales organisations now dominate that market. They are very large, they have forced everyone else out and there is no expert information available to consumers. That toleration of hybrid sales is one of the reasons why there has been more mis-selling of pension products in Australia than anywhere else.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): There has been remarkable consensus and great expertise displayed in the debate so far. I plan to continue the former, but I doubt that I can add to the latter. There is not a great deal left to say about this subject, and I sympathise with the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) who commented much earlier in the debate that all the issues had been covered.

However, in talking about the problems that have arisen as a result of the changes introduced by the Conservative Government, it is important to dwell briefly on the impetus for that change. I was one of those who pushed very hard to open the whole pensions issue. Pension transfer values were diabolical: if one's career was not entirely in one company, one was ripped off completely when it came to pensions transfers. We needed to open up the market so that people could provide for themselves. In fact, more and more people were becoming financially astute and wished to provide for themselves.

I think that the impetus for change in the pensions area has benefited this country—as is recognised by the £600 billion under management, which, as has been pointed out, is the largest sum by a long chalk in the whole European Union. It will cushion us against potential problems that could arise as a result of the greying of the population—which was another impetus for changing the whole pensions regime.

As so much money has gone into the pensions industry in the form of savings, I must take issue with the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney), who described the past 10 years as a "decade of disaster". Eleven billion pounds is a huge sum, but I think that we should put the matter in perspective and compare it with the £600 billion that is under management.

Angela Knight, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury under the previous Government, was a very valuable member of the House and she did much to encourage financial companies to focus on and address the pensions mis-selling issue. I am concerned that, when Labour came to government, it raised the temperature by criticising the very companies that it is looking to to provide second pensions and ISA products. That sort of aggressive relationship with the private financial sector does not help when the Government are clearly relying on it to supply new products.

As many hon. Members have said, it is recognised that there are problems in the pensions area. I shall not repeat them all, other than to say that that problem is recognised in the biggest and the smallest companies. An insurance broker in Beckenham, who briefed me about the problem as it relates to his company, acknowledged in a letter to me that files

"must be reviewed and where losses have occurred as a result of advice given not to join occupational pension schemes then redress should be available. Likewise where members have been opted out of their employer scheme and losses occurred as a result redress should be given."

There is agreement throughout the industry that the matter must be dealt with, and I am pleased that phase 1 will be completed, in essence, by the end of the year.

As many hon. Members have said, the bone of contention lies with phase 2. I am struck by the role that hindsight has played in this debate. It is clear, with hindsight, that there should have been a much tighter regulatory regime and that we should have examined the financing arrangements much more closely. Hindsight is a wonderful thing, but the problem is that we are dealing with the real world, real people and the real circumstances that prevailed when they bought their pensions.

The Economic Secretary, if I understood her correctly, said that the regulatory regime under the Financial Services Act 1986 was not what it should have been, which is precisely the point that many of us are making. We cannot expect people such as independent financial advisers, who, while funded to carry on their business, do not have access to the huge reserves that the large companies have, to be able to guess what hindsight would tell them about the regulatory regime that they needed to act under when they were selling their policies. I was interested in a simple statement that the Independent Financial Advisers Association made before the Treasury Select Committee when it gave evidence on 25 June. It said:

"The review is fast becoming a process to ensure no one loses money, in any circumstances, rather than a review of mis-selling."

When the Economic Secretary called in aid the Association of British Insurers rather than the IFA Association, it was interesting to note that the ABI, in much more restrained language, made exactly the same point in its briefing to Members for this debate. The association states that phase 2 will be completed when

"various factors such as the complexity of loss assessment, its interaction with the availability of actuarial resources and the degree of accuracy required" are understood. If the ABI is making that point, the IFA Association, which is making the same point in a much more clear and direct way, deserves some sympathy.

Beckenham is not known as a hive of commercial or industrial activity. However, I have quoted one insurance broker and I have been impressed by the number of IFAs who have come to me with great feeling about the issue that we are debating. I shall outline one company's problem. Its senior partner is its greatest earnings getter. The company specialises in employee and executive benefits. The partner has a client list of blue chip companies, many of which are in the new industries whose age profile is of necessity young. He has done no business getting for the past two years because he has been engaged entirely on the review. In addition, the company has had to hire outside consultants to a current cost of £80,000.

When phase 2 comes through and if the current annuity rates apply to the pensions that the senior partner's company has sold to younger people, the cost could be £1 million, and that equals bankruptcy. It is an IFA with no complaints against it.

It cannot make economic sense for a senior partner not to be getting any business. That is why I add my plea to those made by all those who have asked the Economic Secretary and the Treasury to look again at the regime for phase 2. No one is asking for it to be withdrawn. We accept that there is mis-selling, and if there is mis-selling, compensation is due. However, we need to ensure that those IFAs which have done a good job and which complied in their understanding of what the regulations were at the time should be able to continue in business.

In the spirit of slight mischievousness I throw in the thought that if current annuity rates can be used for reviews calculated now, and given that there will be delays, will the rates return to the level at which they stood at the time when pensions were sold, bearing in mind the announcements made today by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of increased public spending? Therefore, is it not in the interests of everybody to examine whether the regime for phase 2 is the best and most effective way in which to deal with pensions mis-selling?

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I again remind the House of my many interests in these matters. I shall painstakingly go through them because there is a point to be made on each one. I have worked in the insurance industry since 1970. I am still an elected member of the Insurance Brokers Registration Council. The council has had to give up its status as an authorised body under the Financial Services Act 1986. For reasons which the Minister knows, the council's future is in dispute. One of the factors in having to give up its status was the complexity of the work involved in carrying out the phase 2 review and the resources required if it was to be done properly. That is a telling point for the House to consider. If one of the authorised bodies feels that the cost of carrying out the review is so great that it has to hand the job over to the Financial Services Authority, no wonder small independent financial advisers feel constrained by the potential cost.

I am a director of a major insurance broker and independent financial adviser, which purchased the company which I started in 1973. It did so three or four years ago. Sadly, I owned very little of it by then. Its headquarters are in Harrogate, the constituency of the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis).

[Mr. John Greenway]

I think that it would be helpful to share with the House what has happened to us. We were fined £4,000 along with most other IFAs because of the delay on phase 1. We gave all our phase 1 cases—all 39—to an out-sourcing actuarial service, which proceeded to do nothing with them because all its efforts involved sorting out the insurers. We brought them back in-house and we have put them all right. We expect to be in order by the end of this year. We think that there are possibly eight or nine cases to compensate.

We think that we have about 150 transfer cases in phase 2, the majority of which are compliant. Until we examine them all in detail, we cannot be sure. We have 7,000 IFA clients, 2,700 personal pension policy holders and only two cases where there was an opt-out to buy a personal pension. I cannot say how typical we are but I suspect that we are typical of most of the really professional IFA firms. The sadness is that in some elements of the IFA sector—as in the employed sector, to which the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Trickett) referred—a great deal was left to be desired on standards of training, competence and the quality of advice.

The industry has put much of that behind it. To be authorised now, one must be professionally qualified, and the industry can be proud of that. Those who are left, particularly in the IFA sector, to clear up what needs to be done have put themselves through the professional mill. They have achieved their financial planning certificate. A great many have gone further and achieved the advanced FPC and are members of the Society of Financial Advisers. We are dealing now with an independent financial advisory industry that is considerably more professional and committed than the whole industry was when much of the mis-selling that we are discussing took place.

In an earlier intervention, I declared my interest as a chairman of the Federation of Insurance and Investment Intermediary Associations, of which the IFAA is a member. That is an unpaid post, but I am a paid adviser to the Institute of Insurance Brokers, for which mis-selling is not a huge problem. As the Economic Secretary knows, we have much greater concerns about dealing with the future of the Insurance Brokers Registration Council, and I hope to talk to her soon about that.

I want to correct two points that the Economic Secretary made earlier. If there has been misapprehension on her part or misunderstanding of what the IFAA has been trying to do, this is the opportunity to put that right. We are not saying that there is not a problem to resolve in phase 2—clearly there is a problem. We are asking the hon. Lady to recognise that the problem in phase 2 is fundamentally different from that in phase 1.

Phase 1 will be completed by Christmas with, perhaps, a few exceptions in the IFA networks. I ask the hon. Lady to be kind and understanding to them. I do not belong to an IFA network and I have no brief for them, but I know that they have spent a great deal of money on phase 1.

The problem is that the on-going cost of regulation and remaining in business means that many smaller IFAs have joined networks to stay in business. The chief executive of the Personal Investment Authority, Colette Bowe, encouraged many to do so. Much of the mis-selling that the networks are now dealing with occurred before the firms were part of the networks, which is why there has been a delay. I hope that there will not be more unnecessary fines because they simply deplete already hard-pressed resources.

I want to suggest to the Economic Secretary a way in which the problem of phase 2 can be resolved. Time does not allow me to go into detail. Many speakers have put their finger on the problem, but they have not suggested a solution. The solution lies in the way in which the financial viability test can be conducted.

The test allows the IFA to examine files to find out whether the advice given at the time was correct and reasonable. That involves examining the quotation—the basis of the projections on which it was made is a key factor—to find out whether it was based on reasonable assumptions of growth. Most quotes were based on assumptions of growth within the range of 8 to 12 per cent. At the time, the market was achieving 25 per cent. growth as a norm. Of course, that has changed. If the assumptions were reasonable compared with the information from the scheme where there had been a proposed transfer, that should be adequate for the purposes of the phase 2 review.

Mr. Butterfill: My hon. Friend makes a point about the information from the scheme. I am sure that he will agree that many scheme trustees and actuaries gave misleading information because they saw an opportunity to get rid of some of their liabilities and gave an assessment of the value that was lower than reality.

Mr. Greenway: That is true. There is a problem in some cases because schemes merely sent a cheque, so there is no other information, and there is disparity between what it cost to transfer out of the scheme and what it cost subsequently to transfer back in. That is all old territory and we accept that.

I suggest to the Economic Secretary that the problem lies in the insistence by the Financial Services Authority and the PIA that if—

Mr. Willis: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Greenway: In a moment. I want to make an important point. The regulator is saying that if the financial viability test reveals that the advice was reasonable, the policyholder should still be sent a questionnaire asking him to recall exactly what was discussed at the time. We understand why: in those days, the standard of record-keeping was not so high and we did not have the detailed files that we have now. PI insurers have taken great exception to the questionnaire because they see it as an admission of guilt—a confession that there might be something wrong. Of course, that wholly undermines the legal basis on which the PI insurance was underwritten and generally predicated.

In many cases, it will be clear from a simple look at the financial viability test that the advice given was bad and that compensation is due. However, it will speed the phase 2 process considerably if we have the financial viability test without the questionnaire, or perhaps with a questionnaire that is phrased rather more sensibly than the one now proposed.

I ask the Economic Secretary to consider two other crucial points. First, in suggesting that the arrangements for phase 2 should be marginally different from those for phase 1, we are not saying that phase 1 was wrong. It is not our intention to criticise the way in which phase 1 was conducted. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and I have had this argument many times. I have always taken the view that under phase 1, the majority of cases were clearly going to require compensation. As I have said in the House before, I am appalled that so many insurance companies accepted much of the business in question. They must have known that it was wrong for them to do so.

Phase 2 is quite different. Many of the problem cases are transfers. The House passed the primary legislation that provided the opportunity to transfer, so Parliament must have thought that it was a worthwhile exercise. In effect, however, to judge by the way in which it seems that phase 2 is likely to be conducted, it is almost inevitable that almost all the transfers will be non-compliant. That cannot be right. We are not in denial; we are simply asking whether things can be done fairly and sensibly.

The second point involves the serious problem of professional indemnity insurance. No one has yet mentioned the Rothschild Assurance plc v. Collyear judgment, which was passed on 29 September. I am not surprised that no one has referred to it because these are very technical matters. That judgment effectively says that it is in order for an IFA to give a blanket declaration to his PI insurer. Until that judgment, PI insurers were refusing to accept blanket declarations. The consequences of what has now happened are extremely dire.

Our business faced a threefold increase in its premium. We managed to make our own blanket declaration before the end of October and negotiated a better arrangement elsewhere, but only with a £25,000 excess on each and every claim. That is now commonplace in the market. If we are not careful, we shall find that IFAs, whether or not they survive the phase 2 review, will be driven out of business because they cannot afford the PI cover. The cover that they have is not adequate, and it may well prove unacceptable to the regulator because the excess is too great in relation to the total volume of business.

We have to restore some stability to a collapsing professional indemnity insurance market. That is why resolving the problem of the questionnaire in respect of the financial viability test is utterly crucial. The PI insurers have taken grave exception to the questionnaire, but I hope that in the few weeks that we have left before the phase 2 process starts—we are not asking for it to be delayed—we can find an acceptable solution. My hon. Friend the Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) said that the Association of British Insurers is still not satisfied with the detailed arrangements, a point which it made to the all-party insurance and financial services group only two weeks ago, at our previous meeting.

I plead with the Economic Secretary to sit down and discuss this. She may not realise what her diary secretary has done today, but it has been agreed that the Independent Financial Advisers Association will see her on 19 November. We must find a solution which the ABI, IFAs, PI insurers, her Department and the regulator can live with. I believe passionately, and agree wholeheartedly with those who feel strongly about this, that we must resolve the matter as quickly as we reasonably can, but that means that the arrangements must be practical, sensible and workable. They could be, but, at the moment, they are not.

9.9 pm

Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): I wanted to take part in the debate because I believe that a major injustice is being inflicted, especially on independent financial advisers, on some insurance companies and possibly on a great many policyholders.

Like many hon. Members who have spoken, I make it clear from the outset that people who were genuinely mis-sold pensions need compensation, and we must all support any moves towards that. To provide adequate and fair compensation, without destroying many independent financial advisers and without penalising other policyholders, the review must be fair. I believe that it is not.

I shall outline some ways in which the review is unfair, both in its concept and its application. There is an automatic assumption that pensions were mis-sold; indeed the title of the debate is "Personal pensions mis-selling". The letter that companies are forced to send to their clients is headed "Your Pension: Were you badly advised?". Mis-selling is presumed to have taken place, before the company has even had a chance to get a response from its clients. It is assumed to be guilty in every case, without those cases having been proven.

Consideration of how the process starts perhaps explains what I am getting at. The client does not approach the company with a complaint, as is the case in every other walk of life. The company, as we have heard, has to write to all its clients, in a prejudicial way, inviting them to request a review of a policy which they may have been totally happy with.

That process not only undermines companies and the industry, which is not in the best interests of the public, but is grossly unfair and against the spirit of natural justice. Companies are required to badger their clients into requesting reviews, even though many of them have shown, and will show when contacted, that they have no interest at all in such reviews.

Once a request for a review has been received, the review begins and firms are, in the words of the Economic Secretary's letter to hon. Members dated 14 October, required to put matters right if they have broken rules in force at the time of giving advice, and if the investors concerned have suffered financial loss. In my view, however, the rules which prevailed at the time the advice was given were not rules at all—they were guidelines.

People in large companies were employed to sell pension plans, although, as I said in an intervention, that is not strictly true because they were self-employed and existed on that basis with the blessing of the regulator and the Inland Revenue. They were not taken on as advisers, nor as consultants; they were salesmen who often worked on a commission-only basis, and were rewarded when they made sales and fired when they did not. There are differences between the way in which people were allowed to operate at that time and the stricter conditions that they now have to work under.

The practice of best advice was introduced in 1986, but if the regulator had been serious about ensuring that best advice was given he should have introduced a professional qualification for financial services at that time. I understand that such a qualification exists now, but it was barely a requirement for the selling of insurance products during the period covered by the review—1988–94.

It is therefore questionable whether the rules referred to in the Minister's letter were broken. It is my submission that, 10 years on, it is virtually impossible to assess exactly what advice was given, and even more difficult to judge that advice against the background and the economic conditions that prevailed at that time.

A judgment on whether a pension was rightly or wrongly sold should be made against growth rates at that time and not against current rates. A personal pension plan sold in 1988 may have appeared to all concerned far more attractive an investment than it does now, especially given the raid that the Labour Government have made on ACT credits.

The advice given during the period in question was somehow supposed to take into account factors that could not have been known at the time. The decisions taken at the time must be put in context. It is not right to penalise someone for giving the best advice at that time, even if it did not turn out to be correct. It is a long-standing principle of British justice and democracy that legislation should not be retrospective. It is not fair to judge the sales of pensions in the 1980s against the standards and penalties that apply in the 1990s.

Even if it were possible to look back 10 years accurately, a financial comparison cannot be made. The review must compare the actual and stated provision offered by an occupational pension scheme with the likely benefits of a personal pension plan. However, that is not a comparison of like with like. Growth rates have fallen from their 1988 level; personal pension plans may compare less favourably with occupational schemes at today's level. But what if growth rates increase over the remaining life of the pension plan? How would the two then compare? It is impossible to say, so it is impossible to satisfy the second requirement in the Minister's letter—that a financial loss must have been suffered by the investor before compensation is payable.

The only time such a judgment can be made is when the person retires and draws on that pension. A comparison made in any other way is pure guesswork, and is unfair to the firm and possibly to the policyholders. It is like accusing someone of murder when the victim has not yet died.

That is especially so during the second phase of the pension review, which considers the cases of younger people. Younger people may have 30 years to go before they claim their pension. How on earth can an estimate be made of what their pension will be worth in 30 years' time? What about the effects of inflation? Younger people will not stay in one job—as people did years ago—and that will have an impact on the value of an occupational pension. Personal pension plans are flexible in that they are linked to the person, not the job. Occupational schemes, for all their merits, are not.

Are charges for a transfer from one occupational scheme to another to be taken into account when assessing the relative values? Are they judged separately for every person for whom the review is being carried out? Precisely how has that been carried out? How do the regulators know to which company individuals are likely to transfer, or for how long they will stay in their present job, to which the occupational pension is linked?

A further consideration when making a comparison between occupational and personal pensions is the viability and sustainability of occupational schemes. Some schemes, which could be called in-out schemes, have recently come under pressure, and their continued funding puts pressure on the resources of the services provided by the organisations that run them. The teachers' pension scheme and the police pension scheme are two such examples. Are those carrying out the review able to judge the financial and non-financial aspects of the respective schemes? I suggest that that is impossible.

What about the other benefits that a private pension plan offers which are not merely financial? Such benefits include the flexibility that such a plan offers, allowing policyholders to draw their pension at any time between the ages of 50 and 75. How many occupational pension schemes offer that degree of flexibility?

Provision for early retirement is now threatened in a number of these in-out schemes. Is allowance made for that when calculating the respective worth of occupational schemes and private pension plans?

What about the death-in-service benefit comparisons? People dying in their 20s would undoubtedly have more money credited to their estates from occupational schemes than people in private schemes; but people dying in their 50s could have accumulated far more capital in private schemes than they would have in occupational schemes. How have the regulators assessed that factor?

Not only is it difficult to assess whether the rules have been broken, and whether a policy holder has suffered a financial loss; it is difficult to assess who should pay compensation for any mis-selling that may have occurred. We have heard various views on who should pay, but all the larger companies will do is pass on any compensation payments that they make, or any fines that they pay, to the with-profits policy holders. Companies' ability to do that is unfair on the small independent advisers whom the industry itself advises people to consult in preference to single companies. Independent advisers have no one to whom they can pass on costs; in such circumstances, they will simply go out of business.

I ask the Government to look at the way in which the second phase of the review, in particular, is being conducted. All that I have said so far relates to the past, but I would add that the financial services industry is extremely important to the country. If people lose faith in it, that will be to their great detriment. I urge the Government to ensure that such a thing does not happen again, by stating that a recognised professional qualification must be obtained before anyone is allowed to become involved in the industry. Let me stress the need to protect the innocent companies that have worked so hard for so many years, so that they do not have to go out of business owing to a heavy-handed approach to regulation.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): One of the joys of speaking last in a debate through which one has had to sit is benefiting from the experience of other speakers. Tonight's debate has demonstrated one of the great joys of being in the House of Commons. It was a delight to hear the speeches of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart), the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) and, indeed, my neighbour the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway). I must add that I have no interest to declare, apart from the interests of a constituency which, according to my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable), boasts more independent financial advisers than any other constituency in Britain. I was glad to learn that it also contains the former company of the hon. Member for Ryedale.

I listened to the debate with interest. Given the exercise in misinformation and sophistry that we have witnessed, the Government and their regulators should be congratulated on the spectacular success of their handling of the so-called pensions mis-selling review. For too long the pensions mis-selling scandal has been a convenient vehicle for the nurturing of populist tendencies and the furthering of political and regulatory ambitions, and has provided an easy target for the filling of sensational news space. The prevailing attitude has been, "Never mind the justice, just feel the self-righteousness"; there has certainly been a sense of that this evening.

The purpose of regulation is simple: to protect the investor from the excesses of those who might seek to misguide him for personal gain. Yet, under the phase 2 procedures, the regulator has designed a process that will ensure that clients will always have a case for compensation, and the financial adviser will always be in the wrong. That approach is closer to tyranny than to regulation.

Many of my constituents are employed as independent financial advisers or work for them, either running their own firms or as part of larger organisations, and that must apply to nearly every Member of Parliament. Along with many others, I suspect, I have received few complaints about the services that those advisers provide: in fact, I have not received one complaint since my election. Yet they provide as many as 15,000 jobs throughout the country and most of them, or many of them, are at risk if phase 2 is allowed to progress in its present form.

It does the Economic Secretary to the Treasury no credit that her letter to Members of Parliament was so dismissive of what was a serious attempt by the IFAA to bring this subject into wider debate. If an association is not allowed to lobby Members of Parliament in the way it did, it is a sad state of affairs, although I admit that today's debate is welcome and my constituents pass on their thanks to the Economic Secretary for holding it.

Let me assure the House that I and the people whom I represent are committed to the view that clients of independent financial advisers who have been negligently or poorly advised should receive proper compensation; that is not in doubt. There can be no argument about it. Independent financial advisers should and must be held to account, just like large companies.

However, the process and methodology by which phase 2 is to be carried out goes far beyond what is required to provide an equitable solution to the problems. There is a danger that, in the natural desire to compensate those who were mis-sold pensions, enthusiasm is being carried to the point of trying to ensure that no one can ever lose any money. It is much like going to the races and the bookies being obliged to give people a return even if their horse falls at the first fence.

Yes, there was mis-selling and scandal in many of those cases that fell within phase 1 of the review: those who were close to retirement, have now retired or have even died. Rightly, those people and their families must receive proper recompense; but with phase 2, another scandal is upon us: the decimation of the independent financial adviser sector, more through the inequity and artificiality of the phase 2 review process that has been set down by the regulator and supported by the Government than by any malpractice by independent financial advisers.

The majority of phase 2 cases are in respect of people who are under 35 and therefore have many years to go before retirement. To view those cases in the same light as those under phase 1 simply cannot be justified.

The regulator affirms that individual cases will be judged in terms of the rules in force at the time the advice was given. If those rules were broken, the case must be reviewed to find out whether the client has suffered financial loss as a result of acting on the independent financial adviser's advice. That is reasonable, but pension transfers were transacted from July 1988 and no specific guidance as to the regulator's requirements for the handling of that type of business was issued until early 1994, after the Securities and Investments Board identified possible cases of misadvice following the KPMG investigation.

I heard what the Economic Secretary said earlier: she dismissed those allegations. I would like her to put a paper in the Library demonstrating when the regulations were brought in, so that we can have a clear, definitive statement on that.

The regulator's response to KPMG's investigation was to impose stringent standards, drafted with the exact knowledge of hindsight and with retrospective effect, in the pretence that those standards had existed from the outset. They had not. It is important to realise that the Financial Services Act 1986 came into effect only in 1988. As we know, it was an unfortunate coincidence that the Act was in its infancy at the very time when the pension transfer business first started to be transacted.

There was an acceptance that all parties would require time for a "learning curve" to adopt procedures, to develop systems and to familiarise those who gave financial advice to clients with the practices required to comply with the new legislation. That, too, was right; it happens in any industry.

That explains why, from 1988 to 1994, regulators did not find significant rule-breaking in the sectors that are now being pursued with such crusading zeal. That regulatory zeal, fortified with the certainty of hindsight, will render nearly all the cases that fall within phase 2 in breach of the rules of the time, as now defined by the regulator.

The injustice does not end there. Having failed the now virtually impossible rule breach test, a case must be reviewed to identify whether there has been mis-selling and to quantify the amount of compensation due to the client. For the purpose of assessing whether the individual has suffered any financial loss, the regulator states that the advice can be measured by comparing the estimated benefits of retirement that the occupational pension scheme would provide with the estimated benefits from the alternative personal pension. Both calculations should be made using projections of future growth and expectations of annuity rates such as could be reasonably deduced from the investment conditions when the advice was given. As the hon. Member for Ryedale said, that is the so-called financial viability test.

Again, that is an extremely reasonable approach—except that the regulator then imposes on the process the requirement that the client complete a questionnaire that requires the exact recall of specific events in the advice process that happened as long ago as 10 years. Most people cannot remember where they went on holiday 10 years or even five years ago, let alone recall the specific detail of the hotel bedroom or the lunchtime menu. How realistic is it to expect them to have a precise recall of every detail of the complicated process involved in reaching a decision as to whether to transfer a pension from an employer's scheme to a private pension?

In the regulator's view, failure by the individual to give a positive response to each of the questions on the questionnaire is just about conclusive proof that the individual has been misadvised. Surely that is nonsense. If the only thing that comes out of the debate today is that the Economic Secretary drops the questionnaire from phase 2, we will have had a very successful debate.

I am sure that most people are perfectly honest and would answer truthfully to the best of their ability—particularly Liberal Democrats. However, because of all the publicity surrounding this issue, an expectation of compensation has been built up which even the most honest of citizens might find hard to resist.

The regulator then requires a different calculation method to be used to assess whether the individual is due compensation. That method ignores the reasonable assumptions made when the advice was given, based on the investment conditions of the time, in favour of assumptions based on current market conditions. That is a grossly inequitable approach and can have no result other than to ensure that the majority of cases that come within phase 2 are artificially deemed to be due compensation. That offends against natural justice.

It is a fact that investment market conditions are ever changing and that future growth of the funds and annuity rates will reflect market movements, up as well as down. Recently, we have seen a significant downturn in investment markets and a steep decline in bond yields which has reduced current annuity rates to the lowest in living memory.

On the "Today" programme on 2 November, the Chancellor boasted that one of the successes of the Government's financial policy was that annuity rates were at their lowest for 35 years. When the Minister replies, perhaps she will say whether that is deliberate Government policy. If it is, it impacts significantly on phase 2 and undermines its credibility. At some time in the future, I can see that annuities may be removed as a compulsory way of securing people's pensions if that is Government policy. It is hardly surprising that, based on current conditions, the estimated returns under personal pension plans are showing a significant shortfall compared with the figures quoted as long ago as 10 years.

In 1988, when the first transfer cases took place, the annuity rate for a man aged 65 was 11 per cent. In 1992, the equivalent rate was 10.5 per cent., by 1994 it was 9.5 per cent, and today the rate is 8 per cent. It is mathematically simple to deduce that those who took advice in 1988 now require 37 per cent. more retirement funds to produce the same pension. The figure is 31 per cent. for those who acted in 1992 and 19 per cent. for those who transferred in 1994. That is caused not by poor advice or mis-selling, but purely by movements in the investment markets which are outside the adviser's control.

Are we really to believe that, over the next 20 to 30 years, which are the retirement years for most phase 2 cases, investment markets will show no recovery? The approach is so fundamentally flawed and so biased against the adviser that, were the cases to be brought to a court of law, they would be unlikely to succeed. Why then should the financial services industry be expected to make compensation payments on the basis of a calculation that is arbitrary and demonstrably inequitable, and which will result in windfall payments to many who have absolutely no justifiable claim?

If phase 2 of the pensions review is allowed to proceed in its current form, the role of financial adviser will be changed dramatically. Not only will it be expected that sound, professional financial advice should be given, but the adviser will be required, year by year, to have the ability to predict precisely movements in investment markets and to guarantee returns at any given point. In the past 18 months, the Government have failed to make such predictions. How is it reasonable to expect independent financial advisers to do so over a long period?

Today's debate has dealt with many of the flaws in phase 2 and demonstrated the House's unanimity on the need to resolve the pensions mis-selling issue. We look now to the Government to show some sense and reason in trying to conclude the exercise swiftly and without punishing independent financial advisers who were not at fault.

9.35 pm

Ms Hewitt: With the leave of the House, I should like to respond to our excellent debate. We have heard from at least two of the trustees of the parliamentary pension fund—my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart), and the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor)—

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) is a trustee.

Ms Hewitt: Forgive me; we have heard from three trustees—[HON. MEMBERS: "Four."] We have heard from four trustees. It is encouraging to know that the pensions of right hon. and hon. Members are in such safe hands.

We have heard from several hon. Members on both sides of the House—including my hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Kidney) and the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway)—who have extensive knowledge of the industry and the law. We have heard also from hon. Members—notably my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Trickett)—with deep constituency experience of the impact that personal pensions mis-selling has had on the lives of individuals.

Tomorrow, I shall, of course, read the full debate with interest, to ensure that I have not inadvertently overlooked any point. I shall also draw the debate to the attention of the regulators, just in case they do not look at it for themselves.

As several hon. Members have said, much common ground has been demonstrated in the debate, and I warmly welcome it. There is clear agreement on both sides of the House that there was mis-selling of personal pensions. There is agreement also on the scale of the mis-selling, and that the mis-selling was a scandal. Moreover, there is agreement that the situation must be put right: as a matter of justice to the individuals who have lost savings and future retirement income; to ensure confidence in the industry—including independent financial advisers, who, I assure the House, will have an extremely important role to play; and to provide thereby a sound basis for people's future pensions and savings.

I regret to say that I cannot agree with all the points that have been made in the debate. I was astonished to hear the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford (Mr. Whittingdale) suggest that the progress that has been made on the review is attributable to the previous Government's actions. Although I am in no way criticising my predecessor, Angela Knight—whom I look forward to meeting in her new role—I should draw the House's attention to the facts.

In March 1997, three months after the first deadline for priority cases had passed, only 15 per cent. of those cases had been resolved. The figure has now reached about 90 per cent. due to the tough action and the tough stance that my predecessor took and that I shall maintain. Hon. Members who welcome the progress that has been made with phase 1 must in all honesty give credit where it is due to the tough stance of the present Government, particularly my predecessor.

I regret the suggestion by the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough (Mr. Willis) that the Government's tough action had been motivated by political advancement or self-righteousness. I hope that I misunderstood him, but he certainly seemed to make that suggestion. The facts as I have given them make it very clear that the Government and my predecessor were motivated entirely by a determination to get the mis-selling scandal put right in the interests of consumers, who are our constituents. That is what we have done and will continue to do.

A succession of points have been made about independent financial advisers. Several hon. Members have complained about the burden that is being placed on IFAs. Let me make it clear that there is an issue for IFAs to face up to: according to the information provided to us that we have published, three of the firms that we have been monitoring—all IFAs—have missed their targets for completing all priority cases. If we look back at the original deadline of 31 December 1997, we see that more than 600 small IFAs failed to meet their first priority target.

Of the phase 1 cases, the FSA has estimated that, on average, an IFA will deal with 1.8 cases of personal pensions mis-selling and in phase 2 the average will be 2.1 cases. That is not a heavy burden. An IFA—an individual or a firm—who has given good advice and not mis-sold personal pensions has nothing to fear from the phase 2 review. Of course the burden is greater for those who did not keep proper records of their business at the time or who failed to preserve such records—an action for which there is no excuse whatever. It was made clear when the extent of personal pensions mis-selling first came to light that records should be kept, and in many cases preserved indefinitely.

Many hon. Members have suggested that the review is retrospective. Let me deal with that again in some detail. As the hon. Member for Harrogate and Knaresborough admitted, the regulators' review guidance specifically states:

> "It goes without saying that the question of whether a firm was at fault in compliance terms must be judged without the wisdom of hindsight."

So let us look at the rules that were in force at the time. They obliged a regulated firm to inform itself about the client's circumstances and objectives and to give suitable advice, to give its client adequate information so as to understand the nature and effect of the recommended transactions, to ensure that the client understood the risks, and to give clear and not misleading information.

The FIMBRA conduct of business rules that were in force at the time state, for example, that a transaction should not take place unless the adviser can satisfy himself that > "the client understands the extent to which he will be exposed to risk".

The rules also state quite unambiguously that the investment should suit the circumstances of the client and that the adviser should recommend the best product available for the client. The rules were and are perfectly clear in their meaning, and certainly would not extend to selling an unsuitable product to an unknowing investor.

The hon. Members for Ryedale and for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill) mentioned professional indemnity insurance, on which there are serious issues. The regulators and the majority of the insurers reached an accord in January 1996 on the terms under which the review could proceed without negating IFAs' insurance. The FSA is confident that the design of phase 2 is consistent with that accord. The regulators see no case for a different approach for PI insured firms. That accord allowed firms to send revised letters and questionnaires to investors.

The hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford asked whether I was willing to meet the IFA association. Of course I am. I look forward to doing so later this month and discussing the issues with the advisers face to face. However, the point that I made in opening the debate stands—the IFAs who are dragging their feet on phase 1 must take action to complete phase 1. The sooner they get on with phase 2, the better.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk, the hon. Member for Bournemouth, West and others asked how the loss will be calculated, and suggested that it was wrong to calculate it on the basis of the situation in force at the time that the review is made. I underline the point that I made in opening the debate: whether a personal pension was mis-sold is judged by reference to the rules and standards in force at the time, but the extent of the loss, if any, must be assessed at the time that the review of the case is made.

Conservative Members shake their heads, but they should listen. The guidance on how that should be done is based on the independent advice of senior members of the actuarial profession. The Government Actuary has confirmed that the methodology was appropriate, and that the actuarial assumptions fell within a range that actuaries would regard as acceptable for these purposes.

In all respects, the review process reflects the practice of the courts. If it did not, phase 2 investors who believed that they had suffered loss would have a redress in the courts that was not available to them under the regulatory action that we are ensuring. That would place a far greater burden of uncertainty on the IFAs and the firms responsible for mis-selling.

Although losses for phase 2 cases are generally lower than for the first priority cases, they are none the less widespread and material. Extensive research conducted by the FSA in deciding how phase 2 should be conducted estimates that there are nearly 1 million transfer cases, and where there is a loss it averages £4,000; 154,000 cases of opt-outs, with an average loss ranging from £3,500 to £7,250; and up to 700,000 cases of non-joiners, with an average loss in the range £2,250 to £12,000.

Those are significant sums. The idea put forward by one hon. Member, that £11 billion is a mere drop in the bucket compared with the total funds under management, will be of no comfort to younger investors who were ill advised and suffered loss as a result.

Several hon. Members have suggested that there should be no immediate review for the younger investors, and that no loss should be calculated until they reach retirement age. If it is difficult to conduct a review now, eight or 10 years after the mis-selling may have taken place, it will be virtually impossible to do so when the young investors retire, by which time the IFA or firm that sold the personal pension may have merged, gone out of business, retired, died or destroyed the records.

The suggestion is absurd, and would have the additionally damaging effect on the industry of leaving it in total uncertainty for 20, 30 or even 40 years as to the extent of the losses for which compensation might in future have to be paid. As every hon. Member will know, it is precisely the pension contributions that people make when they are young that are of the most value to them in securing a decent standard of living when they retire.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Hewitt: No. I gave way extensively during my opening remarks, and I still have a great deal of material to get through, and many points to which I wish to respond.

However, perhaps I should have dealt earlier with the point that the hon. Gentleman raised, which was about the PASS initiative by the Association of British Insurers. As he said, that was only for phase 1. Many IFAs are still struggling to complete phase 1, but if they need help with phase 2—no doubt many will—I certainly hope that those running the PASS initiative will consider their requests sympathetically. The issue had not been brought to my attention before.

The hon. Gentleman also raised an important point when he made a persuasive case about the value of the present polarisation rule. That matter is being reviewed by the Financial Services Authority now. Strong arguments are made on both sides, and I want to defer judgment until the FSA has completed its work.

It has also been suggested—by the right hon. Member for South Norfolk, I think—that rebate-only cases should be completely excluded from phase 2. I have no doubt that that idea will be considered by the FSA if, as the review unfolds, there is good reason for dealing differently with a particular category of case. It is far too early to make a judgment now.

The FSA has been keen throughout to learn from the experience of the industry in implementing phase 1. Phase 2 is identical in most respects to the phase 1 procedure, with which even the Independent Financial Advisers Association says that it is now content. The exception, of course, is the way in which firms will be actively required to seek out investors and bring appropriate cases within the review.

That is being done because the regulators know, as do the Government, that awareness of a possible pensions mis-selling will be considerably lower among younger investors than it was among those who were close to, or had already reached, retirement age when the personal pensions mis-selling scandal first came to public attention.

It is unreasonable to suggest, as many hon. Members have, that the onus should be on those clients, those investors, to come forward, with no initiative being taken by those upon whom the responsibility must fall.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Will the Minister give way?

Ms Hewitt: No. I have already said that I have a great deal to get through in my closing remarks, and I do not intend to give way.

I wish to refer to the question—raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston and by the hon. Members for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) and for Bournemouth, West—of where the costs of pensions mis-selling fall. The insurance directorate issued guidance to insurers in October 1994 on where the costs of compensation for pensions mis-selling should fall. That guidance applies to phase 2 just as it did to phase 1 of the review. The insurance directorate of the Treasury is monitoring compliance with that guidance.

The basic principle, which is very simple, is that the costs should be shared fairly among those parties which stood to gain from the sale of the pension. That will include both the shareholders and the policyholders in a proprietary company. In the case of mutual insurers, there is no alternative but for policyholders to be used. In the case of shareholder-owned companies, we consider it reasonable for the with-profits policyholders to bear a proportion of the costs, following the principle that they share in the good times as well as the bad, to the extent that they stood to share any profits made from the sale of pensions contracts involved—and, of course, provided that that does not lead to a failure to meet policyholders' reasonable benefit expectations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston, who is extremely knowledgeable on the subject, mentioned orphan assets and inherited estates, which is a distinct—but none the less linked—issue. Our objective remains to protect policyholders in line with the normal position that with-profits policyholders should share in the whole surplus of a with-profits fund—usually in the proportion of at least 90 per cent. Any exceptions to that norm need to be carefully justified. However, the precise circumstances of each case differ, and it is not always easy to judge where the legal ownership of these often substantial surpluses lies.

In many cases, use of the inherited estate to meet personal pensions mis-selling costs is a sensible way to protect policyholders from immediate and severe cuts in their bonuses. However, as I have said, we will continue to monitor the way in which the costs of compensating the victims of pensions mis-selling are being met, and we will take any necessary action to protect policyholders' reasonable expectations.

The hon. Member for Grantham and Stamford (Mr. Davies) asked whether the costs should not instead fall upon the individuals who themselves sold the pensions, or who were managing the firms responsible for that mis-selling. It is important to stress that the sales managers and the sales force were often carrying out company policy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth pointed out, in some cases those who were sent out to sell were placed in a quite impossible position, and it would be utterly wrong to expect the cost of compensation to fall on those individuals.

The responsibility for compliance goes right to the top of the company. The Financial Services Authority has the power to fine individuals within firms if any of them are found responsible for systematic malpractice, although that evidence is not always easily available.

I wish to refer to our pensions policy, which the hon. Member for Maldon and East Chelmsford made much of. The story in the Daily Mail to which he referred—as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has made clear—has no foundation whatever. The pensions review and the stakeholder pensions proposals that we are developing are on track, and will be disclosed in the forthcoming Green Paper.

The abolition of the payment of tax credits to pension funds is part of a reform of the structure of company taxation which is in line with our determination to secure long-term growth in the economy and to remove the perverse incentive that payable tax credits gave to companies to distribute dividends rather than retain profits for investment.

I must end by stressing that phase 2 of the pensions review will go ahead. The Treasury and the regulators will continue to work with the industry to ensure good progress. I urge the industry to co-operate with us and the regulators, and to build on the progress that we have at long last made in the past 18 months.

Mr. Robert Ainsworth (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury): I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

LIAISON COMMITTEE

Ordered,

Farming

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

9.59 pm

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle (Chorley): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to speak about the farming industry and to highlight the problems that face farmers in my constituency, who have had one of the most dismal years since the 1973 crisis.

The north-west is the second most affected area in Britain as regards the crisis in farming. Chorley has approximately 500 farmers. They are predominantly livestock farmers, although there is some arable in the lower areas of the constituency. They have all been hit hard by the bad summer and the turndown in stock prices. A ewe costs as little as £5 on Clitheroe market today, compared with £60, 10 years ago. In the past year, five of my farmers have sold up and one has had to get rid of his entire stock of pigs for next to nothing, losing thousands of pounds. Many more farmers are on the brink of bankruptcy.

The Tenant Farmers Association estimates that the average income of farmers has fallen by nearly 55 per cent. in the past year to just over £7,000. Most of my tenant farmers rent their land from North West Water or RJB Mining. Perhaps those companies could forgo six month's rent to allow the farmers to recover and give them a chance to keep farming, especially given some of the profits made by the utilities.

The situation is desperate in Chorley and throughout the country. Farmers in my constituency have pleaded with the Government for help. Without drastic action to solve the crisis, we will witness the decline and perhaps the extinction of a valuable industry and a great tradition in Britain.

I welcome the measures that the Government have taken so far to deal with the problems created by years of Conservative neglect. They have responded positively by providing agrimonetary compensation totalling £85 million in just two months and have so far retained the calf processing aid scheme to support the market for beef, which I hope will continue after November.

The Government have supported Britain's farmers in fighting for an end to the beef ban and have met the cost of enforcement of controls on specified risk materials from cattle and sheep in 1998–99. That support is worth £35 million and has helped livestock producers.

One of the best ways actively to repair the industry is to lend our support and back the "Buy British" campaign. It is vital that we not only restore the British public's confidence in British meat, but actively promote the sale of British produce. Today, the National Farmers Union launched its "Proud to Serve British" campaign, which was attended by my hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. The campaign will target catering companies by encouraging them to buy British and to demonstrate that at retail outlets with the use of promotional material. I have one of the posters here.

One cannot underestimate the role that catering companies can play in supporting farming. Families in Britain spend 26 per cent. of the annual food budget on eating out and turnover in catering outlets is rapidly on the increase. In 1998, we spent £23 billion on catering and that figure is set to rise to at least £32 billion by the new millennium. However, only 50 per cent. of caterers buy their produce from a British source. We need to tackle that problem and to ensure that more caterers buy up to 100 per cent. from the United Kingdom. In the NFU's "Great British Food" survey of the general public, respondents said that they would like more British food to be served in local restaurants, cafes and pubs. Some 47 per cent. of the public state that their main reason for buying British is to support the rural economy, which the Government also support. We should build on that and make sure that everyone has the opportunity to purchase quality British produce.

I welcome the announcement by the Ministry of Defence that it is to serve British beef to the United Kingdom armed forces. That commitment will give a boost to the industry and help to restore confidence in beef among the British public. I hope that the MOD will soon follow suit with lamb. The lifting of the ban on beef on the bone next March will be another big step on the road to recovery.

We should now concentrate on schools, local education authorities, hospitals and other large establishments, which have a part to play in boosting the farming industry. We need a commitment from them that they will put beef back on the menu and make a concentrated effort to buy the British beef that we love.

We must put our full weight behind the campaign to back British produce. I hope that the people of the UK will show their support. We should actively encourage the public to purchase British produce by emphasising the high standards of our products.

I have already suggested to my hon. Friend the Minister that we should consider imposing stricter standards on imported meat and dairy produce. Often, inferior standard produce is imported and sold at a lower price. That must be stopped, by ensuring that meat and dairy produce adhere to high standards. The animal welfare standards observed in the UK should be applied to produce entering the UK market from abroad. For example, in the UK a qualified vet is required to be on hand at all slaughterhouses, but does the same rule apply in Greece and elsewhere—say, central America? What saving is made by not having to apply such strict standards in slaughterhouses there? If we applied equal controls, other countries would not be able to cut costs. We would be on an equal footing and furthermore, that would benefit animal welfare in other countries.

If a car is imported into the UK, we are careful to ensure that it meets all safety criteria to match our British standards. Why should meat and dairy produce be any different? I hope that the Minister will consider that.

I am disappointed by the way in which the supermarkets have acted during the crisis. It is about time that they acknowledged the vast problem. Instead of retaining the huge profits that they have been making, they should consider paying a fairer price for meat. Large supermarkets can afford to reduce their profits for the sake of a valuable industry, but instead they join together to maintain high retail prices. Soon they will no longer be able to offer the consumer a wide range of quality British products, as their greed will destroy the industry.

I welcome the fact that some supermarkets are beginning to see that. Sainsbury's, for example, now ensures that 90 per cent. of its produce is of British origin. Asda has removed New Zealand lamb from its shelves, in a move designed to boost Britain's struggling sheep farmers. I hope that Asda will pay a good price for the good quality lamb that it will sell.

In general, however, the supermarkets refuse to pay a fair price for meat and in some cases operate like a cartel, agreeing to keep prices high. Supermarkets may claim to be in competition when they sell products at rock-bottom prices, such as a tin of beans at 7p, but I do not see any savings being passed on to the consumer on beef, pork or lamb. I want a fair price for a quality product to be paid to farmers. That will protect farmers' livelihoods and allow the continuation of the farming industry and shoppers' choice.

Overall, I support the Government's efforts. They have acted swiftly to address the crisis in farming, and slowly but surely we are getting back on track. However, we need more support. I welcome the strong commitment to the UK farming industry and to the rural economy demonstrated in the intention to introduce market-oriented reform of the common agricultural policy.

I hope that we can get firmer backing for British produce to give the industry a boost; further agrimonetary compensation, especially for livestock farms; and more aid for farmers to help them in the short term and to ensure that this vital industry does not collapse.

I also welcome the support offered today by the Government to the "Proud to Serve British" campaign. The campaign is a drive to promote the quality and high standards of British farm products, and is an ideal way of restoring confidence and increasing agricultural sales. A similar campaign worked in the 1970s to counteract the worst farming crisis this century. I think that this is the way forward and will boost the industry again. I believe that farmers also have a part to play: when they need to buy a new tractor, they should also show a commitment to buying British.

10.9 pm

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I thank the hon. Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) for giving me the opportunity to contribute to this brief debate. I shall try to express some of the real desperation that is felt by many members of the farming community in the area of Somerset that I represent. One such farmer came up to me in Kingsbury Episcopi last Saturday, as the rains came down and the floodwaters came up, to tell me about the woes of many farms in his area. A farmer from Nunney approached me during my village tour to show me the slip from Frome market, which revealed that he had gained 18p net per calf. The pig farmers in Wanstrow and Truddoxhill tell me that they are losing many pounds on every weaner that they take to market.

It is unheard of in my experience and in that of many farmers to see every farming sector down at the same time, but that is the situation at present. It is often said that farmers are prone to crying wolf, but this time it is not a false alarm: our farmers are in desperate straits. That is backed up by the statistics. A recent survey in the south-west found that farm profits in the region are down by 79 per cent. on average. That compares with an average of 49 per cent. throughout the country. An even more alarming study conducted by the university of Exeter revealed that the average net farming income for lowland livestock farmers in the south-west will be £100 this financial year—we are returning to the days of Thomas Hardy with that sort of figure.

I assure the Minister that I do not think that the crisis in agriculture began on 2 May last year. There has been an on-going problem with which some Ministers have struggled manfully. They have done some of the right things, but the farming community and I would like to see more action on behalf of the farmers. First, the Government must recognise that the crisis exists not just in the upland areas but for lowland farmers as well. There is much concentration, for obvious reasons, on the upland farms and the difficulties that rural communities in those areas face. The lowland livestock farms of Somerset and the levels are not great ranches, but small, often tenant farms. As the hon. Gentleman said, those farmers are really suffering at present.

Secondly, I believe that a basket of short-term measures could be applied at this stage. I hope that the new Minister of Agriculture will examine some of those options. As the hon. Gentleman said, those short-term measures include agrimonetary compensation, which could be applied to the lowland, as well as the upland farms. The retention of the calf scheme beyond November would be not only a good signal but a stimulus to the beef industry to believe that better times may be ahead. The rendering industry is absolutely destitute at present. There is no rendering industry, and that is causing enormous problems for many farmers.

We must ensure that there is fair competition. The hon. Gentleman was absolutely correct in his comments in that regard. I hope that current moves will be successful in ending the beef ban, and I congratulate those Ministers who conducted the negotiations. However, we must ensure that there is fair competition with imports and that we are competing on level ground in terms of animal welfare and the quality of food imports.

We need to get to grips with the supermarkets and the profits that they continue to make while farming in this country is going down the drain. We must ask whether those profits are acceptable. We also need to examine interest rates, which are having a disastrous effect on all manufacturing industry—and farming is no exception. Some of us would argue in favour of a particular route out of the impasse, but that problem must be addressed on a national basis.

We can also do better in marketing United Kingdom produce. The United Kingdom generates extremely good farm produce. As for the south-west and particularly Somerset, I believe that we have some of the most wholesome and high-quality produce when compared with the produce of anywhere else that anyone cares to name. Yet I do not believe that we are marketing our produce as effectively as we could either in this country or abroad. More emphasis needs to be put on marketing.

I hope that the Minister will not talk, as colleagues have done, about fundamental restructuring of the industry. Of course there are pressures on the industry and of course there will be fall-out from that. However, when we talk about restructuring and "increased efficiency", we may be talking about the loss of the traditional family farm and the forcing of many smaller and medium-sized enterprises into agri-business, into the large conglomerates that own a great deal of land but employ very few people. We may be losing the high standard of animal welfare which is inherent in many good family farms, where people care about the animals that they are looking after, and encouraging the growth of mono-culture, which is something that most of would prefer not to see.

Let us not talk about restructuring and efficiency, save the efficiency that comes from having a vibrant agricultural industry that employs local people, looks after animals well and provides for the best produce that we can produce.

It was a great disappointment to us in Somerset when the former Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was not able to come to Somerset to the Royal Bath and West show. It was the first time for a very long time that Ministers had not been present at the show. That is something that I hope will be put right by the Ministry this year. I invite the Minister, his right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and any of his colleagues to come to Somerset to see for themselves the position in which we find our industry and perhaps learn from the experiences of so many of my constituents, who are finding life extremely difficult and are looking for help.

Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): I shall briefly and rapidly congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle). He represents a constituency that hosts exclusively the Royal Lancashire show each year, which is famous and historical. He presented his case profoundly and sincerely, and offered an excellent defence of the interests of British farmers in the north-west and throughout the United Kingdom. It was commendable and I congratulate him on it.

I shall speak exclusively about the area that I represent. Perhaps one would not think that Leigh and Wigan have rural areas where there are pig farmers, who almost exclusively are running small businesses. They are facing unfair competition. I say from my experience in Europe—tomorrow I am having discussions in Paris with the Agricultural Committee of the Council of Europe—that British pig food is quality production. It is subject to quality control and high standards, including those of animal welfare. We have higher standards than any of our continental competitors.

I feel for our farmers. We are talking of losses of about £30 to £35 on every pig that is reared, fed and sold. Many farmers face the stark scenario of bankruptcy. I know that the Government have taken commendable initiatives on which we have congratulated them but we are faced with unfair competition that hurts British producers. That unfair competition takes the form of inferior quality products. If our farmers maintain their standards they will face, obviously, a decline in their income. They cannot understand why that should happen.

Butchers in my constituency are also concerned—this is the supermarket argument. Everybody knows that the price of British beef or imported beef is propped up by the artificial prices and margins of other goods in the supermarket. That needs investigation by Committees of the House.

I am astonished—I would not say that I was shocked—that no Conservative Members are present to discuss British farming interests. I cannot believe that they are so indifferent to those interests after their party's tremendous failure at the general election. Their lack of commitment to farming is revealed by their absence this evening, and it is shameful.

I conclude with a topical phrase—buy British. I say to absent Conservative Members that that is the British way. At their party conference they tried to use farming to demonstrate to the country that they are back on the agenda.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Elliot Morley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Hoyle) on the powerful and knowledgeable way in which he made his case. He spoke in great detail about the effects of the recession in agriculture on his local farmers. I listened carefully to his points and I shall respond to them in a moment.

I pay tribute also to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), who made a similar case about the effects in Somerset and my hon. Friend the Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe), who made a good case about the pig industry. I am sympathetic to that case as I come from north Lincolnshire, which is a major pig-producing area.

I acknowledge that apart from the hon. Members whom I have already mentioned, the debate is attended by my hon. Friends the Members for Stroud (Mr. Drew), for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden), for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) and for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Mr. Goggins), but not a single Conservative Member. When the Liberal Democrats held a debate last Monday, Conservative attendance was also very poor. That demonstrates who has farmers' interests and those of the rural economy at heart.

I recognise that most sectors of farming, but particularly the livestock sector, are having a difficult time. The ministerial team has been listening carefully to representations by organisations such as the Tenant Farmers Association, which my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley mentioned, and many individual farmers throughout the country.

I am glad that my hon. Friend acknowledged what the Government have already done to alleviate the pressures on farming. Last winter, we provided an extra £85 million of support for the beef and sheep industries. We also absorbed £35 million of start-up charges for the cattle traceability scheme, which has helped the industry a great deal.

I listened to my hon. Friend's points about the calf processing aid scheme. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is considering that and other measures. That scheme is a two-edged sword and people in the industry have argued for its end. It must end at some point and although we concede that that will cause welfare problems, the scheme itself has caused such problems.

I agree that one of the most important actions that we can take to restore confidence to the livestock sector is to get the ban on British beef lifted. We are in the final stages of achieving that. A tremendous amount of work has been done by my right hon. Friend the Minister and his predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). That will probably be discussed at the next Agriculture Council in November. There is no doubt that lifting the ban will send the right signals to the industry.

It is worth mentioning that one of the reasons why the livestock sector is facing such difficulties is that it faces the on-costs of specified offal removal. We must have such regulations and the extra costs because of the catastrophe of BSE, which has hit not only the beef industry but the whole livestock sector. The previous Administration made some terrible mistakes in dealing with BSE, and we are still feeling the reverberations and repercussions.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chorley made some good points about what can be done to help the livestock sector. He mentioned the promotion of the high standards of British meat production. We accept his case and, indeed, recently held a catering seminar chaired by Lord Donoughue. Its aim was to encourage the catering industry, which is a major sector of the economy, to use more British products. We argue that case not simply because we are British, although I was moved by my hon. Friend's patriotism.

The fact that a product is British is not enough. We argue for the use of British products on the basis of quality and welfare and hygiene standards. As my hon. Friend rightly said, our products conform to the highest standards in the world, and that fact needs to be borne in mind in the interests of fair and open competition. I shall say a little more about that in a moment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leigh mentioned the pig industry. I understand what he said as I represent an area that is one of the centres of the British pig industry. Our British pig producers have put a great deal of effort and a great many resources into raising welfare standards and ending the sow stall and tether systems. In addition, pigs in this country are not fed meat and bone meal, as they often are on the continent.

I must stress that the pig industry has not come to the Government asking for more subsidies—in fact, it is not subsidised. It has asked only for recognition of its high welfare and quality standards, and it is absolutely right to do so. I might have a little word of encouragement for the industry. Today, my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture met the British Retail Consortium, which represents all the major retail supermarkets. It has agreed with my right hon. Friend that it will no longer stock pigmeat or bacon that comes from sow stall and tether systems or from pigs that are fed meat and bone meal. That is a tremendous step forward. As I said, this is not about being a little Englander but about fair competition.

Of course, some continental producers produce pigmeat to the same standards as we do. That is fine; that is what fair competition is about, but it is not unreasonable for the British Retail Consortium to recognise the particularly high standards that prevail in pig production in the UK. Of course, the customer also wants high standards. The consortium also discussed with the Ministry the fact that some imported meat is packed in the UK and then marketed as British meat. It has assured us that it is going to take action in that regard, and I congratulate it on that.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley rightly said, the Ministry of Defence is sourcing 100 per cent. of its pigmeat, 50 per cent. of its bacon and—eventually—all of its beef from the UK. We shall of course use our influence on other Departments and on local government, not in an attempt to restrict trade but in order to get recognition of the high standards operated by the livestock sector.

We have been listening to suggestions from the industry and have listened to the points made this evening. We have also been considering the various options. Of course, there are cost implications involved in any package, and any measures have to take their place among other Government priorities when it comes to the allocation of available resources. It is the kind of case that my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley has made this evening, and the way in which he has made it, that influences the Government. I assure him that he can tell his farmers tomorrow that we have listened carefully to what he and his colleagues have said. I assure him that what he has said tonight will influence what happens.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Ten o'clock.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Robert Ainsworth.]

Health and Safety

9.34 am

Mr. Michael Clapham (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I have been fortunate in securing a debate on an important subject. However, I should begin by congratulating the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) on his recent promotion.

Because of the nature of their work, some people are more vulnerable than others; nevertheless, occupational health and safety affects everyone in the world of employment. I therefore welcome the priority that the Government have given to occupational health and safety.

This year, the Health and Safety Executive will receive a £4.45 million increase, reversing cuts agreed by the previous Administration. That increase also signals an end to government hostility towards, and neglect of, occupational health and safety, which were all too apparent during the previous Administration's 18 years in office. The previous Administration were particularly hostile towards trade unions' role in occupational health and safety. They were also preoccupied with deregulation, and that distracted them from considering health and safety issues. It is good that that situation has ended.

Other Departments in the new Government are complementing the action being taken by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions. The Department of Health's Green Paper on public health, for example, will address the issue of occupational health and safety. I am pleased that the new Government are making health and safety a much higher priority.

I should say that not all of my suggestions and questions in this debate will fall within the remit of my hon. Friend the Minister. Some may be dealt with only by a joint approach, which is already under way, among Departments and others.

Earlier this year, the Health and Safety Executive and the Department of Health sponsored a conference to focus on the health and safety needs of those working in small and medium enterprises. The Government's "Public Health" Green Paper was started after the conference. Before the conference, the Health and Safety Executive circulated a document entitled, "Developing an Occupational Health Strategy for Great Britain". The closing date for submissions on the document to the Health and Safety Executive is 11 December 1998, and I urge all my hon. Friends and other hon. Members to make their submissions on developing an occupational health strategy before that date.

I shall deal first with stress. It is estimated that approximately 19.5 million working days are lost annually because of ill health. Statistics provided by the Health and Safety Executive show that, of those lost days, about 7 million working days are lost because of stress-related illness. Stress is increasing annually, and is very much related to changes in employment structures. Flexible working, for example, has been introduced as a response to globalisation, creating uncertainty that causes unease, discomfort and stress. A second factor contributing to increased stress is the quest for ever-greater productivity, to ensure our competitiveness. Inadequate investment in British industry is a contributing factor to such stress.

I wish to elaborate on that a little because it is clearly related to the problem of stress in British industry. Some hon. Members may have seen an article in The Sunday Times of 11 October written by Andrew Lorenz and David Smith. It was based on the McKinsey studies carried out for the Treasury, and some of the figures were astonishing. For example, it showed that our main competitors—Germany, Japan, America and France—invest far more per worker than the UK. Germany invests a massive 67 per cent. more; Japan invests 55 per cent. more; America invests 52 per cent. more and France invests 46 per cent. more. If those figures show anything, it is that workers are as good as the tools provided for them to work with. As less is invested in British workers, enormous pressure is put on them to produce more to meet that competitive agenda.

Mr. Ken Purchase (Wolverhampton, North-East): I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's remarks on investment—they would be echoed throughout industry—but is it not also true that, at the point of production, the greatest problem on the shop floor is stress and the drive for greater productivity? Does it not lead to that well-known syndrome of the "tear arser", who puts other people's safety in danger, as well as his or her own? Should not my hon. Friend now deal with that matter, given that so many injuries are caused to people on the shop floor as a result?

Mr. Clapham: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention. As a result of those pressures on the shop floor, supervisory staff and managers often resort to bullying. That feature is clearly shown in a recent study by the Trade Union Congress, which showed that bullying is one of the main characteristics that leads to stress. We must also bear in mind that, in the teaching, social work and nursing professions, society's demand for greater accountability, which is quite right, has led to more administration. When that is added to all the other pressures, it leads to stress.

Will the Minister consult the Health and Safety Commission, which has been looking at this issue for some time, to see what action it has taken? We require stress management strategies, perhaps embraced within an approved code of practice. If that were applied in industry, we could start to deal with stress. Unless we take action, more and more working days will be lost.

The cost of work-related ill health is immense. An estimated 2 million people a year suffer from work-related illness and 250 to 300 people a year die from work-related injuries. The figure for 1997-98 was 268 and for the previous year it was 287. Thus, there is still an enormous death toll. Moreover, of the estimated 10,000 deaths related to ill health, 3,000 to 4,000 are caused by exposure to asbestos. The human suffering caused by that carnage is immeasurable, and the cost to the economy is enormous. The chairman of the Health and Safety Commission, who spoke at an all-party group on occupational health and safety earlier this year, estimated that the cost to the economy was between £16 billion and £18 billion—a huge sum by anyone's reckoning. If we are to reduce that figure, we must develop strategies that can be used in industry to prevent the development of stress.

Last week, the National Association of Occupational Health Projects held a seminar in the House. It was addressed by Professor Malcolm Harrington of the occupational health department at Birmingham university, by the Minister for Public Health, by a representative of the Health and Safety Executive and by various speakers from occupational health projects throughout the country. The seminar drew attention to the enormous amount of work that occupational health projects have done in the past 20 years. Those involved work in the community and help to identify the causes of work-related illnesses. They also work with trade unions and management to create preventative strategies. Their work in the past 20 years is enormously valuable.

A few of the occupational health projects are funded by the Department of Health, but the vast majority depend on an assortment of funding. Many spend much of their energy raising funding in order merely to survive. I should like the health improvement plans drawn up by area health authorities to embrace the work done by the occupational health projects. The health projects could then engage with local primary care groups, which would add to their valuable contribution and extend it to improving the health of the nation.

Thus, occupational health projects play a valuable part in protecting the health of the community. Some years ago, they came up against the problem of the increasing number of people diagnosed as suffering from asbestosis or mesothelioma cancer caused by asbestos. We know from statistics that have been provided that, every year, between 3,000 and 4,000 people will die in the UK as a result of exposure to asbestos. Government estimates suggest that that figure will continue to increase, and could reach 10,000 deaths by 2020.

Since 1985, blue and brown asbestos have been banned in the UK, but large amounts of white asbestos are still entering the country. Much of it is contained in materials used in the construction industry. May I suggest that the Minister's Department send a memorandum to other Departments that are involved in large construction programmes, such as the Departments of Health and of Education and Employment, advising them to tell contractors working on those construction programmes not to use materials that contain white asbestos? It is not always easy to discern materials that contain white asbestos because they are badly labelled and often come from eastern Europe. Contractors do not always know that some roof tiles, floor tiles and piping contain white asbestos. It is therefore important that the two Departments with major construction programmes are made aware that many of the materials used in construction contain white asbestos.

The evidence that white asbestos is dangerous to health is overwhelming. The Health and Safety Executive accepts that there is no safe threshold for working with white asbestos. In most areas where it is used, safe and adequate substitutes exist.

Earlier this year, the Health and Safety Commission commissioned research by Leicester university after a bizarre decision had been made in one of the European technical committees that asbestos substitutes may be more dangerous than white asbestos. That research has now been completed and published and it shows that white asbestos is more of a hazard than the substitutes used to replace it. In addition, the Department of Health's committee on carcinogenicity stresses that, wherever possible, alternatives to asbestos should be used. Finally, if that were not sufficient evidence, nine EU countries have implemented their own unilateral bans on white asbestos.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who is president of the Council of Europe's Social, Health and Family Affairs Committee has steered through a report calling for a ban on white asbestos. I pay tribute to his work in processing that report.

Had it not been for the Canadian producers keeping Europe at bay, we might have already imposed a ban, but the Canadian producers would have us believe that white asbestos is so safe that we could pour it on our cornflakes in the morning. They do not realise the problem, or will not accept the evidence that it is a dangerous material. However, Europe is not their real target. Their target is the third world, where there are no controls. They know full well that it offers a limitless market. At the same time, through the World Trade Organisation, they can obstruct a European ban. There is a tendency for such matters to become caught up in interminable bureaucracy.

If it appears to my hon. Friend the Minister that the move towards a European ban is becoming bogged down and there seems to be little progress, will he consider pressing ahead with a unilateral United Kingdom ban to protect future generations? In my view, that should be done as soon as possible.

Even when we have dealt with white asbestos by prohibition, there are still problems to be faced. One is enforcement. Although stringent regulations have been in place since 1983, there are still difficulties with enforcement. I note that the Health and Safety Executive has become more vigorous, but resources are limited and inspections and fines are inadequate. The record shows that 768 companies are licensed to work removing asbestos in demolishing buildings yet, between 1990 and 1993, the average fine for violation of the regulations was £1,570. During that three-year period, no company had its licence revoked.

I am aware that there has been a more vigorous approach recently and, in 1996, a contractor was imprisoned for exposing his workers to asbestos while demolishing an old factory in Bristol. So there are signs that the Health and Safety Executive has started to take a more robust approach to breaches of the regulations. Nevertheless, I want to press my hon. Friend the Minister to take the matter up with the Health and Safety Executive and ensure that the regulations are stringently applied and the level of fines is significantly increased. That would send a clear signal that the Health and Safety Executive and people at large were not prepared to accept violation of the regulations.

Mr. Purchase: My hon. Friend addresses the matter with great knowledge. Does he accept that the conditions under which people go to work are such that a worker complaining about such a situation and ultimately refusing to work in those conditions would probably be sacked? If he had been employed for less than 12 months, he would have no redress whatever. Is it not a simple matter of giving individual workers more power to take responsibility for their own health and safety at work without the fear of instant retribution and sacking?

Mr. Clapham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention and I accept his point. I shall deal with that issue when I discuss safety representatives. I have some proposals for my hon. Friend the Minister, but it is quite true that, at present, anyone who raises an objection in the workplace faces the threat of dismissal, and that needs to be addressed.

Let me return to the problem of asbestos. Even with rigid enforcement, there are still difficulties because there is an enormous amount of the stuff in public buildings. The TUC has suggested that there should be a responsibility and a duty on the owners of buildings to audit their buildings, identify the asbestos and label it. That might improve maintenance. The fact that asbestos has been identified does not mean that it has immediately to be whipped out of a building. Provided that it is managed properly, it can be maintained safely until such time as it can be removed. An audit would certainly result in better maintenance. Such an audit would make it possible to have a public register of such buildings for the purposes of compensation.

When people are found at postmortem to have died from asbestosis, it is difficult to trace the workplace where they were in contact with asbestos. One of the security men who works in this place told me that his father-in-law was found to have died from mesothelioma cancer. As he had been a clockmaker all his life, it became extremely difficult for him to establish a claim for benefit because he had to prove that he had been in a workplace where there had been asbestos. It took 18 months to get the appeal board to accept that he had worked somewhere where he had been exposed to asbestos, despite the fact that he died from mesothelioma cancer. Under those circumstances, setting a common law damage claim on its feet is almost impossible.

I am aware that there has been a consultation document on the subject. Will my hon. Friend the Minister ask the Health and Safety Executive to expedite the matter to give people access to a register? More importantly, I note that, last year, something like 1,350 postmortems reported mesothelioma as the cause of death. There must be an accessible register of workplaces that have asbestos in their structure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase) referred to the pressures brought to bear on workers. October this year saw the 21st anniversary of the Safety Representatives and Safety Committees Regulations 1977. The TUC estimates that there are more than 200,000 workers, safety representatives. They are appointed wherever there are recognised trade unions. That is important for the package of rights that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is steering through. The extension of trade union recognition will give an opportunity for the appointment of safety representatives in more workplaces, which is a very important step.

The enormous amount of work done by workers' safety representatives is one of the major reasons for the reduction in accidents over the past 20 years. The TUC's survey of the statistics shows that companies that have appointed safety representatives and have joint union-management safety committees have 50 per cent. fewer accidents than those which do not have the same procedures. That shows the benefit of having safety representatives. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East said, increasing the number of safety representatives would remove some of the pressure and fear for their jobs that people feel if they raise safety issues, because the worker would be able to raise the point with the safety representative, who could then take it up with management and ensure, through the safety committee, that positive action was taken.

I accept that the structure of British industry has changed in the past 20 years. Gone are the larger units of production. There are more small and medium enterprises, employing an increasing proportion of the population. There is often no trade union organisation and management has little access to information about health and safety. I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to direct the Health and Safety Commission to work with the TUC and industry to devise a system of roving safety representatives who could be on hand to provide advice to small and medium enterprises. I should also like him to ask the Health and Safety Commission to carry out a study on the impact of extending the rights of safety representatives. If we gave safety representatives the right to stop the job and serve enforcement notices, as safety representatives in Sweden and Australia can, management would not have the opportunity to sack a worker who dared to raise a problem about safety on the shop floor.

Although we have stringent regulations on the issue, the reporting of accidents in the mining industry has caused the mining unions a great deal of concern. They have long argued that there has been massive under-reporting. The National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers, which is the safety union in the industry, says that there is clear evidence that there was massive under-reporting from 1988 until recently. The Health and Safety Executive has taken that on board. I raised the matter in June during business questions, when the HSE had issued a document that showed clearly that there had been under-reporting in the mining industry. The frequent failure to include accidents that cause an absence of three days or those that occur during weekend working has skewed the statistics.

The constant pressure brought by NACODS on the issue resulted in the publication in June of details of the Health and Safety Executive's audit, which showed that there had been 52 per cent. under-reporting. NACODS contends that the figure is greater—as high as 300 per cent. NACODS rejects the HSE's excuse. I understand that the general secretary of NACODS was told by the chief executive of the HSE that 52 per cent. under-reporting of accidents is normal. The unions do not accept that, and neither do I. I accept that there is bound to be some under-reporting, but for a figure of 52 per cent. to be accepted as normal is excessive.

[Mr. Clapham]

When accidents are not reported, there is no follow-up, which means further accidents that could have been avoided. It is very important that we ensure rigorous reporting of accidents. Last week, the HSC, perhaps as a result of the pressure that I have referred to, issued a consultation document, "A Duty to Report Accidents". I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will impress on the HSE the need for an overhaul of accident reporting in a framework that will allow the creation of prevention strategies. The HSE should be reminded of that, because we must have follow-up procedures from which further strategies can be developed that will prevent further accidents.

I want to finish where I started, by welcoming the higher priority given by this Government to health and safety. There is still much to be done. The 18 years of Toryism worsened health and safety provision. The Minister could signal a new determination, in the context of the higher priority given by the Government, by making it clear to industry that he will be pressing for higher fines and sentences for health and safety offences.

10.9 am

Mr. David Chidgey (Eastleigh): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on securing this debate. As he has demonstrated, health and safety at work is a very wide and diverse issue. I shall concentrate on just three areas in order to allow other hon. Members to contribute to the debate.

Far too many people are killed or injured in the workplace. Greater effort must be made to improve health in the working environment. Let us take the construction industry as a case in point. Hon. Members will know that I spent much of my working life as a consulting engineer in that industry, so I speak with some experience when I say that it still has one of the highest fatality rates.

The Minister, whom I congratulate on his appointment, may be aware—these may be cross-departmental concerns—of the important progress of the introduction of roll-over protection structures regulations. The fitting of ROPS make construction plants safer. I welcome the measure; they will save lives and reduce injuries. The Minister may, however, be aware that, although industry welcomes the measure, too, it has concerns. That is particularly so in my constituency, which has a high concentration of plant-hire firms.

The industry has raised concerns about the timing and implementation of the new regulations. There is no question but that they are important. Not a single life should be lost through unnecessary delay in their implementation. The Minister may be aware of industry claims that equipment manufacturers have nowhere near enough capacity to supply the conversion kits that are necessary to modify all plants in time to meet the new standards when the regulations come into force. I am in no position to give a view on whether that is so.

The Minister may argue that the introduction of the new regulations has been signalled for some time. The key issue is when the United Kingdom regulations were drafted. What guidance was industry given on the UK version of the European regulations so that it could make precise arrangements to meet them? What assessment have Government officials made of the industry's capacity to meet the demand for conversion kits? What assessment was made of the lead time to supply the kits in order for the industry to be able to comply with the regulations? The Minister may not be able to reply today; perhaps he will later. We need answers to those important questions.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Alan Meale): I assure the hon. Gentleman that I am aware of all concerns in the industry. In fact, next week—I think—I am meeting another hon. Member and representatives of the industry in my office. I invite the hon. Gentleman, too. I am aware of the serious concern, but I think that there are ways in which we can get round the difficulties.

Mr. Chidgey: I am very grateful to the Minister for replying so promptly. I very much hope to be able to join the delegation in his office. I should like to establish whether he is satisfied that there has been sufficient consultation, assessment and planning. We need to consider such practice for future models. We must ensure that new regulations can be introduced sensibly and effectively. If the Minister is satisfied, it could be argued that the industry is being disingenuous, which I hardly think is the case. There is a genuine will by all parties to improve safety in construction.

Health and safety at work has come a long way since we began introducing kicker boards on construction sites and insisting that hard hats were worn. Health and safety science extends well beyond immediate concerns, such as accident investigation and reporting, on which the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone commented. It has gone well beyond the compilation of exposure limits for hazardous chemicals. Long-term research is essential in order to anticipate potential risks of changing work practices.

In the past—even today—we have been concerned with accidents in mines and on construction sites. Now, new risks are associated with working practices in the electronic office, such as the rise in the number of upper-limb disorders. A new area of risk in the workplace, and to the public at large, is associated with emerging technologies, such as genetic modification. The Minister will be aware of public concern over the release and marketing of genetically modified organisms, and perhaps of calls for a total ban on them—or, at the very least, a moratorium on their introduction into the food chain.

The Minister may also be aware that, in 1995, the Health and Safety Commission's advisory committee on genetic modification published a report entitled, "Genetic Modification—Risks and Safeguards". What action are the Government taking in the light of that report? I appreciate that the Minister has not had notice of the question, but I would like an answer. What progress is being made on a rational assessment of the risks to the public of introducing GMOs into the food chain? When do the Government expect to be able to introduce sensible, pragmatic, and above all, risk-free regulations to protect and preserve public safety?

Several key areas must be addressed across this wide-ranging issue. I hope that I have made it clear that everything from the implementation of improved safety measures in the construction industry, to better understanding of risk assessment, the duty of care in the workplace and electronic office, and scientific developments in food needs to be addressed within the remit of health and safety.

I conclude by reinforcing, to a degree, some of the points made by the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone. It is especially important that companies which breach health and safety law face penalties that recognise the gravity of the offence—indeed, imprisonment, where the offence is serious enough to warrant it. Far more needs to be done to impress on employers their responsibilities in the workplace. Employees should be empowered by having responsibility for monitoring and improving working conditions. They should be able to refuse to undertake unsafe work without suffering social security penalties, such as the withdrawal of benefit. The Health and Safety Executive must be properly staffed and funded in both a policing and advisory role. I hope that the Minister will respond to some of those points.

Mrs. Ann Cryer (Keighley): The subject of this important debate could have a profound effect on the lives of very many of our constituents. I shall concentrate my comments on the dangers of asbestos.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) mentioned that, in April, my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), as rapporteur of the Social, Health and Family Affairs Committee of the Council of Europe, of which I am a member, compiled a report, "Dangers of asbestos for workers and the environment". I should like to quote from the summary of his recommendations.

"Ever since the health dangers of asbestos were discovered in the 1960s and there was widespread concern, many countries have introduced regulations on asbestos use, disposal and removal. However, these measures, though sometimes stringent, are not enough to eliminate all risks.

The report therefore advocates that legislative action for a total ban would be the only effective solution to this problem in the medium-term."

The summary also encourages further research into asbestos substitutes, and finishes by saying:

"Even if the use of asbestos were to be eliminated in Europe, the problem remains . . . in other countries, especially within the Third World, and this requires special measures on the export of asbestos-containing products."

The report was eventually approved after a long and heated debate for which many amendments—22, I believe—were tabled by the Russian delegation because of their vested interest in the production of chrysotile, or white asbestos, and in the teeth of a great deal of lobbying behind the scenes by the Québecois members of the Canadian Parliament, who hold observer status at the Council of Europe. Again, their opposition was due to vested interests in the production of chrysotile.

I put on the record my appreciation of the work that my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting did on the report, and of the enormous help that the GMB union gave with the research. I hope that our Government will take the recommendations on board.

I was unaware of the dangers posed by asbestos until, in the early 1970s, I saw a moving television documentary called "Alice—A fight for life", which told the story of Alice, who was brought up in a terraced house in Hebden Bridge in the west riding of Yorkshire. As a child she had played in the streets with asbestos, making "snowballs". The asbestos had been emitted by Acre mill, nearby, and after a long and vitriolic legal struggle, Turner Newall—or Turners Asbestos, as it had been—eventually paid her compensation related to the asbestosis from which she died shortly afterwards.

In my constituency of Keighley, money is spent year after year by Bradford metropolitan district council, our education authority, on treating and removing asbestos from school buildings because it has become unstable, or because roof replacements, rewiring, refurbishment or other necessary repairs have exposed the substance. We have many children who enter school without English, and many more from extremely poor homes, so our education budget is constantly under pressure, and we would much prefer the money to be spent on the education of our children.

However, we do not have the luxury of choice, especially since the death of Shirley Gibson, a teacher who worked for the London borough of Greenwich. Shirley was 37 years old, and the coroner's inquest concluded that her death, from mesothelioma, was caused by being in contact with asbestos in her classroom.

Another story to hit the headlines in West Yorkshire, similar to Alice's story but very recent, is the tragic case of June Hancock. She died on 19 July last year, having won her claim for compensation against Turner Newall because she suffered from mesothelioma, also caused by playing in the streets with asbestos, this time near the company's factory in Armley, Leeds.

The campaign against asbestos waged by June and her supporters, together with other groups, including trade unions, may have saved the lives of children in the Birmingham area. Heightened public awareness led to the discovery of children playing with illegally dumped asbestos, and it was rapidly removed.

The cases that I have mentioned are those of women and children, who did not work in the asbestos industry or related industries, such as construction or car repairs, where the vast majority of cases of asbestos-related diseases are found. I have used those cases to bring the personal individual tragedies into the debate, rather than depending on exchanges of statistics.

I hope that, before too long, we shall see improved methods of detection and treatment for existing asbestos in buildings, and improved detection, treatment and care of those suffering from asbestos-related diseases, including those whose disease is as yet undetected or latent. I also hope for an eventual total ban on the use of all forms of asbestos, including chrysotile, because all forms of asbestos can cause asbestosis and lung cancer.

A Québecois representative at the Council of Europe said that white asbestos is safe if used correctly. Unfortunately, both the building industry and car repair workshops are notoriously difficult to monitor, not least because of low trade union membership.

Almost half of the European Union countries already ban all new asbestos, and I trust that we will soon follow them. To push the argument further, I will bore hon. Members with just a few statistics. In France, 2,000 people died from asbestos-related diseases in 1996; in the United Kingdom in the same year, 3,000 died from the same cause—there were 30 deaths in Sheffield alone—while in the whole of Austria, after a 20-year ban on all forms of new asbestos, the figure was 30, the same as Sheffield's, for the same period.

[Mrs. Ann Cryer]

We already have alternatives to asbestos, and there may be room for improvements. If so, what better way to celebrate the millennium—which would conform to both Christian and Jewish teachings—than to convert some of our too many swords into the proverbial ploughshares? We could use a fraction of the enormous sums spent on research and development for means of destroying life, through weapons technology and methods of delivery, to find a means of saving millions of lives through the development of safe, efficient and affordable alternatives to deadly asbestos.

Finally, I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone for calling for the debate, for his excellent contribution—especially what he said about whistleblowers—and for the sterling work that he has devoted to the subject over many years. With his help, and with that of others in this place and of the trade unions, health and safety at work has been, and will be, kept where it belongs, high on our political agenda.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on securing the debate. I practised as a personal injury solicitor for 20 years, and coincidentally, I started in practice two weeks before the safety representative regulations came into force. I believe that I dealt with the first fatal accident under the regulations; tragically, it occurred during the small hours of the morning that the regulations came into force.

In my 20 years in practice, I investigated thousands of accidents, from the horrors of the tragedies of King's Cross and Zeebrugge to the more commonplace slipping, tripping and lifting accidents—including the bizarre, such as the accident in which the fire station where a firefighter worked burnt down. The vast majority of those accidents were avoidable with foresight, and would not have occured if the precautions eventually recommended had been undertaken at the time.

My hon. Friend described the cost of accidents to the country. I am concerned by recent press coverage, which has become judgmental, and tries to separate out deserving and undeserving accident victims, often on the basis of ill-informed and unfair comment. That does not help to instil the safety culture that we need in our workplace.

The best example is the apocryphal McDonald's coffee case in America, in which people criticised the lady concerned for claiming compensation. In fact, McDonald's had super-heated the coffee way beyond the temperature that would be expected in an ordinary kettle, and the lady suffered terrible third-degree burns. Those facts are rarely reported.

More recently, we have heard attacks on public sector workers for bringing compensation claims—yet we hear little comment on the health and safety record of the public sector in the fire service, the police service and the health service. There is much room for improvement there, but it gets little press coverage.

My hon. Friends the Members for Barnsley, West and Penistone and for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer) have described the new challenge for health and safety posed by the drive for greater productivity. Speeding up outdated machinery and processes often results in accidents. I recently dealt with the case of a young man aged 16 who lost his fingers in a press. The machine was old and badly maintained, and the guard was faulty. The boy was under pressure to improve his productivity, and he lost his fingers. That illustrates the need for proper investment. When we talk about higher productivity, we must consider the consequences—consequences such as those that my hon. Friends have described.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) talked about the risks associated with new processes. Thirty years ago, some of the risks of asbestos were known, but they were little publicised. The risk of industrial deafness was unknown, yet the thousands of claims now coming through show what tragedies took place, especially in shipbuilding and heavy engineering. The insurers may pay the financial price, but the real price is paid by the workers in their quality of life, and sometimes with their very lives.

Now we have new risks. The hon. Member for Eastleigh mentioned some of them. There is repetitive strain injury and eyestrain caused by keyboards and screens, and all sorts of additional stresses that we are starting to notice. The increasing use of chemicals will have unknown consequences. We must be on our guard against such future risks.

The new safety challenges have brought new safety regulations, through the European Union directives of a few years ago—the so-called six-pack. That introduced the new concept of risk assessments. Much lip service is paid to risk assessments, but they may not be done properly. Perhaps the best example is in the manual handling regulations, where the first step in the risk assessment should be to determine whether the lifting operation is necessary or could be avoided. That often becomes the last question, rather than the first.

Mr. Chidgey: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, although the concept of duty of care and risk assessment is a major step forward, little has yet been done to monitor the effectiveness of risk assessments?

Mr. Dismore: I agree with the broad thrust of what the hon. Gentleman says, and I would be sorry if the only way in which we could monitor effectiveness was through court cases involving people who had been injured through risk assessments not being done properly.

We in this House could also set a good example. I recently had an independent safety audit carried out on my constituency office, which produced a few things that I need to have done. We must also ensure that we comply with health and safety regulations when visiting factories or construction sites in our constituencies and more widely. I regret that a Conservative Member, whom I accompanied on a recent site visit to Portcullis house, was not complying with safety regulations because he refused to wear a safety helmet. I brought that to his attention at the time, and have done so subsequently.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone mentioned problems concerning safety regulations and the need for better enforcement. The regulations work by consent, and generally work well, but there are problems when they do not work. The big problem is enforcement, because regulations can be enforced only through the Health and Safety Executive or by the Attorney-General.

I dealt with a case involving the fire service a few years ago. It wanted to hold an exercise off-site in a derelict building of the sort that is torched for dramatic effect in "London's Burning". The union wanted to inspect the building to make sure that it was safe for the drills that were to be conducted, but it was refused access by the employers. We investigated the position and there was no possible way for the union to bring enforcement action to make sure that its legal rights were respected.

I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to consider whether we can have independent enforcement—perhaps by the trade unions, which would act responsibly—in cases where the HSE will not act, often because pressure of work means that it cannot conduct the vast bulk of the tasks that it needs to carry out.

The Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 contained major advances in health and safety in this country, and they were built on by regulations. Again, part of the problem—due to pressure of work on the HSE which is not alleviated, and no matter how much extra we put into it—is enforcement. There are new employment law rights to walk off the job if it is dangerous, and for safety representatives to stop work if it is dangerous, but they are difficult to enforce because there is always the fear of victimisation. I would like a system where not only the HSE, but workers and trade unions, could bring private prosecutions for breaches of the regulations in the most serious cases. That would plug the big gap in health and safety enforcement.

We also need to consider the definition of "worker", because a lot of the dodging of health and safety regulations has revolved around saying, "This person is not a worker; he is a self-employed contractor." Work practices are changing, so we must consider the definition of "worker" in respect of health and safety enforcement activities.

Accidents will inevitably happen, but we need to make sure that we are able to find out why. The victim is entitled to know why that accident happened, and to an apology from his employers, if it was their fault. A lack of such explanations and such information, including information released by the HSE, encourages claims. Injured workers want to find out what happened, and many of my clients have said to me, "I don't want this sort of accident to happen to someone else, and that's why I am bringing the claim." If action had been taken, and if explanations had been given, those claims may have been avoided.

We have problems of uninsured employers, and we should consider schemes to overcome them. We also need a register of insurers to enable employees who bring claims—for example, for asbestosis—to track down the insurers concerned and the records so that they can find out what happened.

With a Labour Government we have, as my hon. Friends have said, a greater commitment to health and safety. We have come a long way, but there is a long way to go. There is no room for complacency—the risks to health and safety are ever-present, and enforcement action is always expensive. We need to build on the great experience of trade unions and safety representatives in trying to tackle those problems.

Mr. Ian Stewart (Eccles): I am pleased to be able to participate in the debate, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on securing it. He is an assiduous and committed chair of the all-party group on occupational health and safety, of which I am a member. I also congratulate the new Under–Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale), and look forward to discussing a number of health and safety issues with him directly.

Earlier this year, I was lucky to secure a half-hour Adjournment debate on health and safety representatives, and I should like to make a few follow-up points later.

Hon. Members have referred to the cost to industry of days lost through ill-health—£5 billion a year. In the recent debate on the working time directive, my north-west colleague, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Trade and Industry, reminded the House that the Confederation of British Industry estimated that £25 billion was lost to the economy in the last year of the Conservative Government due to unregulated absenteeism. The Health and Safety Executive's figures show that 500,000 workers suffer from stress and anxiety caused, or aggravated, by work.

I am proud that Labour's employment and industrial reforms will improve the benefits and rights of millions of workers in relation to wage levels, sick pay and holiday entitlement. I look forward to employee rights to representation being improved in legislation to implement the White Paper, "Fairness at Work". I believe that those measures will improve employees' financial and emotional well-being, but improved occupational health and safety provisions are essential, too.

Measures to improve the identification of work-related health problems, and to treat them effectively, are important. Stress management and counselling have gained vogue in recent years, but the HSE's own research shows that stress counselling is of little value. Jogging in the lunch break or line dancing after work may reduce stress, but will not tackle the cause.

As has been flagged up by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), most Members of Parliament are employers of one or more full-time staff, or the equivalent. We must take responsibility for ensuring that we have regard to the occupational health and safety needs of our staff.

The HSE issues guidance on stress reduction, but a joint Transport and General Workers Union-university of Manchester institute of science and technology survey a few years ago sadly found it to be totally ineffective. The Trades Union Congress, trade unions and many other organisations want a specific workplace stress law that is enforced. I understand that the CBI is not in favour of that proposal, or even of a weaker HSE-approved code of practice on workplace stress. I hope that the Government will end that deadlock, legislate and make progress with all interested parties so that we can have measures that will be effective in reducing workplace stress. That would not only reduce human suffering, but cut national health service costs and improve United Kingdom productivity.

Earlier, I flagged up the issue of health and safety representatives. As a full-time trade union officer for 20 years, one of my key objectives was to raise employee awareness of health and safety issues. I believe that trade union-appointed safety representatives have a crucial role in that regard, and in taking up concerns with employers.

[Mr. Ian Stewart]

Many employees on short-term contracts—who are part-time and in small workplaces, or who may be getting older and are simply too frightened of losing their jobs—will not complain to their employer about hazardous workplaces. There are now 200,000 trade union-appointed safety representatives under the auspices of the Safety Representatives and Safety Committees Regulations 1977, but only 50 per cent. of the work force is covered by such representatives.

In my Adjournment debate in May, I asked the Government to consider the introduction of roving safety representatives, as there are in Sweden. The Minister gave me no commitment on that point, but said that the arrangements for health and safety consultation should be reviewed, and that that review should also consider how the role of such representatives could be strengthened. It was suggested that the Health and Safety Commission would carry out the review. I am concerned because I have heard through the grapevine that the commission and the Health and Safety Executive are still awaiting a referral from the Minister before they start the review. I hope that the new Minister will be able to confirm that such a referral is in hand.

Finally, I understand that, at the climate change conference initiated by the Trade Union Congress last week, a related question was put to the Deputy Prime Minister, who was asked to extend the health and safety responsibilities of trade union representatives to include the environment. I have heard through my efficient grapevine that he has agreed that that should be considered as part of the general review. I hope that the Minister agrees with him and I look forward to the review being established. I also hope that it will produce early proposals for improvement.

Mr. Bernard Jenkin (North Essex): First, I join hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on obtaining this debate. He spoke with knowledge and passion on his subject and raised a number of questions and we look forward to hearing answers from the Minister—questions about consultation with the Health and Safety Executive in the workplace, the future of asbestos and the HSE's role with regard to safety representatives in small and medium enterprises. The hon. Gentleman also wanted the Minister to impress on the HSE the need for a complete overhaul of accident reporting and follow-up procedures. I trust that the Minister will deal with those points and I shall not use this occasion to ask him about the health and safety of planning offices in north London, but will congratulate him on his appointment.

The debate has been extraordinarily one-sided. Of course, health and safety in the workplace are important, indeed, vital issues. The record of both the main political parties on health and safety is good and the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 represented a consolidation of measures that had hitherto been adopted under Governments of both parties. Health and safety legislation has developed considerably since that date—many of the developments took place under the previous Conservative Government.

This Government inherited a Health and Safety Executive with 4,000 employees, which is about one for every 15,000 employees in the workplace and compares favourably with the situation in most of our European competitor countries. One reason why the then Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher so favoured the Single European Act was because she thought that similar health and safety provisions to those that we were imposing on our industry should be imposed in other European Community member states.

The Labour Government inherited a good record. In the last 10 years of Conservative Government, the number of deaths in the workplace halved. In 1997, there were 249 fatalities, compared with 1,310 in Germany in the same period. So, we have a good record and a good Conservative tradition on health and safety. In debates, when Conservatives object to a health and safety measure, Labour Members often argue that we would still be sending children up chimneys, but it was a Conservative Government who introduced the law to stop that in the first place. Let us hope that we can consider this matter on an all-party basis rather than in such a one-sided way.

The hon. Members for Barnsley, West and Penistone and for Eccles (Mr. Stewart) mentioned stress in the workplace and how it causes absenteeism. Stress can be caused by low morale, low productivity and poor management, which are all concerns with which we want to deal as well as health and safety. However, nothing causes greater stress and unhappiness than being unemployed. People without jobs are generally much more stressed than those with them. The great danger of becoming over-enthusiastic about health and safety legislation is that we can create over-regulation. We can all think of wonderful new contexts for creating rules, but all parties must understand that there are limits to their reasonableness and that it is far more difficult to undo unnecessary burdens on business than to impose them.

We have had our share of ludicrous extremes; for example, the general thrust of regulations to control substances hazardous to health in the workplace was good, but we ended up with office workers having to keep a register of Tippex supplies as it was classed as a hazardous substance. That is a case of taking health and safety regulations to extremes.

The gold plating of European Community directives is an ever-present problem. The hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) mentioned the manual handling directive, which gives no guidelines for the weights that it is safe for people to lift, so our civil servants had to invent some. One effect of the directive was to reduce the maximum size of a bag of plaster from 40 kg to 25 kg. Most people were capable of lifting 40 kg, but 25 kg is now deemed to be the safe weight and as a result many workers now carry two bags at once, which makes 50 kg. The regulation has not only been costly to the industry, which had to re-tool to enable it to fill the different size bag with plaster, but has turned out to be counter-productive, as it has encouraged people to carry heavier weights.

The health and safety at work regulations of 1993 were intended to reflect an EC directive and require written risk assessments. There has been much talk of such assessments, but the bureaucracy of every business having to undertake them, when they might not obviously and instantly be necessary, underlines how we have added bureaucracy and burden to industry. The deregulation task force was designed to deal with such excesses, but had hardly begun its work before the new Government were elected and decided to change it for a better regulatory task force.

There are plenty of examples of absurd regulation and of matters being taken to an extreme. One case concerned a boy who used to earn £20 a week helping a milkman. That was stopped when the milkman received a warning letter from the local authority telling him that he would be fined £1,000 if he did not stop employing the boy. In another case a man was refused a job because he was too tall. The basis of the decision was concern for his back because of the health and safety regulations, but he won his case of unreasonable dismissal on the basis that men are taller than women and therefore it was sexual discrimination. The danger of over-regulation is that it is a feast for the lawyers, such as the hon. Member for Hendon, but costs everyone else a great deal of money.

The sick leave bill for the public sector, which is about £3 billion a year is not helped by the fact the Occupational Health and Safety Bureau has one of the worst records.

The working time directive, which we debated earlier this session, is another example of excessive regulation. It is completely alien to the British traditions of freedom and voluntarism in the workplace and will add up to £2.3 billion to business costs. Once again, the regulation has been gold plated. As is inevitable, United Kingdom officials and courts will fill in the gaps in its drafting. The regulations are complex, imposing a huge administrative burden, which will affect some industries much more than others, in particular temporary and seasonal industries.

Will the Minister tell us how the case law of the working time regulations can be prevented from spreading to industries for which they were not intended? At the moment, the transport industry is excluded. The train driver is certainly excluded under the regulations, but what about catering staff on a train? Are they covered if they are employed by the railway company and do they remain covered if they are employed by a sub-contractor? Where is the certainty in regulations that are vaguely drafted?

The directive does nothing for the United Kingdom's competitiveness. It imposes huge costs and will curtail flexible working and harm job creation; it is bureaucratic and will encourage the black economy. Moreover, there was no real demand for it.

Do the Government recognise that the sheer volume and detail of much health and safety regulation represents an unreasonable burden on many businesses, particularly small businesses? What procedures do the Government have for assessing risk in the workplace, as the costs of regulation are so often out of all proportion to the risk? What will the Government do about the gold-plating of EC regulations and directives? Now that the Government have given up the United Kingdom's veto in social chapter matters, which are subject to qualified majority voting, how will they prevent the imposition of costly so-called health and safety regulations, such as the extension of works councils to small businesses?

The Conservative party is in favour of proper health and safety regulation. However, excessive regulation has rightly been described as a form of hidden taxation. Everyone wants a safe workplace—safe workplaces are in the interests of the economy as a whole—but a balance is needed, and that is far from being achieved.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Mr. Alan Meale): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. Clapham) on securing this debate and I thank him for his kind remarks. I listened with considerable interest to his thoughtful contribution and to those of other hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Chidgey) and my hon. Friends the Members for Keighley (Mrs. Cryer), for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mr. Purchase), for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) and for Eccles (Mr. Stewart). I also mention my hon. Friends the Members for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke), who had to leave the Chamber to attend another meeting. I share my hon. Friends' concerns, which reflect many of my priorities.

The Government are firmly committed to high standards of health and safety in the workplace. The hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin) may have claimed that the Conservatives stopped people putting children up chimneys, but it is fair to say that the Government are prepared to give health and safety a higher priority than our predecessors did.

The Health and Safety Commission and the Health and Safety Executive, which were established under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974, have stood the test of time over the past 25 years. They have played a pivotal role in improving standards of health and safety in the United Kingdom, whose record is among the best in Europe.

The Government are far from complacent, not least because, in recent years, the UK's health and safety performance seems to have reached a statistical plateau. We need to put that across, if only as a way in which to achieve even better standards. We want the HSC and the HSE to be strengthened and given the resources that they need to be even more effective.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone said, the most important issue is that of resources. In the current financial year, we provided an extra £4.5 million, restoring the cuts inflicted by the previous Government. Those resources have been targeted on inspection and enforcement by the executive, which is particularly important, as 75 per cent. of health and safety inspectors are on site during their working week. We have recruited 58 new inspectors and are in the process of recruiting a further 126. I shall also shortly be announcing a further and significant increase in resources for the commission and executive under the comprehensive spending review. I cannot yet give the exact figures, but the increase will be good news for health and safety.

I am keen to focus the health and safety agenda on areas that matter to people. The hon. Member for Eastleigh mentioned genetically modified organisms. The Government have announced the formation of a Cabinet Committee on biotechnology, to be chaired by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office. I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's concerns on this complex subject, which the Government are dealing with through that Committee.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone mentioned violence against staff. The Government made it clear in their human resources strategy for the national health service that violence and aggression against staff will not be tolerated. That strategy is essential, as recent figures show that NHS staff are three times more likely to be attacked than members of the public. In June 1997, the NHS executive issued guidance to NHS trusts on dealing with violence as any other health and safety risk.

In December 1997, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission launched the Health Services Advisory Committee guidance on the assessment and management of the risk of violence to staff in the health service. The guidance sets out a framework for action covering a range of control measures, including hardware and physical aspects of the premises, working patterns and practices, staffing levels and competence, training and the means to deal with accidents. It applies not only to hospitals, but to primary and community care, nursing homes, mental health and ambulance services.

The national plan of work for HSE inspectors identifies violence to staff as a key issue to be dealt with during in-depth inspections at hospitals and NHS trusts. HSE inspectors are prepared to enforce the necessary standards, as is shown by the fact that more than 30 notices on violence have been served in the health services since April 1996.

The health of people at work is a key element in the Government's strategy for public health. Far too many people suffer from ill health caused, or made worse, by their work. A recent survey suggested that 2 million people were affected, so an improvement in occupational health standards needs to be a top priority.

The HSE recently issued a discussion document on an occupational health strategy for the next 10 years. As hon. Members know, the Government are already addressing specific occupational health risks, including work-related stress and violence. We recognise that such problems are very distressing to those affected.

We are determined to ensure that work-related violence is tackled effectively. I am seeking advice from the Health and Safety Commission on what can be done on that issue, about which I feel particularly strongly. The HSE is exploring how best to tackle the matter through a committee involving Departments, the TUC, the Confederation of British Industry, the Federation of Small Businesses, Victim Support and, of course, the Suzy Lamplugh Trust. The Cabinet Office women's unit is also developing a strategy.

My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone chose an appropriate day to mention stress, as today is international stress awareness day. It is estimated that 500,000 people suffer from work-related stress, anxiety and depression. My hon. Friend rightly drew attention to the scale of the problem, which the CBI estimates to cost between £7 billion and £9 billion a year; it is also estimated that businesses pay out about £300 million a year in compensation claims. I recently launched HSE guidance on work-related stress aimed specifically at small firms. Moreover, the HSE will campaign to ensure that work-related stress is regarded as a legitimate health and safety issue. The HSC will shortly be considering the feasibility of an approved code of practice.

Of particular concern to many people are the stresses of bullying and harassment.

Bullying is totally unacceptable and is strongly condemned by the Government. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone that we are consulting further on the problem and that I will keep him informed of developments.

Many hon. Members have expressed concern about asbestos. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), who has been deeply involved in trying to find a solution. The Government's desire is to tackle new occupational health risks, and we have given a clear commitment on that, but we are also determined to tackle the appalling legacy of asbestos. The Health and Safety Commission has recently held consultations on a package of tougher measures to provide better protection for those who may be exposed to asbestos at work.

I will continue to keep hon. Members informed of developments, and especially my hon. Friends the Members for Barnsley, West and Penistone and for Tooting.

Police (Community Relations)

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): A great deal has happened since our annual debate on the Metropolitan police: notably, the Lawrence inquiry and the Government's response last month concerning ethnic minority balance in the police. It is extremely important for Parliament to have an opportunity to review the issues. The fact that we are having this debate reveals the lack of suitable accountability for police matters, especially in London. I hope that that will be remedied in due course by the new structure of London government.

Events surrounding the Lawrence inquiry are in many ways the starting point. We await the findings, but what has already happened has been immensely powerful. Those of us who attended the inquiry found it very moving and influential. There was an enormous emotional impact on the audience and on the police. I congratulate the Home Office on moving quickly, but, unfortunately, other cases, such as the Menson case, are now coming into view.

The issue of racism and the police has been around for a long time—the Scarman inquiry occurred nearly two decades ago—and there is a danger of our relapsing into weary cynicism and saying that the problems will always be with us. Racially motivated whites and more cynical blacks will say that nothing can or will be done, but that is quite wrong.

It is important that we note how much the context has changed. Anyone from an ethnic minority or with a racially mixed family background will know that there has been a big change over the past two decades. There was a tremendous climate of fear in the late 1960s and early 1970s, with the Powell speeches, the marches and their aftermath. There was a fear of riots after every Notting Hill carnival, but the atmosphere at the carnival has now changed: there is great self-restraint on the part of the police and the participants, and the management is much more professional. Many people from ethnic minorities are doing well in the education system and the professions. But we also now have a second or third generation of people who will not in any circumstances accept second-class treatment, humiliation, discrimination and insult. The police, too, have moved on, but not as fast. Many who joined the police two decades ago did so in an environment with a different culture and much lower expectations.

The police are criticised for sins of omission and of commission. Sins of omission include the failure adequately to understand the extent to which ethnic minorities are victims of racially motivated crime. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), who is my party's spokesman on these issues, will develop the subject in more detail, but it is worth while sketching the key point that Home Office statistics show that, in any one year in Britain, 4 per cent. of black people, 8 per cent. of Bangladeshis and Pakistanis and only 0.5 per cent. of white people are likely to have been victims of racially motivated attacks.

Those may seem low figures, but over 10 years they mean that roughly half the ethnic minority population will have been on the receiving end of a racially motivated attack. I have been trying through parliamentary questions to establish the underlying trend. I had a helpful answer from the Home Office in April, suggesting that racially motivated incidents—which are not the same as assaults, but comparable—have increased by about 40 per cent. in the past five years. That may be partly because of improved recording or greater openness about disclosure, but it suggests a worrying rising trend. Surprisingly, the increase in incidents is most marked not in inner cities—apart from the east end of London—but in outer suburbs, such as the one that I represent. Black and Asian people in London feel that they are the victims of racial attacks and that the police are not sufficiently sensitive, aware or willing to react quickly. That is the origin of the Lawrence and Menson cases.

Bias is one of the sins of commission of which the police are accused. The statistic that is always cited is that young black Londoners are eight times more likely to be stopped and searched than whites. I know that that is a headline figure, that glosses could be put on it, that academic research shows that the story is complex and that the police are monitoring the situation carefully, but it is a striking figure.

Most of us will have heard from friends or constituents about the experiences of perfectly law-abiding black and Asian members of the community. One often sees black drivers of flash cars surrounded by police who have stopped them to look at their particulars. My noble Friend Lord Dholakia has a rather generously endowed saloon car. He reports being stopped on several occasions, culminating in being stopped by the police when he was on his way to address chief constables at a conference on the police and race. After several hours of embarrassment, he had to be given a motor cycle outrider escort to get him there in reasonable time. The police themselves are increasingly aware of such problems, but those problems continue to create enormous discord and resentment.

The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and other chief constables have had to consider whether they should acknowledge a phenomenon known as institutional racism. I have thought about the matter at some length, and I do not think that it is merely a semantic quibble. I think that the Commissioner is right not to go down the route, followed by the chief constable of Manchester, of accepting that institutional racism is endemic in the police. He is right to acknowledge that there are severe shortcomings, but to admit institutional racism is to send a signal that all police are racist, which cannot be helpful either for the integrity and morale of the police or for public confidence; nor is it correct.

The police have acknowledged that there are unacceptable practices. One of those is stereotyping, which not only is bad in itself, as a manifestation of prejudice, but leads to serious misjudgments. One of the clear lessons that has already emerged from the Lawrence inquiry is that the police were completely thrown when confronted with a middle-class black family with professional aspirations and a son who was academically gifted and wanted to go to university. They made all the wrong assumptions when initiating their inquiry.

The police must also acknowledge, and stop, the practice of supervising officers turning a blind eye to racist language, expressions of prejudice and the so-called canteen culture. It is widely known to exist in the police force as it does in all sections of the community, but supervising officers must ensure that it is not tolerated.

[Dr. Vincent Cable]

Whether it is called institutional racism or something else is not central to the issue, but it is important that the deficiencies are acknowledged and dealt with.

I shall deal now with solutions and the way forward. There is clearly a time and a place for retrospective inquiry, but the key test is what is now done. The first issue to address is whether any advantage is served by demanding that senior heads roll in the police force. Some people argue that it would help to alleviate the present situation if the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis were to step down. As in the case of institutional racism, I do not believe that such a token gesture would be appropriate. I do not know the gentleman concerned well enough to judge his professional abilities, but a token PR gesture would not be helpful. The Lawrence inquiry will produce recommendations as to who is ultimately responsible, but resignation is not the way forward. The Commissioner has made some significant improvements in police practice and should be given an opportunity to see them through.

The key to the problem is recruitment, and the Government have recently made a strong statement on that matter. We start from a striking disparity, certainly in London, between the ethnic minority population, of some 20 per cent., and its representation in the police, which is about 3 per cent. The situation is changing at the margin, because some 6 per cent. of recruits are from ethnic minorities, which is a sign of improvement. It is right that the number of ethnic minority policemen should not mechanically reflect their share of the population, but it should approximate to it and be seen to do so. The ethnic minorities should also be represented at all levels in the police, although I recognise that the issue is not a straightforward numbers game. It is important that ethnic minority police officers are seen to be promoted on grounds of ability and merit, and not simply for token reasons.

It is also important that we consider the context in which police recruitment takes place. I get a sense from talking to police officers and the Police Federation in London that the police face a severe recruitment crisis. The problems surrounding pay and conditions, especially housing, greatly affect the context in which recruitment takes place. It matters whether ethnic minority policemen are recruited into a force with high morale and where there is competition for places, or into a force that is demoralised and relatively easy to enter. It is the Government's responsibility to ensure that the context is correct.

A further area for change must be training. It is an old issue, which was raised by Scarman, but not much has happened since. I am told that training in London has been subject to economy cuts. Indeed, one of the most shocking facts to emerge from the Lawrence inquiry is that senior police officers did not get training in ethnic minority issues or even in murder inquiries. Corners have been cut in training, and that is causing considerable damage. I notice that the guidelines recently issued on training in the magistracy are sophisticated, useful and more advanced than those for the police. Perhaps lessons could be learned from that.

Changes are needed in disciplinary proceedings. Over past decades, there have been arguments about where the balance should lie in police complaints and disciplinary action. In the past, the assumption has always been that one should lean in the direction of the police officer who faces an accusation because of the double jeopardy problem, but the present context, especially in London, means that a different approach is required. Indeed, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has already demonstrated a willingness to take a much tougher and more open approach to complaints and subsequent disciplinary action.

My final point brings us back to the role of Parliament and the difficulties of establishing proper political accountability for the police, especially in London. It is striking that the Metropolitan Police Committee, which was established as a watchdog for the Metropolitan police, has been silent during the recent controversy. We have not heard a peep from it. Why does it exist? It should be acting as a shock absorber between the Metropolitan police and the public and politicians. Until the new structure of London government is established, that committee should undertake a much more active and politically aware role.

I thank the House for its indulgence and I look forward to the contributions of other hon. Members and the Minister's reply.

11.14 am

Mr. Clive Efford (Eltham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on initiating this debate and I welcome the opportunity to discuss the issue, although we will need a more detailed discussion once the inquiry into the death of Stephen Lawrence and its aftermath has published its report. As hon. Members are aware, I represent the constituency in which Rohit Dugahl and Stephen Lawrence were murdered. I was not the local Member of Parliament at the time, but I was a resident and represented the council ward where the murders took place.

It is fitting to start by paying tribute to Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence, who have conducted themselves with exemplary dignity throughout the time since the murder of their son. Many of us, faced with similar circumstances, would not have been able to remain as composed as they have been, especially while being forced to watch the murderers of their son go free.

The effect of the murders on my constituency has been dramatic. In the years that followed Stephen's brutal murder, numerous reports have depicted Eltham as an area where black people exist in constant fear and racial attacks are an everyday occurrence. I would not wish to suggest that there are no racial attacks in Eltham or that no racists live in the community, but much of the criticism was caused by the myth of a wall of silence which thwarted police in their inquiries.

All those involved in the case of Stephen's murder, including those who were well informed, assumed that the investigation failed because of a wall of silence in the local community. That has been proved to be inaccurate and the report of the Police Complaints Authority, published last December, clearly demonstrated that the police were in possession of evidence that should have allowed them to make arrests within the first 24 hours following Stephen's murder. Evidence given to the inquiry—I shall not elaborate on it now, because we will have opportunities to do so once the report is published—also clearly shows that the police could have made arrests in that time. Unfortunately, the media continue to focus on Eltham based on that myth and are no longer interested in the facts.

The effect is to create an image that black people living in other areas do not have a problem with racism. No consideration is given to the effect on black people in Eltham. Many of the problems that they now face arise from the notoriety of the case, and racists in the area even feel empowered by it. Many local people are greatly concerned and I have initiated discussions among community groups to try to tackle the problem and examine the problems that black people face living in a predominantly white community. We must challenge the feeding frenzy that the media has had on race relations in Eltham.

In spite of the encouragement given to the racists by the manner of some of the media reporting, racial incidents are at a relatively low level in my constituency. I hope that this debate will begin to help people to understand that racism must be challenged everywhere, not only in Eltham. We must also recognise the crucial role to be played by the police in that process. We live in a multicultural, multiracial society and we have to strive for more awareness and greater understanding, so that people can appreciate another person's racial background instead of fearing it as a threat. Do we want to live in a society in which every parent fears that his or her children might be isolated and confronted by a group of people who just happen to have a different-coloured skin? Black or white, we all have a duty to address that issue. To fail to do so would be to gloss over the problem. We must accept that the problem is not just in the police, but in the whole of society. The police force merely reflects the community from which serving officers are drawn.

I do not accept Sir Paul Condon's statement that there is no institutional racism in the police. Most black people would say that that accusation can be made accurately against virtually every institution that is almost exclusively white. It would be remarkable if there were no racism in the police. Racism, in whatever form exists in the police force because it exists in our society. The minority of police officers who are racist harboured those feelings when they went in; it was not a matter of their becoming racist because they had joined the police. Sir Paul Condon should not regard recognition of that fact as a personal failing on his part. Nor should it be seen as an attack on each individual police officer. Only when we recognise the symptoms can we begin to address the problem.

Some may ask whether there is a problem. I believe that there is. The 1997-98 report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis includes figures on the use of police powers under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, giving the number of people searched and the number arrested as a result. Of the total of 336,692 searches, 41 per cent. were non-white. Non-whites make up 20 per cent. of London's population. Of those searched, 26 per cent. were black and 9 per cent. Asian. The arrest rates do not justify the disproportionate attention paid to those sections of the community. The arrest rate among the white community was 11.26 per cent. Among the black community, it was 11.65 per cent, and among the Asian community, 9.14 per cent.

Similarly, under the powers of the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994—an Act used in anticipation of serious violence—a total of 3,992 people and vehicles were searched, of which a staggering 2,681 were Asian, while 653 were black and 554 white. Some 83.52 per cent. of persons arrested in anticipation of serious violent crime were black or Asian. The Metropolitan police were kind enough to try to explain the figures, giving me an area-by-area breakdown. I shall not give the detailed figures, but they pointed to serious problems with policing in specific areas, and to the unjustified use of powers to intimidate one section of the community.

Scotland Yard commissioned a working group, including representatives of the Commission for Racial Equality, the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders and the Home Office, which concluded that there was wide variation in the application of powers between ethnic minorities. The group concluded that only 10 per cent. of searches resulted in arrests, and that black people were four times more likely than whites to be stopped. Those are national figures; I accept that the hon. Member for Twickenham has figures suggesting that black people are eight times more likely to be stopped in London, but nationally an innocent black person is four times more likely to be stopped by the police than an innocent white person.

A recent report by Statewatch—"Stop and Search and Racism"—strongly supports the allegation that black people are subject to discrimination in the use of those powers. The Stephen Lawrence inquiry has demonstrated the crucial role of the police in race and community relations. It is up to hon. Members, and others, to ensure that institutions such as the police set standards for others to follow. To achieve that, we must have transparency, and complete statistics for effective monitoring.

Police forces have done a lot to increase racial awareness among officers, and that must be applauded. The racial incident unit at Woolwich police station is an example of best practice. There is great determination in the police to tackle racism, and that must be encouraged. However, those who seek to drag their feet over any of the recommendations of the Lawrence inquiry should know that that will not be tolerated. Action must be taken.

A strategic review of national police training is due to report early next year, and I hope that it will be able to consider the report of the Stephen Lawrence inquiry before it does so. Can the Minister confirm that it will? Police racial awareness training needs to be thoroughly reviewed so that its effectiveness can be assessed. Vetting of candidates to become police officers also needs to be introduced. I have been unable to find a single example of a police recruit being dismissed by the Metropolitan police because of inappropriate opinions regarding race. We all know that racist police officers exist, and those officers who are determined to serve the whole community have their jobs made more difficult by our failure to protect them from such individuals, and from the canteen culture.

The community has a right to demand that the police exhibit exemplary behaviour and attitudes towards racial awareness. We all grew up in an era in which the police were held in high esteem. A police officer was someone whom young people were encouraged to look up to. Few people would put the police in that category today. We must begin to restore the confidence of the whole community in the police if we are to begin to eradicate racism from our society.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): The debate has so far been about the Metropolitan police, and I well understand the concentration on the Lawrence inquiry.

[Mr. Andrew Robathan]

However, I wish to speak about Leicestershire police. I have just completed the police parliamentary scheme, as has the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe). I did mine with the Leicestershire police, and I found it extremely illuminating. The scheme would offer a valuable opportunity for members of the Select Committee on Home Affairs to experience what happens in the police—both good and ill. I worked with a large number of officers in Leicestershire, some of whom were Asian or black, although the majority were white. My overriding impression is that they were employed because they were good police officers. They were there on merit.

Recruitment is much remarked on. In Leicestershire, more than 4 per cent. of the force comes from the black or Asian communities. Approximately 9 per cent. of the population of Leicestershire as a whole come from ethnic minorities. The county has, I believe, one of the highest proportions of black and Asian recruits, although this year, sadly, not one ethnic recruit has passed through the training. Some joined, but they did not succeed. I asked the chief constable on Friday what could be done about that. He told me that there was a recruiting department and a recruiting officer who specifically tries to encourage ethnic minorities to join the police force. The officer goes two steps further with ethnic minorities than would be gone with other groups. He promotes the force as a good career, using Asian radio stations, local ethnic minority magazines and visits to colleges. There is a recruiting stand at functions at which there are large gatherings of ethnic minorities, particularly employment fairs. The officer goes as far as he can to encourage people, but he cannot compel them to come in off the highways and byways to join the police.

The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) spoke about a canteen culture which deters good people from ethnic minorities from joining the police. There has certainly been such a culture among the police. I remember working with the Royal Ulster Constabulary 10 years ago, and some of what I heard made my hair stand on end, despite the fact that no one has ever accused me of being lily-livered or liberal. The same was true of the Metropolitan police 12 years ago. I hope that things have changed there, and in the RUC, as they have in Leicestershire.

Let me tell one story about Leicestershire that suggests that there is no canteen culture there to deter good people. In about 1993, the chairman of the police authority in Leicestershire, Baljit Singh—presumably of Sikh extraction—was a Labour councillor. He resigned as chairman and as a councillor. He then joined the Leicestershire police, where he is now a sergeant. From his position as chairman, he certainly did not see a culture that deterred him from joining the force.

I worked with officers at all levels during my four weeks at Leicestershire, and I learned the interesting lesson that racism was not an issue. I worked in Highfields, predominantly an Asian area in which the few white people are the minority. We talked to Rastafarians who had convictions for pushing drugs. There were suspicions that one or two might have been pimps. They had not been convicted for that, but it seemed that way. We talked to whites who were criminals. We dealt with the victims of crime—both Asian and white people. It seemed to me that the police officers made no distinction—they really did not in what I saw of them—between people of different races. Certainly, the Asians with whom I dealt seemed to have total confidence in the police; they turned to the police when they wanted help.

Leicestershire makes great play of community relations. I visited a large school in Leicester called Moat community college, where the white people are the minority ethnic group. The headmistress is an Asian—Freda Hussain. I was very impressed by everything that she said. She certainly was not anti-police. She had her criticisms, but she was very much on the side of the police. The police inspector with whom I went to school was very much on her side, as he tried to run a good relationship with the school and the large number of young people there.

The Leicestershire police are working at race relations. They make a tremendous effort and, from what I saw, their strategy seems to be working. They set up the first—it may still be unique—police advisory group on race issues, or PAGRI. The group includes members of the local Commission for Racial Equality, community leaders and others involved in race relations. A steady and sensible policy has been produced. I pay tribute to all involved in that. Race seems to have been deflated as an issue both among the police and within communities.

I found decent people of whatever colour working as police officers and trying to do the best job that they could in difficult circumstances. Of course there are problems of race relations, as there are in other sectors, but the last thing that Leicestershire or any other force need is a quota. I have to say that targets are very close to being the first cousin of quotas. The hon. Member for Twickenham said much the same thing. He said that we did not want mechanically to reflect the exact make-up of a community. It may be that the proportion of police officers from the ethnic minorities could be higher than that in the community, but that is to be encouraged.

I was disturbed to hear the Home Secretary say that heads would roll if improvements were not made. As the chief constable of the Leicestershire police said to me, what is he to do if he cannot compel people to join the force? Quotas would be insulting to the excellent officers of all ethnic backgrounds. As the hon. Member for Twickenham, with whom I might disagree on one or two things, said, suspicion would inevitably arise that someone had been promoted because of his or her colour. That would be a terrible thing and it would be an insult to the good black and Asian officers in Leicestershire and elsewhere.

What I saw in Leicestershire sets an example to other police forces. Certainly the Met has its problems. I learned something about good race relations, and I congratulate all officers in that force on their sensible and positive attitude.

11.32 am

Ms Jean Corston (Bristol, East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on his success in securing today's debate on an extremely important subject. It is timely for me because the Lawrence inquiry is sitting in Bristol this week. One of the purposes of that is to learn from some of the pioneering work that has been done in Bristol to further the interests of community relations in our city, which has a troubled history. The riots that led to the Scarman report happened in Brixton, but also in St. Paul's in Bristol, which is in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Valerie Davey). My constituency of Bristol, East has the highest number of black and Asian residents of any city in the south-west.

I am pleased to say that the evidence is that the police force in Avon and Somerset, focused on the central police district and Trinity road police station, which is in my constituency, has learnt some very important lessons arising out of the Scarman report and the challenges of policing a multicultural area.

The establishment of the Lawrence inquiry does great credit to our Home Secretary. Many people like me were utterly appalled that many people in the police forces seemed to be in denial about what had happened. The hon. Member for Twickenham and my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) referred to the fact that here was a young man who wanted to be an architect and, on the face of it, had every chance of doing so, who came from a stable, secure, middle-class home, and who was murdered on the street. Apparently, his family were initially treated by the police as "another black family". We have to acknowledge the roots of this terrible conflict and tragedy. That is what I hope and believe that the Lawrence inquiry will do.

Trinity road police station and the central policing district under Superintendent David Warren have produced guidance for the police about policing a multicultural community. They have recently published a booklet. That may sound a small thing, but it is invaluable in training people to deal with those who come from different family and cultural backgrounds. For example, it says that an officer wanting to arrest an Afro-Caribbean man should not lay a hand on his arm in order to do so because, culturally, that is one of the most threatening things that someone can do. It says that, if people do not look you in the eye when they are talking to you, it does not mean that they are shifty, but often means that they come from a cultural background in which to look someone in the eye is disrespectful and rude. If a woman has had an arranged marriage, that does not mean that she is stupid or backward, but that she comes from a different type of family structure. The booklet is full of useful and practical advice for policing in a multicultural area. I have conveyed that advice to my colleagues in the Home Office and I commend it to other police forces in similar areas.

Other hon. Members have referred this morning to institutional racism. It is difficult for any organisation or individual to acknowledge thoughts or actions that betray a feeling or belief that another person is in some way inferior. Institutional racism has a mirror image in institutional sexism, which is also difficult for any organisation to confront.

After 20 years or more of saying that we wanted more women Members of Parliament, the Labour party was brave enough during the previous Parliament to confront the fact that, while the party did not intend to be sexist, many of the things that we did at local and national level discriminated against women in the selection procedure. The evidence is here most days of the week in that we now have more than 100 women Members of Parliament. It is not an easy task to eradicate sexism. I notice that the hon. Member for Tunbridge Wells (Mr. Norman), the deputy chairman of the Conservative party, is beginning to examine such matters in that party. Similarly, the police cannot escape that process.

Institutional racism does not mean that police officers are plodding the streets with racist thoughts or intentions, but it can mean that a culture has developed within which assumptions that lie behind the way in which an officer deals with people betray a racist attitude. Often, it is not intentional. One of the definitions of discrimination in the Race Relations Act 1976 and the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 is indirect discrimination—something that is not intended to discriminate, but in practice does.

There are lots of ways in which institutional racism can work. One of the most obvious is for people to see a 21 year-old black man driving around in a BMW and not to assume that he nicked it—an assumption that can be made. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) recounted to an audience in the Grand Committee Room several years ago during a lobby on the Asylum Bill how during his first year as a Member of Parliament, he was stopped not far from here by a police officer and called "sonny".

We have to acknowledge that such things happen. It is pointless for people to say that institutional racism means that every single police officer is racist, or, if the chief constable of Greater Manchester police acknowledges that that is a fact, but the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis says that it is not, for one to be set against the other. The best service that we can provide to society is to say that we have to examine the roots of the problem and try to deal with the consequences.

One thing that we have to do is accept the racial nature of certain crimes. That is obviously relevant to the Lawrence case, but all of us who represent multicultural areas can tell of crimes that appeared to be racist in nature, but were not accepted as such. Such cases can reinforce the sense of racism and make the policing of multicultural areas even more difficult. They can also deter recruitment to the police force among ethnic minorities, because people do not want to spend their working lives as "tokens"—there to be the exception to what appears to be a universally accepted rule.

In Bristol, there is an organisation called Support Against Racist Incidents—SARI—whose office is in my constituency and which has been praised by many individuals and organisations. It works closely with the police, as do all the community and voluntary groups in the central Bristol policing district. Through its work, SARI spreads public information about the nature and the effects of racism. In parts of my constituency, there have been the most appalling racist crimes and incidents. At every event or open day—for example, those run by the local housing services—SARI has a display highlighting the sorts of racist graffiti, violence and criminal damage that occur in Bristol.

SARI offers practical support to victims of racist crime and its role now extends beyond Bristol to Yeovil and Devon; however, its ability to provide such a service is at breaking point. I have told Ministers how important it is that SARI's work and that of similar bodies should be centrally funded, not only because local funding puts a great strain on local authority resources, but because such work is needed nationally. The hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) referred to a similar organisation in Leicester. Such bodies not only command the enthusiasm, support and confidence of the black and Asian communities, but do a great deal to support the work of the police.

We should look for ways in which to eradicate the barriers to the recruitment of black and Asian officers, who could do a great deal to strengthen our police forces and increase public confidence in them. It is in our long-term interests to confront racism and to point out to white people who are racist that they are claiming to be superior to people such as Nelson Mandela or Jessye Norman. I often recall the words of R. H. Tawney, that there will be equality only when high jinks in Mayfair are treated in the same way as drunk and disorderly in the east end of London. We have to take the same attitude toward racism. If a young black man is driving a BMW, perhaps we should assume that it belongs to him.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I am delighted to follow the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston), as our debate has gained from having been extended beyond the Metropolitan police district. It was kind of the hon. Lady to refer to Mayfair, which is in my constituency, in the closing paragraph of her speech. I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on having given us the opportunity to debate this important subject. Finally, I welcome the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey); it is happy for us that she is a fellow London Member of Parliament.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), one of my cousins once served in the Met. I should briefly declare a few interests. When I served on Camden council, I was chairman of the Camden committee for community relations. In the aftermath of Lord Scarman's report, police-community consultative groups were set up in the City of Westminster, as elsewhere. There are three groups: one in south Westminster, one in the central and west end area and one in Paddington. In addition, there are two sub-committees: one on homelessness and one on licensing.

I gather that there is a widespread opinion in the Met that those groups work well. That was corroborated when I appeared before Chris Patten's commission on the future of policing in Northern Ireland, which considered the use of community committees there. I met the Patten commission because the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, of which I am Chairman, published a report earlier this year on the recruitment, composition and training of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. There are obvious parallels between the question of minority recruitment to the RUC and the issues that we are debating this morning.

When he was a silk, my brother, who is now a lord justice of appeal, was briefed to appear for the coroner on a rerun of the Deptford inquiry. There had been a motion that the first findings of the coroner's court be quashed and the case heard again. My brother says that it was one of the most difficult cases he ever had to take in court because, although he had to win the case for the coroner, who was his client, and ensure that there was no rerun of the case, he was conscious that the parents of those who died in that infamous fire in Deptford were troubled that they might not have received justice at the earlier stage. He had to tread a very narrow line—to win the case, but to make sure that, by its end, the parents felt that it had been properly conducted and that the circumstances of their children's deaths had been properly explained.

My brother was well chosen for that role by central casting. In the 1960s, he had been unexpectedly recruited by a combination of Lord Denning and Lord Constantine—better known as the electrifying West Indian cricketer Learie Constantine—to improve opportunities for ethnic minorities at the Bar. He has latterly been involved in the arrangements for training judges to deal with ethnic matters.

I did not get hot and bothered when the Commissioner, in publishing the crime statistics not for this year but for a previous one, drew attention to the fact that there were a considerable number of convictions among members of ethnic minorities. The Commissioner's role was descriptive, not evaluative; he was simply indicating one of the issues with which the police have to deal.

Westminster's crime rate is much higher than that of the rest of the Metropolitan police district because of the enormous number of people who come into Westminster every day and who constitute a target for criminals. In my constituency, if I shake the hand of someone on the street during a general election campaign, I have a one in 12 chance of shaking the hand of someone who has the right to vote for me. However, anyone whose handbag or wallet is taken on Oxford street, in Soho, or anywhere in the west end, will be quite clear as to who committed the robbery, so I do not think that Sir Paul Condon erred in drawing attention to that.

I agree with those hon. Members who spoke about the sense of outrage that totally innocent people feel when they are stopped by the police while going about their lawful business. On one occasion when driving around Ashley gardens, where we used to live, looking for a residential parking space, my first wife was stopped by the police. They clearly believed that she was a prostitute cruising for business, and she was spreadeagled against a wall. It is ironic that all this happened in my own constituency. Neither she nor I made any public or private reference to that, but 15 years later, it is worth mentioning the event because such incidents do happen and those to whom they happen feel considerable outrage. I share the sympathy that has been expressed for ethnic minorities.

One of the experiences of the Select Committee on Northern Ireland Affairs, which in this Parliament has set its face to controversial issues, is that, as soon as we set up an inquiry, the body that we are investigating sets up a matching internal committee, often independently staffed, to consider the same issue. I welcome that, and I am delighted that the Metropolitan police are carrying out their own research, as the hon. Member for Twickenham said.

Other hon. Members have referred to the importance of recruitment. I shall not dwell on the parallels with the Territorial Army, which we have been discussing over the past fortnight, but, because this is a separate debate, I shall record again the statistics for the Royal Green Jackets volunteer arm in London. Twenty per cent. of its members are from ethnic minorities, against 1 per cent. in the Army as a whole. In Mayfair, which was mentioned by the hon. Member for Bristol, East, 43 per cent. of the cadets at the Royal Green Jackets' depot and drill hall are from ethnic minorities, and 53 per cent. of the cadet contingent have single parents or are from broken homes. There is a moral there for the police and for the Regular Army, who should learn how it has been possible for the TA to effect that recruitment, which has not been occurring elsewhere.

I hope that an error will not be made about the TA, certainly in central London, but present Members are prone to blaming every ill that occurs in this country on the previous Government. The moment will come when that will no longer be intellectually possible. I am one of the two dozen or so—my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley), who is present, is another—who sat in the Chamber for the Conservatives between 1974 and 1979. In that period, in the run-up to the Edmund Davies report, there was a haemorrhage of sergeants from the Met aged 35 and above who got out because of the manner in which police pay was handled.

There was a crisis from the loss of police officers in the period after the Edmund Davies report; the new Government in 1979 were prepared to spend considerable money not only to meet the Davies recommendations on pay, but on further recruitment into the Met, yet there was not sufficient operational middle management of the quality required to train officers. That is a "What if?" question and we cannot tell how the course of history would have been changed if circumstances had been different. The report of the Northern Ireland Affairs Committee on the Royal Ulster Constabulary referred to a canteen culture, and there is no question that operational middle management plays a part in that.

I conclude as I began by thanking the hon. Member for Twickenham for initiating the debate. I am delighted to have been able to make a small contribution to it.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Worthing, West): I shall speak briefly, because I know that the national spokesman for the Liberal Democrats, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), wants to speak. I join in appreciation of all that has been said by other hon. Members in this debate, which has been well initiated and conducted.

I regret only that the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill), will not be able to take part, but the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), will be able to speak, at least as a Minister. I suspect that she will speak also as a Back Bencher because, in the past, going over Vauxhall bridge to her constituency at night, every person that the police asked to get out of their car was black. That is no longer the case, so some of the apparent wrongdoing, which reflects genuine wrongdoing, is being tackled with determination by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. From the day that he took office, he has been determined to deal with all the problems that the police force faces. He has not been completely successful, as he has said.

There have been references to the Lawrence inquiry. Like the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford), I prefer to keep most of my remarks for when the second part of the inquiry has finished and the report has been published. It is worth noting that, within a day and a half of the tragic killing of Stephen Lawrence, newspapers had reported police sources as saying that they knew that he was a good young man from a good family. The detective work went wrong, but it is worth noting also that Superintendent John Philpott responded to the request of the leader of Greenwich council to come to an immediate meeting at Greenwich town hall. That initiative and the exemplary behaviour of Doreen and Neville Lawrence meant that there was no follow-up action on the streets, which could have led to disaster.

I recommended to the Home Secretary in the previous Government that, instead of having an award to commemorate Philip Lawrence, the white headmaster who was tragically killed, it would be a fine tribute to have Lawrence awards to commemorate Stephen, a fine young black man, and Philip, a fine white headmaster. That would have been an inclusive way of marking their loss but also one that represented the decency in our community.

In such a debate, it would be easy to go back over the 23 or so years in which I have served in the House and pick out examples of bad behaviour by the police, and perhaps, on occasion, it would be right to do so. However, it is important to recognise the number of times when the police have behaved well or behaved better. Unless we recognise those changes, we shall not encourage those who are trying to effect change.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke) rightly pointed out the importance of middle management. When I had the responsibility for measures to cut drink-driving, the canteen culture in various police services was different because not only chief constables but their sergeants imposed their example and standards.

When a relatively senior detective in the Metropolitan police got into difficulty with the force, it was possible, by agreement with his Member of Parliament, to meet a senior police officer and get the issue at least half resolved, rather than leaving it in the hands of lawyers. When my half-French research assistant was repeatedly stopped and mistreated by the police on his way home from dropping me—for example, at Broadcasting house at midnight—he and I were able to meet a senior police officer and that mistreatment stopped.

I recommend that, if members of the police are concerned about the possible responses of the Lawrence inquiry, they should ensure that, when a police officer has stopped someone to run a check on a vehicle or driver's licence, that incident is recorded. The worst condemnation that I make of the most recent case that I took up is that the police had no record of inquiries about a named person in a car whose registration number was known. That shows that something is going wrong. If, for audit purposes, the police cannot run a retrospective check on who made an inquiry, when they made it and what it concerned, they cannot be accountable because they cannot count, manage or measure. They should insist on such records. Organisations will change only if good middle managers are recruited and remain in the force.

I conclude with a point about the Metropolitan police. There has been a recommendation that the starting rates of pay for police in London should be increased. The people who ought to come into the police service are much in demand, whatever their ethnic background. Within the Government, people are asking whether that recommendation should be implemented. It should. Low or relatively low pay in central London is not an excuse for racial attitudes, but increasing pay may be part of the solution.

[Mr. Peter Bottomley]

In that respect, as in others, the day that we can say that the colour of someone's skin is only as important as the colour of their eyes or of their hair, we shall know that the problem has been solved. We cannot say that yet.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I am pleased that my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) managed to secure this debate, and I am grateful to the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley) for his brevity. I shall try to be equally brief.

I want to highlight the problems faced by ethnic minorities in being the victims of crime. That aspect is often overlooked because there is a focus on the experience of ethnic minorities as the alleged perpetrators of crime and their subsequent treatment by the police and the criminal justice agencies.

Statistics unequivocally show that ethnic minorities are more likely to be the victims of all forms of crime. The British crime surveys of 1988 and 1992 and Home Office research study 154 showed that, statistically speaking, ethnic minorities are significantly more likely than whites to be the victims of both household and personal offences. The findings of the latest crime survey, published in Home Office statistical bulletin 6/98, showed that "During 1995, ethnic minorities had a statistically higher risk of victimisation than white people."

Of course, there are sub-categories within that grouping. The bulletin continued:

"In particular, risks of almost all crimes were higher for Pakistanis and Bangladeshis."

There is variety within the different groupings and there is a risk of treating all people as the same, but every group of people with colour have a statistically higher risk of being victims of all forms of crime.

In addition to that experience of general crime, two important aspects must be considered: racially motivated crime and fear of crime. Racially motivated crime has an especially harmful effect on community relations. The crime surveys showed a high under-reporting of such crime. The 1996 survey recorded that

"Less than half of all racially motivated crime recorded" in the survey was "reported to the police",

and that

"Reporting to the police was less common among ethnic minorities than white people. Only 29 per cent. of racist crimes where the victim was an ethnic minority were reported to the police, compared with 55 per cent. where the victim was white."

Under-reporting and the feeling that racially motivated crime is not taken seriously may contribute to a lack of confidence in the police in general. We are pleased that improvements are being made in that regard, such as the introduction of legislation on racially aggravated offences, for which we have high hopes, but we believe that there is far more work to be done.

When I was a member of Avon county council, some time ago, I came into contact with Support Against Racist Incidents; like the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston), I can testify to its good work. As a part of the community, it talks to people—sometimes literally in their language—and encourages them to report the racially motivated offences that are certainly occurring. I hope that the Government will provide support to enable more similar work to be done.

Fear of crime is markedly higher among ethnic minorities, and can dramatically affect people's quality of life, regardless of their background. The 1996 survey showed that the crime survey

"Ethnic minorities scored higher than white people on all"

"measures of fear of crime. They perceive themselves to be at greater risk of crime than whites . . . To a large extent this is a reflection of their" actual

"higher risks of victimisation and harassment."

A figure that stuck out for me from the survey's findings was that 10 per cent. of black people fear going to football matches, as against 3 per cent. of white people. I know that the Commission for Racial Equality is doing much work with its "Let's kick racism out of football" campaign, but plenty remains to be done when significant numbers of citizens fear going to a certain type of event purely because they feel that they may be harassed, or worse.

Under-reporting in general does not appear to be a major problem, in that the figures for reporting of crime are broadly similar for all groups, but there is a high expectation among ethnic minorities that nothing will happen after the crime has been reported. That low expectation of police action is a major problem.

Some major socio-economic factors are outside the scope of the debate. The fact that people who belong to an ethnic minority often live in poverty and deprivation is linked with their experience of crime, quite apart from the additional factor of their ethnicity.

One of the cornerstones of any improvement in police action is the ethnic monitoring of all police activity. My hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham referred to the other main issue—recruitment. I say to the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) that we believe that targets—not quotas—are important, and that firm action is needed to ensure that officers justify their failure to meet targets. There may be a good reason—recruits may not be presenting themselves—but we believe that someone based centrally must ask chief constables what is happening and demand an explanation.

Mr. Robathan: I am very happy with that suggestion. Targets have an important role and of course recruitment should be targeted; I was expressing a fear that heads would roll if the targets are not met.

Mr. Allan: I am grateful for that clarification.

For ethnic monitoring to be undertaken seriously, and subsequent action to be taken, there must be leadership from the top. The Home Office research study into ethnic monitoring, No. 173, picked up some widely differing attitudes to monitoring. Some police officers were using it defensively; they were saying, "We know that the blacks carry out all the crime and we believe that monitoring will help us prove it". Others responded genuinely and appropriately, saying that monitoring was an important tool whose use was in the interests of the police, enabling individual police officers to show that they were not acting in a racially motivated or racist way.

Monitoring, in and of itself, is not the answer. The attitude to monitoring must be right, and senior management must take note of, and act on, the results. If figures for stop and search reveal a problem, senior management must ask throughout the ranks why that is happening and seek solutions.

We believe that the challenge is to bring about the right attitude to monitoring and to take action to combat racism throughout police forces in Britain. I have every confidence in chief constables to show the necessary leadership, but we must make it clear that that is a public priority—a political priority.

I believe that, if we are looking for some good to flow from tragic events such as those that triggered the Stephen Lawrence inquiry, it would be a fitting result for all police forces to place combating racism—in their ranks and in society—high on their agenda. As a Liberal Democrat, working for a tolerant and free society, I believe that there is a moral case for that. I also hope that we shall take seriously the experiences of people from ethnic minorities, in relation to the higher levels of actual crime and fear of crime that they suffer, and their appalling experience of the horrendous effects of racially motivated crime. If that consciousness guides our police priorities, it will single out that aspect as a key area for police action.

We hope that the new community safety strategies will provide a focus, as they highlight the experience of people from ethnic minorities and allow the police to target resources. I look forward to the development of those community safety strategies, and hope that they will have serious input from all sections of the community. I hope that they result, not in a top-down approach, but in a genuine bottom-up approach, which will allow everyone to talk about their experiences. I look forward to the Minister's response on this important issue.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I take the opportunity—the first that I have had—to welcome the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), to the Treasury Bench. We are great friends in this place. I suspect that, later today, our minds will turn to a town in Ukraine, because of our support for a certain football club. In the meantime, I am glad to speak with her across the Dispatch Boxes on this important issue.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on securing the debate. Debate on police issues is always welcome, especially to me. Although the House will, in due course, reflect on the report of the Macpherson inquiry into the Stephen Lawrence tragedy, there are—as the debate has shown—many matters on which we may usefully express a view while we keenly await its publication. I am sure that the House would wish to thank Sir William Macpherson and his team for their work. I am sure that the House will also wish to share in expressing the admiration of the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) for the courageous and temperate way in which Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence have conducted themselves in recent months over that tragic affair.

Central to the deliberations of the Lawrence inquiry has been the question whether there is institutionalised racism in the police service. The debate has shown that the phrase means different things to different people. We need to clarify what we mean—what people are trying to allege—by the phrase "institutionalised racism". If it means that the police service as a whole sets out to target and persecute people from black communities solely on the ground of their ethnic background, I do not believe such an allegation to be remotely true. On the other hand, if the intention is to suggest that there is in the police service a tendency among some officers, as a result of their personal racial prejudice or—as the hon. Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) correctly pointed out—all the assumptions that they make, to fail on occasions to treat every incident that might involve people from ethnic backgrounds with equal fairness or single-mindedness, that allegation may well be true. Nevertheless, such tendencies and behaviour cannot be tolerated. As the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) has just reminded the House, in community and police relations, the problem is more often one of people from ethnic backgrounds being victims of, rather than their indulging in, criminal activity.

A central issue in the Stephen Lawrence incident has been police response to racially motivated violence. Not that many years ago, when I was a member of the Home Affairs Select Committee, we inquired in depth into the issue of racially motivated attacks. Committee members were struck by the variation in standards of community relations among police forces, even within the Metropolitan police in different parts of London. There is no substitute for strong and good relations between police and communities, and achieving such relations must be an important objective for all police services.

In recent months, with the passage of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, we have debated how racially motivated violence should be prosecuted. However, as my hon. Friend the Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley) said, it is difficult not to conclude that such argument is essentially irrelevant when dealing with the primary fact that a very fine young man has been murdered.

I have often stated in the House my belief in the need for a multiracial police force. Although only a fool or a racist bigot would argue with the proposition that the United Kingdom's multiracial society needs a multiracial police force, there is still much to do done to build such a force. Only last week, Mr. Fred Broughton of the Police Federation told the Ho e Affairs Select Committee that, in the fight against crime, "it is essential" to have a far more balanced police force.

I have been able on several occasions to observe the effectiveness of multiracial policing in major cities in the United States, and argue that such policing is a prize that is well worth striving for. The Home Secretary was right to suggest in his recent speech to the Black Police Association that more needs to be done to foster good relations with all sections of our diverse community, and that the police service should reflect the diversity of the community that it serves.

The Government must, nevertheless, do more than merely set targets for recruitment, retention and promotion of black and Asian officers, because targets alone will solve nothing. My hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) has dealt with the matter of what happens if targets are not met.

[Mr. John Greenway]

The House must ask how chief constables are to increase the number of officers from ethnic communities when, as the Home Secretary knows full well, other demands on police budgets—some of which have been imposed by the Home Office—are forcing many chief constables to freeze recruitment.

The greater flexibility given by the previous Government to chief constables to decide their spending priorities was, and remains, a welcome development. However, it remains Ministers' responsibility to ensure that the demands that they place on the police service are achievable within the resource base that they provide.

The plain fact is that many police forces will find it extremely difficult to recruit additional officers in the next few years, and that some forces are already making reductions. Progress in reaching the important targets for recruitment of more black and Asian police officers can be met only through the natural process of younger officers replacing retiring officers.

It is crucial that more is done by senior officers to improve police culture in dealing with ethnic communities. People from ethnic communities need encouragement to believe that they will be made to feel welcome if they join the police service.

As several hon. Members have said today, people from ethnic communities neither need nor expect positive discrimination in achieving promotion. Many young people from an ethnic background who have been born and brought up in the United Kingdom are highly capable of achieving, entirely on merit, the most senior ranks in our police service.

The task for chief constables and senior officers is to eradicate any racist elements in their forces. To do so, they will require the full support of both the Government and Parliament. The Stephen Lawrence tragedy, and the case of Michael Menson, demonstrate all too clearly the price of failing to achieve that objective.

Some have questioned whether some senior police officers, even the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis himself, should resign. I agree with those who say that such tokenism will not address the culture issue, and that a more significant factor may be whether senior officers have the confidence of their own serving officers. Above all, training and internal personnel initiatives are most likely to be effective in addressing the issue. The hon. Member for Bristol, East made telling points on the need for the police service to have a far greater understanding of different cultures, and on the fact that behaviour regarded as unusual by some may be thought of as perfectly normal by others.

There must be change not only in police culture. As Mr. Broughton told the Select Committee last week, police morale has taken an absolute battering over recent allegations of racism in the service. Although I do not have time to quote at length Mr. Broughton's evidence to the Committee, that evidence will be available to hon. Members. I should say that he mentioned the tremendous anger of police officers. As he said—it is confirmed by my own experience—the fact is that the vast majority of police officers are not racist, corrupt or dishonest. They are doing a difficult job. The House has always taken every opportunity to praise the excellent job done by the vast majority of serving policemen and policewomen in the United Kingdom, and we do so again today.

I have no doubt that the most pressing need is to address the loss of faith in our police service, which has been generated by recent events, among residents in many communities, particularly in London. However, the situation is not entirely gloomy. Later today, we should be able to see in the Evening Standard a new ICM poll showing that, according to members of ethnic communities, race relations have improved significantly in the past 10 years. We therefore have to view the issue in perspective.

Suspicion of, and lack of confidence in, the police service is the primary barrier to achieving the Government's objective of increasing the number of officers from West Indian, African, Asian and other ethnic backgrounds. Young people from those communities are being actively discouraged from joining the police service. It will take a monumental effort to repair the damage of recent months. A great many people in the police service relish that challenge, but will need to have confidence that corrupt officers and those guilty of blatant racial discrimination will be disciplined.

The police service will also need reassurance that Parliament stands ready to provide the support, both moral and material, that it needs. It is my profound wish that the cross-party consensus on the issue that has been so obvious in the debate will encourage the important process of rebuilding and strengthening police and community relations in Britain.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): I thank the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) for his kind words. It is a privilege to respond to my first Adjournment debate on this topic. My hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Hill), who is sitting on the Front Bench but cannot speak, and I, as the Member of Parliament for Vauxhall, have a great interest in this subject as we both represent the borough of Lambeth.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Twickenham (Dr. Cable) on his good fortune in securing the debate and on his choice of subject. The issues of racism and community relations in the context of the police are both highly topical and extremely important subjects for the House to consider. His thoughtful and forward-looking remarks set the tone for the whole debate. It is good to see that hon. Members on both sides of the House have wanted to contribute to the debate. As the hon. Member for Ryedale said, that shows the all-party nature of the subject. If we are to tackle racism, we must all work together.

There has been a tendency to regard such debates as primarily about the Metropolitan police, but the speeches by the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston) and the hon. Member for Worthing, West (Mr. Bottomley), who may think that he is still a London Member—he is not, because my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) is sitting behind me—have shown that the debate has been more wide ranging. Although the Met gets huge publicity because it is such a large force, its problems are replicated in police forces throughout the country.

The Government have made tackling racism a top priority. In the United Kingdom's increasingly diverse society, the police service needs to reflect that priority if it is to continue its tradition of policing by consent. The service relies on the support and active participation of all sections of the community. It must also be seen to be tackling racial and other discrimination so that it can provide a better service to all sections of the community.

We all want a police service that treats all people fairly, regardless of their race or religion. The experience of ethnic minority communities does not meet that aspiration. We must take that on board. To do its job properly, the police service needs the trust and confidence of every citizen. Police and community relations must be brought into the heart of police policy and practice.

Our goal is to create a police service that treats people fairly and equally. Central to that is the need to ensure that racially motivated crime is tackled effectively. Part of the answer is to provide the right legislative tools to tackle racial crime. We have made good progress on that in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, with the introduction of new racially aggravated offences. However, legislation is not enough. The way in which the police respond to racial crime is crucial. It is a key test of whether the police are delivering their services fairly to all sections of the community.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East mentioned a booklet about the work done under Commander Dave Warren in Bristol. That approach has helped to turn round police-community relations in that area and is to be commended. As the hon. Member for Worthing, West said, much work is being done to improve police performance in that central area. In my time as a Member of Parliament, I have seen changes in my constituency, where some people would hardly talk to the police. That has changed and genuine partnerships now exist.

The Association of Chief Police Officers has produced a good practice guide for police response to racial incidents. A protocol has also been agreed with the Crime Prosecution Service to ensure consistency in identifying cases with a racial motivation. Those are all steps in the right direction, which we intend to build on to ensure that the mistakes of the past are avoided. The Government welcome the racial and violent crime task force, headed by DAC John Grieve, which the Metropolitan police has set up. It has the challenging task of creating a strategy for tackling that key area in the Met.

Reference has been made to the Lawrence inquiry. I wish to add my comments on how the Lawrence family has handled the whole terrible tragedy. Part 2 of the inquiry that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary set up last year into the death of Stephen Lawrence is now well under way and is looking into the lessons to be learnt for the investigation and prosecution of racially motivated crime. The death of that young man was a tragedy. The challenge will be for the police service to ensure that the results of the inquiry are grasped as an opportunity to make real and lasting changes so that it can gain the confidence of all sections of the community.

How the police use their powers is another key test of how fairly they serve the community. It can have a significant effect on the lives of members of minority ethnic communities: on their perceptions of the police and their willingness to co-operate with the police in tackling crime and disorder. The results of the first full year of ethnic monitoring of police activity, published last December, showed substantial differences in the use the police make of their powers when dealing with different ethnic groups. The statistics showed that police forces consistently stopped, searched and arrested more black people than white or Asian, but were less likely to caution black people. That has been referred to over and again by hon. Members today.

Although many variables make it difficult to interpret the data perfectly, there can be no escaping the message that black people in particular seem to get disproportionate attention from the police. It is vital that the police service takes account of that, and takes effective action to ensure that the substantial powers that police officers hold are used fairly and effectively. Progress is being made. For example, the Metropolitan police service has reviewed its use of stop and search, and developed a plan to manage that tactic fairly and effectively. The Association of Chief Police Officers has set up a project to develop effective use of ethnic monitoring data, which will inform the development of a good practice guide. We all await the results with interest.

Appropriate training for the police in community and race relations is essential to enable them to operate effectively and fairly. The Home Office has, for many years, funded a specialist unit to give expert support to the service in race and community relations training. A new strategy to be implemented from next year will see a shift in how that support is provided: support will be provided directly to individual forces to place community and race relations firmly within operational policing activities.

I tell my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham that the review of national police training is on ice while the Select Committee on Home Affairs conducts an inquiry into police training. However, we intend the results of the Stephen Lawrence inquiry to feed into the review.

We hope that the new force-based approach, which will include extensive consultation with local communities, will provide the right operational and cultural context in which training can take place. As the hon. Member for Twickenham said, corners must not be cut on training.

Membership of the service must now, more than ever, reflect the diversity of society. The Home Secretary has expressed his personal commitment to that, and to the setting of targets for minority ethnic recruitment, retention and promotion in all services for which the Home Office is responsible. I gently advise the hon. Member for Ryedale that we cannot allow resources to be used as an excuse for not recruiting more ethnic minorities in the police service. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's support for targets, but make it absolutely clear that targets are not the same as quotas. There is a big difference.

The Home Office and the Black Police Association have a close working relationship, to which black police officers are well placed to make an important contribution not only operationally but in terms of understanding what goes on in their own community.

It is the Government's goal to create a society that treats everyone with decency and respect, regardless of their colour. The police service must take a lead in making that vision a reality. The report of the inquiry into Stephen Lawrence's death will have a significant impact on the future of race and community relations within the police service, and the service must rise to that challenge. I remind the House of what Lord Scarman said in his 1981 report:

"A police force which fails to reflect the ethnic diversity of our society will never succeed in securing the full support of all its sections."

I am confident that there is a strong commitment at all levels of the service to making the necessary changes and that we can move forward and learn from the lessons of the past. I am confident that we shall learn from the Lawrence inquiry and I very much welcome the opportunity to debate the matter this morning, and the interest shown by all hon. Members.

School Students

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): In Birmingham, on average, one in five children will change school each year other than at normal transfer times, but averages hide some salient statistics. In my constituency, the turnover rate is 29.6 per cent. in the Bartley Green ward, 22 per cent. in Edgbaston, 18 per cent. in Harborne and 19 per cent. in Quinton; in other words, the rates in all my wards are above or well above the average for the city.

Some of the schools in my constituency have significant problems. I shall use four schools in the Bartley Green ward to illustrate the tremendous range. At Ley Hill school, the turnover is 50 per cent.; at Nonsuch school, 45 per cent.; and at Kitwell school, 42 per cent. However, St. Peter's Roman Catholic school, which is 500 yd down the road from Nonsuch school, has a turnover of just 9 per cent. Averages can be deceptive and we must look at the problems faced by individual schools.

Why is mobility a problem? Children who change school frequently are at greater risk of under-achieving academically. They tend to have a poorer attendance record, poorer concentration and poorer motivation. They are also more likely to have special educational needs. High mobility in any school affects continuity and progression, and children find it difficult to catch up when they change school. That, in turn, tends to lead to low self-esteem, behavioural problems and exclusion. The children who change schools are not the only ones affected; the children who attend a school at a time of high mobility suffer knock-on effects. Those children who are not absent are still affected when new children have to catch up, and that damages their educational experience.

Some research has been carried out in Birmingham. In March 1997, the Ladywood consortium of schools carried out a survey on pupil mobility. The results were most enlightening. Moving house accounted for some 72 per cent. of children changing schools. However, some 18 per cent. of those in Ladywood remained in the area but still changed schools. In certain parts of Birmingham, there has been a fall in the birth rate, so schools have vacant places. It has become almost a habit that, when children encounter difficulties in one school, they are simply moved to another. Rather than facing up to problems and trying to solve them, moving is seen as a solution, but it tends to aggravate the problems.

How can we reduce and manage mobility? It is accepted that it is a cross-agency problem and that no one agency can address it. In Birmingham, additional resources have been provided through the local management of schools formula. There are also pilot projects on unique pupil identifiers to ensure that pupils are not lost in the system. There is an increased focus on inclusion, which involves giving schools additional support when children move to ensure that their records and work are passed on.

Extra funding is not sufficient, however. The extra resources given as a result of mobility tend to have a negative knock-on effect on the funding for free school meals. Therefore, rather than gaining twice as they really should, some schools tend to lose out by the trading off under the formula. It generates some extra funds, but they are not sufficient.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will be aware that, although the English average for claiming free school meals is 22 per cent., the average for Birmingham is 37 per cent. In some schools in my constituency, entitlement on the basis of drawing income support would suggest figures of 60 to 70 per cent., but the benefit is not claimed. There is still a perceived stigma to claiming free school meals, so official figures underestimate the true problem.

I should like to draw on the experience of two head teachers in my constituency who described the problem more accurately than I can. Mrs. Pat Cook from Kitwell primary school wrote to me about resources, saying:

"The trend over the last three years shows a pupil turnover rate of 42.5 per cent. The present system of funding does not fully take into account extra consumable materials the school has to purchase . . . additional teacher time, secretarial time, Special Needs Co-ordinator time in general administration of records"— which change continually—

"discussions with previous and receiving schools, telephone and postal charges"— to communicate with new parents and the "additional workload when statemented pupils transfer."

There is a tendency for pupils who move very frequently to have special educational needs. She also makes this important point:

"Pupils who join us after form 7 (January) but leave before September bring no funding at all".

The funding formula is not sufficiently sensitive.

Other than resources—it could be argued that it is for individual local education authorities to come up with formulae that address their needs—there is also the problem of setting targets. The Government have asked schools to set targets for 2000 in respect of key stage 2 and GCSEs.

Let me make it clear that none of the head teachers with whom I have spoken is against setting targets or in any way lacks commitment to raising standards. Pat Cook wrote:

"We are committed to raising standards—we are happy to set targets—but please take into account pupil mobility."

She said that 30 of her current year 6 will sit an exam by the end of the year, but 10 of them have only just joined the school.

The second school in my constituency to which I make direct reference is Ley Hill primary school. The head teacher, Roger Cunningham, told me last week that he had 380 pupils on the roll and that, last year, he admitted 174 and lost 154. Although he accepts that the figures include some year 6 students and some reception students, pupil turnover averages 50 per cent. His particular concern is that the Government's system of target setting is, in his words,

"at best gazing into the crystal ball in a school with a mobility of some 50 per cent."

He writes:

"The circular 11/98 'Target Setting in Schools' does not allow for targets to be adjusted for mobility once they have been set. It argues that mobility can be positive as well as negative. While that is true it does seem that Ley Hill is subject to Social Mobility with our better families being rehoused. Since carrying out our annual tests in May, we have lost five children from the 2000 target group. Three of them would have been certain Level 4 children. We have admitted into the year group a child with learning difficulties who has arrived complete with Integration Support."

Roger Cunningham and other head teachers face the difficulty that committed teachers and head teachers do their level best to deal with a rapidly moving population, but there is a danger that some of the target setting assumes a linear progression in improving standards that schools such as Kitwell will never be able to achieve by the very nature of the communities that they serve. They have a very real fear that the current targeting system is not sufficiently sensitive to their schools, which should be allowed to renew and review their annual targets much more frequently. I urge my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary to reconsider the current system of target setting to take account of mobility.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): The Government welcome the debate. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) on the strong and clear way in which she has put her case. I should like to mention the similar work of my hon. Friend the Member for Waveney (Mr. Blizzard).

For a long time, central Government have given insufficient priority to high pupil mobility. Unfortunately, the statistics that my hon. Friend has given are not atypical. She mentioned schools with mobility rates of 42, 45 and 50 per cent. and wards in her constituency with a 29 per cent. mobility rate. My hon. Friend the Member for Waveney made an analysis of four schools in his constituency—a very different part of the country—where turnover was 31 per cent. Data obtained from six London local education authorities have verified that this is a major issue in many parts of Greater London. Statistics for one inner-London authority show that more than one third of children taking key stage 2 tests last year had not been in the same school at key stage 1. Manchester local education authority also cited high mobility as a key issue in its evidence to the 1994–95 Education Select Committee inquiry on performance in inner-city schools.

The whole House owes a debt to my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston for raising the issue, because the problem is not just local to her constituency; it has profound implications across the education system, and insufficient attention has been paid to it.

I agreed with my hon. Friend's points about the implications of high mobility for education and the educational problems that arise when it is difficult to manage and address issues of mobility properly. High pupil mobility is one of the many factors that can affect pupil performance and school management. Much more attention needs to be paid to it. However, there is little hard information on the causes and effects. The issues are complex. I shall mention four factors that affect pupil mobility.

The first factor is internal migration. People may move locally because of a change in their job, career cycle, life cycle or housing—in that respect, I was interested in the Ladywood survey to which my hon. Friend referred. There are also particular communities such as travellers who move around and for whom specific provision is made in the standards fund. The second important factor is institutional movement—exclusions, voluntary transfers, people moving between special schools and others and people moving between the private independent system and the state system. Thirdly, there is individual movement—children in care, families breaking up and circumstances changing that result in children moving around. Fourthly—this is not a trivial issue at all, particularly in our great cities—there is international migration, as people move to and from this country; that can happen as a result of making job changes, seeking refugee status or moving around as a student.

A complex series of factors play their part in determining what happens, but our information is very patchy. My hon. Friend mentioned the contrast between two neighbouring schools, one with a 9 per cent. level of mobility and the other with 42 per cent. My Department is co-operating with a new research project to be conducted at the migration research unit at University college, London by Dr. Janet Dobson, who wrote an interesting piece on the subject in The Times Educational Supplement two or three weeks ago. With funding from the Nuffield Foundation, the study will look at the nature and causes of pupil mobility and the implications of high mobility for current national strategies to raise educational standards and achievement.

In particular, the project will review the current state of knowledge on child migration, which is patchy. It will establish what is currently known about the implications of high pupil mobility, developing a better understanding of the incidence of high mobility and the policy issues deriving from it and painting a detailed picture of the scale and nature of pupil mobility in some high mobility schools and the implications for strategies to raise achievement. We are considering additional funding support to accelerate the project, which will begin next year, so that it can be more comprehensive and achieve more accurate results more quickly. We look forward to the results with great interest.

We would welcome more concrete evidence on mobility, such as that produced by my hon. Friend, to clarify how issues arise between different schools in an area and the implications for educational performance. The subject has not been sufficiently discussed. I hope that the research project with which we are co-operating will provide a focus for proper debate and discussion of the issues.

The research project will also provide the basis of any policy changes that may be needed to take account of the problems caused by mobility. Many issues are involved, of which my hon. Friend raised several. Record keeping is important. Records are not passed on in a way that assists education as people move from school to school. There is a lot of evidence that the performance advance of children at the beginning of secondary school in particular is not as fast as at other times. One reason is that school records are not passed on as efficiently and rapidly as they should be. As a result, secondary school teachers do not understand their pupils' educational history as well as would be beneficial to them as teachers and to the pupils. That is highlighted by what my hon. Friend has said about mobility between schools, not just at the primary-secondary transfer. My Department will produce new guidance later this year to tighten up on the approach so that our system of records will ensure that past educational achievement is properly understood.

My hon. Friend also mentioned exclusion and truancy and the general framework of social exclusion that affects some schools more than others. She will know that, at the start of October, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced a major new programme of £493 million of expenditure over three years.

Ms Stuart: Some schools in my constituency have pupils with dual registration. A pupil may have been excluded from one school and be then registered in a special school, and a mainstream school is prepared to take that pupil on dual registration. If that student has to be expelled again, the forecast GCSE results will count towards the targets. That provides a disincentive for schools to take the risk of bringing students back into the mainstream.

Mr. Clarke: That is an excellent and valid point, which I entirely take. I shall comment later on certain reviews; perhaps I may address my hon. Friend's accurate and correct point in that context. As with her other points, it has general applicability across the system.

Our social exclusion policies seek to achieve a multi-agency approach, in which schools work with the police, the probation service and particularly social services to try to ensure a much more supportive, less professionally segmented, more positive and constructive atmosphere in which to try to address the problems. We are specifically putting resources into the education of children in care, which has been very much neglected over a long period. Although those measures do not directly address the issue of mobility, I hope and believe that the coherent Government programme will reduce the incidence of some of the factors that lead to mobility and problems in schools in my hon. Friend's constituency.

My hon. Friend referred to target setting, which is an exceptionally important aspect of the subject. As she knows, the Government believe that setting specific, measurable targets for pupil performance is a very powerful lever for raising educational standards. I was very glad that she mentioned the commitment to that approach of head teachers of the schools that she described. Their commitment is shared throughout the teaching profession. People acknowledge the benefit of setting targets to focus attention on how we solve problems.

Setting pupil performance targets is also an essential tool in school management, as it adds clarity and focus to the school planning process, allowing a school to address issues and problems internally. Higher standards will be achieved only if schools take responsibility for their improvement and feel that they have ownership of the target-setting process. My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston rightly pointed out that some head teachers feel that they do not own sufficiently the target-setting process in their school when external factors are hitting them over the head. Just as they need to feel ownership of the process, we need to be able to respond constructively.

There is no doubt from research and inspection evidence that target setting raises pupil performance. There is no doubt either that our new statutory targets are in line with other targets that the Government are setting, to achieve coherence between schools and LEAs' educational development plans, and nationally, as we seek to move the process of achievement forward.

It is important that schools set targets based on past trends, benchmark data, national targets, LEA targets and teacher forecasts, which aggregate pupil results. It is therefore entirely reasonable that, in schools where there is high mobility of the kind to which my hon. Friend referred, that factor is taken into account when setting targets and deciding how to move forward.

High pupil mobility makes it difficult to aggregate school targets on individual pupils. As the schools that are affected are so wide ranging—I have been surprised by it—it is important that we consider detailed research in deciding what guidance to offer on how mobility can be taken into account. I regret that, in past years, there has not been detailed research into the matter. That is why I am glad to be able to announce today our co-operation with the research projects at University college, London.

Schools with high pupil mobility should certainly seek to make similar progress toward national and LEA targets to other schools, as the head teachers of the schools in Birmingham, Edgbaston have acknowledged. It is obviously highly desirable in so doing to take account of a school's circumstances, including high mobility. We are reviewing the target-setting process for 1999. It would not be appropriate to revisit the arrangements for this year so late in the process, although we shall draw on this year's experience in reviewing the working of regulations governing target setting. We shall obviously take into account a wide variety of issues as well as, to the extent that that is possible, pupil mobility issues.

I should make one important qualification. We shall not, even this year, properly understand what causes mobility and why its incidence is so selective and partial in schools in the same LEA, constituency or ward. Before we come to firm, long-term views on how we should properly take pupil mobility into account, I am keen to see evidence generated by the research projects to which I referred.

Ms Stuart: It is interesting that, because of the different reasons behind mobility, the social problems associated with it do not arise in the nearby constituency of Birmingham, Selly Oak, where the university population causes a high turnover. I therefore welcome the detailed research.

Mr. Clarke: I appreciate that remark. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Selly Oak (Dr. Jones) tabled a written question on the matter earlier in the year, in which she focused on similar points. The difficulty is that the issue is so complex; there is such an interplay of factors. Before giving clear guidance, we need to establish how such factors relate to each other. One very important thing that we need to do nationally, in schools and through LEA educational development plans is to identify the causes of high mobility properly and develop strategies to reduce its adverse effect on pupil performance.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): I thank the Minister for his positive response to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart), who has raised a very important subject. She raised one issue on which he has not touched—the tracking of pupils. Will he comment on the Government's thoughts on the matter? I am sure that he is aware of concern about the fact that we have no idea where some pupils who leave a school go. Such tracking data would have been very helpful, for example, in the appalling and tragic Fred West case. Have the Government any plans to implement a tracking mechanism?

Mr. Clarke: I entirely accept the hon. Gentleman's remarks. I mentioned the transfer of records. The awful West case was one of the aspects that informed our approach. We must consider not only educational issues, which I have sought to address, but those concerning lost children, which can be, and have been, deeply tragic. We are taking on board the hon. Gentleman's comments. We are looking at ways in which to introduce unique pupil identifiers—UPIs—to which my hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston referred. There are significant information technology issues, too, as schools begin to move forward in that respect. We are conscious of the fact that, as we try to work out the best way to adopt a much more effective system of tracking pupils, which is needed, we must not place additional burdens on teachers. My Department is looking closely at the matter and will provide detailed guidance later this year on record keeping and the transfer of records. More substantially, we shall be making proposals on this very important issue. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Edgbaston asked how head teachers and schools should explain to local communities the implications of mobility figures for their performance results. I should emphasise that it is entirely appropriate and right for performance tables and results to be published in the proper context in annual reports, so that parents and the local community may understand the circumstances in which the achievements were made, and, should head teachers or governors deem it appropriate, the specific impact of high pupil mobility on examination results is explained.

I hope that, on the evidence of the research project that I have mentioned, and the steps that we are already taking to review target setting, my hon. Friend will accept that we take the issue seriously. We would also encourage governors and head teachers to explain to parents and the rest of the community the precise impact that high mobility has on exam results. I thank my hon. Friend for introducing the debate, which gives the first real airing to an important subject that is not well understood.

Newhaven Port

12.59 pm

Mr. Norman Baker (Lewes): I am grateful for the opportunity to hold the debate, although I wish that it were not necessary. As the Minister will know, I last initiated an Adjournment debate on Government support for Newhaven in June, when I drew attention to the importance of the port not only for Newhaven itself but for a much wider region. I am sure that she accepts that a wider region is affected by the fortunes of Newhaven port.

Introducing my debate on 3 June, I said:

"This is a critical time for Newhaven. The port is at a crossroads . . . It has the potential a major success story of the next century, but it might also slip away, leaving a shell of derelict buildings, rusting metal and high unemployment . . . The Government, local councils and, crucially, the private sector must all deliver if we are to succeed".—[Official Report, 3 June 1998; Vol. 313, c. 324.]

I am sorry to tell the House that the five months since then have not been kind to Newhaven. The crossroads sign has begun to swing round, away from prosperity and towards the rusting metal and empty shell. In response to my previous debate, the Minister gave me genuinely sympathetic words, and set out the help that has been provided by both the present and the previous Government.

I acknowledge the help that has been given, and place on record again my thanks for the positive approach and flexibility of the Government office for the south-east. However, let there be no misunderstanding. Today I have to say clearly that that level of help is no longer enough. The situation has deteriorated, and I ask the Government to move up a gear, as the French Government did yesterday.

The seriousness of the position is reflected by the fact that in the Strangers Gallery today we have a large contingent from Dieppe, including the Deputy and mayor, Christian Cuvilliez, with representatives from the unions and from the Dieppe chamber of commerce. Hon. Members may have seen the coaches outside the House bearing the slogan "Save the Line".

I am pleased that so many distinguished guests are here today to listen to the debate and to hear the Minister's response. I hope that she will send them away in an optimistic frame of mind, and I am grateful that she has said that she will be able to have a brief few words with the members of the delegation immediately after the debate. I know that her timetable is very tight, and the fact that she has found us a small space is much appreciated both by our friends from Dieppe and by me.

I am also grateful for the support of other local Members of Parliament, especially the hon. Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper), who is in the Chamber now, and who has initiated an unprecedented statement of support for the ferry from interests on both sides of the channel. All the local Members, from all parties, have contacted me and been supportive. The hon. Members for Pavilion, for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner), for Hove (Mr. Caplin) and for Hastings and Rye (Mr. Foster), and the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), have all signed my early-day motion 1694 on the subject. I notice that the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Waterson) is also present today, and I encourage him to add his signature.

Let me outline the present position. It has become clear that the port owner, Sea Containers, is not prepared to build a new outer harbour, despite having signed up, literally, to the town's regeneration programme as established through the Newhaven economic partnership, which clearly included that project.

The alternative suggestion was for a deepening of the existing harbour—an idea that came from Sea Containers itself. Yet the company now says that it is not prepared to do that, either, despite the fact that the Government office for the south-east was helpful and flexible about altering the plans for the approved port access road, to be funded through capital challenge, and the county council committed yet more public money to redesign the road.

The county council had done all the work, and was ready to go. Planning permission had been obtained, all the land ownership problems had been sorted out, and extensive landscaping schemes designed. The county then waited almost a year for Sea Containers to deliver its side of the bargain; it waited in vain.

Now that window of opportunity for funding the road has been lost. Also lost, almost certainly, is the well-respected and key local employer, James Fisher, which has been unable to reach a satisfactory deal with Sea Containers, and, I understand, is now negotiating a surrender of its lease. More jobs are being lost.

Most serious is the potential loss of the ferry route that has operated between Newhaven and Dieppe for 173 years. Ho Chi Minh once worked on the route, Lord Salisbury travelled on it to reach his home in France, and Lord Lucan allegedly used it to escape from the country. I hope that the ferry does not disappear, as he did.

Last week, P and O Stena announced the withdrawal of the Elite, the fast craft used on the route. We are now down to one ancient trundling boat, the Cambria, which sails twice a day and is often late. Indeed, it was late this morning. Its timetable is hardly designed to attract extra traffic. The boat used by our French friends this morning left Dieppe at 3.45 am.

The ferry company is in talks with the unions to discuss a range of options, one of which is to close the line altogether. That would be catastrophic for both Newhaven and Dieppe, and for nearby areas in Normandy and East Sussex, including Brighton and Hove, and Eastbourne.

Mr. David Lepper (Brighton, Pavilion): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that some of us gave our reluctant support to the limited merger between P and O and Stena last year only on the understanding that that would secure substantial new investment in that vital ferry service, and that those of us who did so feel betrayed to some extent by the company?

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman is right. He has hit the nail on the head. People have a right to feel betrayed. They expected a better service from P and O Stena as a result of the merger, and they have not got it. If that service goes, 440 jobs are directly at stake—indeed, some have already gone with the disappearance of the Elite—and the knock-on effect on the wider region would be substantial.

Closure of the line cannot be allowed to happen. All the local authorities and Members of Parliament, in both Newhaven and Dieppe and in their local areas, stand shoulder to shoulder to fight any such proposal.

The French Government yesterday added their support, and I hope that our Government will mirror their attitude today.

I met my opposite number, Mr. Cuvilliez, who is here today, in Dieppe on Monday to discuss the situation. Yesterday he raised the matter in the French Assembly, and I have now provided the Minister's office with a copy of that exchange in advance of today's debate. She will have seen that the French Government have accepted that the matter is "une question grave et sérieuse".

The French Government also suggest that any closure or even diminution of the line might be contrary to the conditions fixed in Brussels at the time of the merger between P and O and Stena. I have already discussed that idea with the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry, and her office subsequently advised me that the Government do not believe that the merger conditions have been breached. In the light of the French Government's response, however, may I ask the Minister to look afresh at the question, and be kind enough to drop a line to other Members and to myself?

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown): I represent a constituency next to the Newhaven area, and Brighton and Hove have a strong interest in the future of the port, which falls within our travel-to-work area. I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper); he and both I met the management of Stena Line, and were given the same undertakings, which the company has now breached.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) will agree that many commercial complications are involved, and companies are acting with no regard for the impact of their actions on the communities that the port serves. If the line has lost passengers, which it has, precipitately, that is scarcely surprising. The company cannot justifiably use the opening of the channel tunnel to explain the loss, because, as I think the hon. Gentleman will agree, the line has been so appallingly managed that, if the company had set out to deter passengers, it could not have done a better job.

I therefore assure the hon. Gentleman of our support in asking Ministers to do everything that they can to introduce some rationality into the situation so that we can have a future. I am sure that he agrees with me—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I have given the hon. Gentleman some leeway, but he must understand that he is making an intervention, not a speech.

Mr. Baker: I do agree with the hon. Gentleman, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I agree with his analysis of the Stena problem, and I am grateful for the cross-party support on the issue. In fact, that was to be my next point.

The level of commitment that Stena showed to the line has waned somewhat since the merger with P and O. The company says that it is experiencing large losses on the line, but there is a strong belief, especially in France, that it is deliberately redirecting freight away from the line and on to its Dover-Calais route. The chambre de commerce believes that £3 million of the alleged £8 million losses is attributable to that alone. P and O Stena has three cross-channel lines. Many people believe that it wants to save money by operating only two, and has decided that Newhaven-Dieppe is the one to go. We need a clear statement from P and O Stena of its position.

There has also been a complete lack of marketing for the line recently, but despite that, despite problems with the boats, despite poor timekeeping and despite the timetable, about 700,000 passengers were carried last year. They used the line in spite of P and O Stena, rather than because of it, because the line would be successful and make a profit if only investment was made in infrastructure, marketing and achieving reliability.

The problems that Newhaven has at present are largely due to the behaviour of Sea Containers and, to a lesser extent, the ferry company. All aspects of the public sector, in this country and in France, have delivered their parts of the bargain and have consistently shown commitment to, and faith in, Newhaven and the ferry link. I must conclude that we would not be in this situation if the port and the ferry were in public hands. That may sound old Labour, or old Liberal, but it is difficult not to draw that conclusion.

Sea Containers is interested only in Sea Containers. Its strategy over the past 10 years has been minimum expenditure—just enough to deal with maintenance of statutory obligations—while bleeding as much money as it can out of the port. It will not invest in the port, nor can it find a buyer. That is, at least in part, due to the fact that it has grossly over-valued the port at £18 million, and has, I understand, borrowed against it. If Sea Containers sold the port for its real value, the over-valuing would be revealed, so it sits tight and bleeds it dry instead.

Sea Containers' latest tactic is to seek planning permission for land it owns in the strategic gap between Newhaven and Seaford. It wants to increase the value of its land to bring it up to the £18 million figure that it has arbitrarily set, should it receive such permission. In such circumstances, it might invest in the port.

Let me be clear: this is an attempt to blackmail the council into giving planning permission that it would otherwise not countenance. Having said that, the council would of course be prepared to consider any proposals, but they would have to be backed up with legal and enforceable guarantees. Sea Containers must come absolutely clean on its detailed plans for Newhaven, and then stick to what it has said. That has not been the case so far. If those plans are made clear, it will then be for people in Newhaven and Seaford to take a view, and make it known to their elected representatives at all levels.

Sea Containers has told me that it is prepared for one year to run a fast ferry on the route during the summer months, if P and O Stena withdraws. That is welcome as far as it goes, but it is not in any way enough. It appears that Sea Containers wants to cream off the profitable summer trade with a craft that requires little on-investment in the port—more bleeding of the port. I say to Sea Containers, "If you bleed the port too much, you will destroy your own asset. The longer you fail to invest, the more businesses will pull out, and the real value of the port will fall further from the arbitrary £18 million figure."

I should like the Government to intervene before breakfast, before lunch and before dinner, and I have six requests for the Minister. First, will she examine the legal position, to which I referred earlier, in respect of the European Commission? Secondly, will the Government put pressure on P and O Stena to make its intentions abundantly clear, and to maintain the route at a proper level of boats and investment? Thirdly, will they put pressure on Sea Containers to make its plans clear, and to introduce plans, which it has promised for so long, to invest in Newhaven port?

Fourthly, will the Government consider areas where they could apply for European Union funding for port infrastructure improvements, and support the plans for rail investment through the trans-European rail network, because Newhaven to London is a trans-European rail line? Fifthly, will they consider reallocating the money in capital challenge for the port access road to other port improvements, which could be discussed with the county council and the district council?

Lastly, will the Minister, or one of her colleagues, visit Newhaven to meet people and discuss matters on the ground? I want those six questions answered, but my constituents want one question answered: what will the Government do to keep the ferry going and to save Newhaven? We need a clear and decisive answer today.

1.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (Ms Glenda Jackson): The hon. Member for Lewes (Mr. Baker) ended his speech with six requests, but there were seven, I think. On the legal position, I will most certainly look into it. On pressure that the Government can bring to bear on the two commercial organisations to which he referred—P and O Stena and Sea Containers—he will be aware that the Government's powers in those areas are limited. I intend to touch on European funding and possible changes to capital challenge later.

On the kind invitation to visit Newhaven, as I have told my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Dr. Turner)—I say it now to the hon. Member for Lewes, my hon. Friends the Members for Brighton, Pavilion (Mr. Lepper) and for Hove (Mr. Caplin), and the right hon. Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), who sits on the Conservative Benches—I am happy to meet everyone at the earliest opportunity which is convenient to us all.

The hon. Member for Lewes said that he wished that he did not have to touch on the issues mentioned in the debate. All hon. Members with particular concerns about the port of Newhaven and its surrounding area will share that feeling. Although I am not aware that P and O Stena has made any formal public announcement about the future of the Newhaven-Dieppe ferry route, I am aware, as we all are, of the press reports. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Transport raised that issue with Lord Sterling, the chairman of P and O, because of the high level of public concern. My right hon. Friend was told that the company had not yet reached a final decision.

The hon. Member for Lewes detailed the important role that Newhaven plays in linking the south-east region and markets in continental Europe. Newhaven-Dieppe is the shortest and most direct of the ferry routes, and, like neighbouring Shoreham, is a key port for marine aggregates for the construction industry. The port handles 1.3 million tonnes of cargo, including fruit, vegetables, fish and forest products; passengers, to the tune of 841,000; and about 160,000 vehicles. Its importance to the area is clear.

A number of measures have already been put in place to help the regeneration of Newhaven port and Newhaven town, and I thank the hon. Member for Lewes for the warm thanks that he expressed to the Government office for the south-east.

In December 1996, under the pilot capital challenge scheme, East Sussex county council was awarded credit approval of £6.8 million towards the £7.8 million cost of a port access road, to which the hon. Member for Lewes referred. That road was considered to be the key to unlocking Newhaven. However, following discussions between East Sussex county council and its local partners, it has been decided not to proceed with the port access road scheme as originally proposed. I understand that the county council may consider alternative proposals designed to meet the objectives of its capital challenge bid. We will, of course, consider those proposals carefully, but the county council allocation needs to have been used by March 2000.

The wider regeneration of Newhaven includes £6.5 million of the Government's single regeneration budget challenge funding. That remains available for a range of regeneration projects developed to address strategic objectives in the comprehensive economic regeneration of Newhaven, without regard to the capital challenge project.

East Sussex county council also secured a bid through Interreg, the European funding programme, for a £1 million grant contribution towards the port access road. The Government office for the south-east will continue to discuss with our French partners ways of ensuring that the proposed Interreg support for the regeneration of Newhaven may proceed, possibly in some other form.

In addition, Lewes district council has applied to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for grant to aid the fisheries aspects of the modernisation of Newhaven port. Grant for a feasibility study has already been made under the PESCA scheme, and Lewes district council has been given approval in principle to grant-aid its proposed west quay scheme at 50 per cent. of £1.35 million.

The Interreg proposals have already demonstrated the potential value of co-operation between British and French partners on the future of Newhaven. I welcome the contact that the hon. Member for Lewes has made with Dieppe, and the work that he has put in to ensure that not only are our French colleagues present here today but that I will have the opportunity to meet them, albeit briefly.

I can well understand the disappointment of the hon. Member for Lewes and, indeed, other hon. Members about the possible loss or curtailment of ferry services from the port. However, it would be premature for me to comment on that matter when decisions have not yet been taken by the ferry operator.

The hon. Gentleman touched on new port development for Newhaven. That could be a matter for the port operator, although the new port access road, which is being publicly funded, could serve such a facility if it meets the original aims of the capital challenge bid. However, any development would require approval from my Department. We have seen no plans and there has been no formal application for such an approval, so I cannot comment on the proposal; nor would I want to say how it might be affected by possible changes to ferry services.

All hon. Members who have joined in this debate or made representations to me have touched on the P and O Stena merger. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Pavilion spoke briefly on that subject this morning. As we know, the European Commission has not yet announced its formal decision on the merger. However, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's findings do not bear out the contention that the joint venture is to blame for the decline of the Newhaven-Dieppe route.

The report recorded Stena's projections of substantial losses for Dover-Calais and Newhaven-Dieppe if the merger did not proceed. The MMC considered that, in respect of freight, the Newhaven-Dieppe service was more likely to remain competitive within the joint venture than outside it. In respect of passenger services, it considered that the joint venture would improve the potential for the continuation of the existing choice of routes.

In view of the uncertainties, prohibiting the merger would not have been warranted. My right hon. Friend the then President of the Board of Trade took account of the fact that the adverse effects identified by the MMC were expected to arise only after June 1999, when duty-free sales are due to end. She also took into account the MMC's view that there were benefits from the joint venture, which would be lost if the merger were prohibited, and that adjustments of cross-channel capacity are necessary as a result of the opening of the channel tunnel.

The MMC's findings suggest that that would not have been an answer to the decline of the Newhaven-Dieppe route. The Secretary of State's powers in respect of mergers under the Fair Trading Act 1973 are limited to remedying the adverse effects specified by the MMC, not other matters, and therefore cannot be used to require continuation of the Newhaven-Dieppe service.

I well understand that all hon. Members are interested in good accessibility to the port of Newhaven. They are keen to know whether the Government have the power to delay closure until matters have been looked into. There is no power in national shipping legislation that enables the Secretary of State to delay the decision of a private company, taken for commercial reasons, to withdraw from the provision of a ferry service in circumstances such as these. However, I have little doubt that, in the light of the meeting that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State has held with the chairman of P and O, and also of this debate, which will be read with close attention, the concerns that are being expressed in the House by representatives of the people who live in and around Newhaven and the port will be closely considered.

Perhaps hon. Members are thinking of circumstances in which a ferry service is provided as an essential lifeline to a remote community, which has no other realistic means of access and where economic life is entirely and exclusively dependent on that service. Those are circumstances that are covered only by legislation specific to Scotland, and limited geographically to the highlands and islands. The Newhaven-Dieppe route, although important to the area, is not the sole means of access or of economic support.

There have been suggestions that the Government might subsidise the service to assure its survival. However, it is not Government policy to subsidise a service that does not fulfil a vital economic lifeline role—there would have to be no alternative route or method of transport. Clearly, there are other sea routes across the channel, and other means of travel to the continent. We would need to consider very carefully whether a subsidy would be compatible with European Community rules, or whether, on the other hand, it would be a distortion of competition in the market. Clearly, the overriding concern this morning is what is perceived to be the removal of a ferry service, but, as I said, Newhaven is a sizeable port as regards handling cargoes and freight.

Railtrack is investigating the scope to develop several major routes for freight, and, with a group of local authorities, is studying congestion on the south coast rail route from Weymouth to Dover, with the aim of improving services to encourage more use of the route. We are watching that study with close interest. The new freight companies have adopted positive attitudes and ambitious targets, which would quadruple the proportion of freight tonne kilometres by rail in the next 10 years. Rail freight volume has already shown a 5 per cent. growth in tonne kilometres in 1996-97, which is the first such increase in many years.

More needs to be done. We have made it abundantly clear that we are committed to the creation of a strategic rail authority, so that the sort of issues that have been raised here this morning—how we can be best served by our railway infrastructure, where more investment is needed—can be more strategically directed. Indeed, a shadow strategic rail authority will be in operation by next spring, based on the British Railways Board and the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising working closely together under new leadership.

Strategic planning will be an early priority for the shadow SRA, to fill the void caused by privatisation. That work will develop into the strategic plan of the SRA proper. Therefore, it will deal with key long-term issues such as demand, capacity, service levels and investment.

Of course, rail is not the only means of taking people and freight into and out of our ports and it would be grossly improper of me to suggest that. Certainly, our roads play a major part in such movements. The inherited roads programme included a scheme to improve the A27 between Southerham and Beddingham, and representations both for and against were received during the public consultation. A scheme to improve the A26 was withdrawn from the roads programme in December 1995. The A27 Southerham-Beddingham scheme has been withdrawn from the trunk road programme. Problems along that stretch of the A27 will now be tackled in the Southampton-Folkestone study.

We had to examine the environmental impact of all schemes. The Southerham-Beddingham scheme is in a particularly sensitive area environmentally, affecting a site of special scientific interest and the Sussex downs area of outstanding natural beauty, part of which is also designated as an environmentally sensitive area. There was uncertainty about whether the scheme as proposed would have proved the most sustainable solution. For Newhaven and its port, as indeed for the United Kingdom as a whole, the Government believe that we must have sustainable development, and that environmental considerations must always be given the value and importance that they warrant.

The Government are determined to encourage greater use of the railways for passengers and freight. We want improvements in existing rail services and in other transport infrastructures, not least the inland waterways and short-sea shipping. As the topic of debate is in essence a port, I must point out that we will be publishing a daughter document on ports and another on shipping, after the publication of the integrated transport White Paper.

The Government have made it abundantly clear that our overriding goal is to ensure that we can move more freight not only by rail but by using other modes of transport. On rail, we are examining what further action we can take in the context of our integrated transport policy White Paper. We have already taken major steps by overhauling the freight grants scheme. Shortly after coming to office, we doubled the grant available for moving freight from the roads, and we have increased it by a further £10 million for 1998–99. An initiative to publicise that system has resulted in the take-up of all last year's £30 million. Moreover, £32 million of this year's grant money is already accounted for.

I am sure that the hon. Member for Lewes and my hon. Friend the Member for Pavilion—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is time for the next debate.

Doctors

1.30 pm

Dr. Ian Gibson (Norwich, North): In many professions, new discoveries, new evidence, new technologies and new problems require a fresh examination of the skills and knowledge that are needed for training programmes, not only for those who are already in the profession but for those who are about to embark on a career within it.

That is particularly true for the practice of medicine, which has changed dramatically in the past 20 years. For example, the results of keyhole surgery and its effects on bed occupation have been dramatic. Indeed, the new organisational structures of the health service have meant that a re-examination of the roles of general practitioners and hospital doctors is vital.

The next 10 years promise to be equally turbulent, as the human genome project unfolds, information technology explodes, new diseases emerge and the public, whose scepticism has been fanned by media scares of incompetence, start to question the adage that the doctor knows best.

Demands for new approaches to medical education are being made. A modern doctor will, for example, need to understand the human genome project, its relevance to patients and its consequences for health programmes. He or she will have to understand predisposition genes for disease and how patients have an individual genetic profile, which will also be relevant to their offspring. I bet that each profile will, following genetic diagnosis, end up like a passport on a microchip.

The result will be—if indeed GPs survive—that advice will have to be given about life styles, risk analysis and on-going treatment. The effects will reverberate around our hospitals, as informed patients ask, "Why this treatment and not that one?" Demands will be made, based on public knowledge, for the best treatments available. Individual patients will need to receive advice on what happens if they smoke or eat this or that. The effects of global warming on disease patterns will also require local, national and international programmes of health management.

As yet, few GPs or consultants are aware of those likelihoods, and I doubt whether they are much considered in medical education in our universities. Past inadequacies—in, for example, occupational health training, toxicology and nutritional studies—will be mirrored in current medical training programmes.

The new considerations will, of course, involve resource spend—insurance companies are already considering, with eagle eyes, the premium consequences for life policies. Patients will need to be well informed before and after genetic tests are proposed. It is clear that doctors will need education in many new areas.

Some doctors will also want to go into research, as happens in the United States, where clinical knowledge and scientific research go hand in hand, Nobel prizes are won and new strategies for disease treatment are evolved. Such doctor training has given rise to new therapies and treatments, and it should be encouraged in this country. The fossilised, ghettoised methods and attitudes that persist in our medical training will need to be fundamentally altered.

Doctors will need to have other understandings and skills. They will need a knowledge of economics to understand the implications of cost analysis and to make decisions about resource allocation. All hon. Members have heard constituents complaining about how difficult it is to get time with the doctor and to understand what the doctor or consultant has said about the treatments that are available. New communication skills and methods of imparting knowledge should be learnt as part of medical training.

An essential part of training could be a project to follow a patient or family through the medical system, the social services and the benefits system. People who were ill when they went into that process can come out even iller as they try to understand the Child Support Agency, for example—benefit problems and unemployment can impart illnesses. Medics must understand the importance of the effect of social conditions on their patients.

The basic scientific programmes—the clinical, medical and surgical skills of conventional training—are still essential, as was recognised in the General Medical Council's 1993 report "Tomorrow's Doctors". Although a few medical schools have made changes to their curriculums as a result of that influential document, it can be argued that the changes required to equip doctors to function effectively in the 21st century must be radical rather than additions to the existing formula. There is serious resistance from the medical fraternity to changes in a well-established system.

I propose the establishment of a new medical structure—let us call it a school—in which we can design a new curriculum and educational process to meet the training needs of the new doctor. That process must be sufficiently flexible to incorporate future changes in training needs.

Such a training programme would ensure multi-disciplinary educational opportunities, which would enable medical students and other health professionals to share learning and experience. Clinical and theoretical aspects of learning should be integrated throughout the training period, so that reflection and debate are the order of the day. Primary and secondary care experience should be balanced to match the needs of medical employment opportunities.

Another essential area of training should be problem solving. That would facilitate the development of self-directed adult learning, so that individuals can take advantage of lifelong learning in the medical workplace. A curriculum should, at the outset of training, integrate such subjects as the economics of health care and resource allocation with basic science teaching. Current and future technology should be emphasised, as should the transmission of knowledge, management of systems of care and the direct assessment and treatment of health.

The global increase in information technology will aid progress and help to disseminate best practice, so that the best treatment and techniques are available to everyone. The new doctor will have science teaching integrated with behavioural sciences, health economics, ethics and public health and will be involved in wide-ranging discussions of disease and health care. He or she will experience clinical and social care settings with professional development built in.

Such developments will not emerge in current medical schools, so an alternative structure—or school—needs to be established in an environment where there are true partnerships between GPs, local trusts and health authorities. An environment is needed in which hospitals and educational research establishments can demonstrate excellence in programmes of science, public health, community health and clinical practice, both in teaching and research, so that clinicians prefer research to private patients.

Such an environment exists in the Yare valley in Norfolk, where a research science park nestles alongside a new hospital with the school of health at the university nearby—they all interact with one another. Medical students and other professional health service workers should be trained in such an environment. The new staff are young and enthusiastic—they provide us with a great opportunity to develop a new medical school with a new concept of teaching. Indeed, I am arguing for a new concept in medical schools, with a new medicine, new training and true interdisciplinarity—I wonder whether the Government are bold enough to allow it.

The Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Hutton): I express my gratitude to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) for choosing to debate this important subject, and I congratulate him on his constructive and thoughtful speech.

Medical education is a significant in-service activity for doctors and virtually all national health service employers. It is also a major investment. Centrally, about £1.1 billion of NHS funding has been allocated this year in England to support undergraduate and postgraduate medical education, of which £478 million is spent on undergraduate and £621 million on postgraduate education.

Further significant resources support continuing professional development. It is right to describe that as an investment: medical education is an investment in the health and care of our population. That is why it is so important, and why it should be valued so highly.

Let us be clear about the purposes of medical education. They are: to produce doctors who can communicate effectively; make a diagnosis; assess prognosis; recommend or carry out treatment; and work as part of a team. The Government want doctors to continue to learn and develop professionally throughout their careers.

I would like to explain how the Department of Health, the universities, the professional and regulatory bodies, and of course the NHS itself, can achieve that. This debate is about looking forward to the future training of doctors, so I want to focus on the current developments and initiatives that are aimed at improving the training experience of doctors and that reinforce the need for lifelong learning.

Medical education is a continuum, from medical student at one end to experienced hospital consultant or general practitioner at the other. Significant reforms to the undergraduate curriculum are being introduced by medical schools as they implement the recommendations in the General Medical Council's report, "Tomorrow's Doctors".

Those important changes encourage flexibility in curricular design and are intended to ensure that future doctors have an improved capacity to respond to changing patterns of disease and to take advantage of modern patterns of health care delivery, taking account of the whole individual and his or her place in the family and in society. They give greater emphasis to the amount of teaching in a general practice or community setting, to communication and problem solving skills, and to disease prevention and health promotion.

"Tomorrow's Doctors" also drew attention to the need for medical students to develop an understanding of all aspects of human disorder, including the impact of social factors on patterns of disease and disability, and the psychological effect of suffering and disability on patients and their families. As my hon. Friend said, doctors clearly need to understand the roles, responsibilities and skills of the other caring professions. The Government believe that it is important that an understanding of the value of professional partnerships and a capacity for teamwork should be developed during the undergraduate years and beyond.

All medical schools in the United Kingdom are now in the process of implementing the changes. I would like to reassure my hon. Friend that their progress is being closely monitored by the General Medical Council, which has a statutory responsibility to determine the extent of knowledge and skills required for the granting of primary medical qualifications in the United Kingdom.

The Government are determined that the NHS will have the doctors needed to meet the health requirements of the new century. That is why, on 22 July, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced an increase of approximately 1,000 in the intake of medical students in the United Kingdom. The Government plan to admit approximately 6,000 medical students each year by 2005: an increase of almost 1,000 over 1997. My hon. Friend might also be interested to know that there are now more doctors in training in the NHS than ever before.

Ensuring that we have the doctors we need is not only about the numbers trained. The Government want the creation of new student places to act as a driver to ensure that doctors receive the skills that they need to meet the challenges of the 21st century.

Following graduation from medical school, all doctors spend a year in general clinical training as pre-registration house officers. If that is completed successfully, the doctor is then eligible for full registration with the General Medical Council, which has stimulated an important debate about the nature of general clinical training by publishing its report, "The New Doctor". The report contains important recommendations, which the NHS is working to implement, aimed at improving the educational experience of house officers.

The Government recently introduced legislative changes to allow house officers to spend part of their pre-registration year in general practice. Allowing young doctors to get a proper feel for general practice early in their careers is an important development, and I am pleased to be able to tell my hon. Friend that the first placements have now begun on a pilot basis.

Once they hold full registration, doctors can begin their postgraduate or specialist training by spending two to three years in the senior house officer grade. The beginning of specialist training is a key stage in the continuum that will determine the future direction of a doctor's career.

It is widely recognised that the educational experience of doctors in the senior house officer grade could be improved. The Government's main advisory group on medical education is currently preparing an implementation plan for introducing a series of changes aimed at doing just that.

The changes will improve the supervisory arrangements for senior house officers; set targets for increasing the number of posts in educationally approved programmes and rotations; and ensure that the junior doctors receive the careers guidance that they need to assist them in making important career choices. The General Medical Council will shortly publish its own recommendations for improving the training arrangements for senior house officers.

Following their period in the senior house officer grade, doctors usually complete vocational training for general practice or enter a specialty-specific higher specialist training programme. We all expect a great deal from our GP. Vocational training for general practice is intended to produce doctors who are caring and understanding of patients and their families and committed to keeping up to date with developments in practice and to improving the quality of their professional performance.

As well as being knowledgeable about clinical general practice, the Government also want general practitioners to build on their undergraduate training to ensure that they have an appropriate understanding of the impact of psychological factors on illness and of illness on patients and their families, as well as the social, cultural and environmental factors that contribute to health and illness.

We also want GPs who are skilled in communication and have the ability to listen carefully; to explain matters effectively to patients; and to involve patients in decisions about their health. New summative assessment procedures were introduced earlier this year and must be passed by all doctors training for a career in general practice. The procedures test whether a doctor has the required knowledge and skills.

Significant progress has been made in the past two years in implementing the Calman reforms of higher specialist training. As a result of those important reforms, for the first time, about 12,000 junior doctors in higher specialist training are now following structured training programmes encompassing flexibility, choice, competition and regular assessments of progress.

The end point of training is now marked by the award of a certificate of completion of specialist training, which, like the certificates of prescribed and equivalent experience for general practitioners, shows that a doctor has completed a training programme to the required standards. In this case, it means that the doctor is now eligible for appointment as an NHS consultant.

The next stage in the process of implementing the Calman reforms is to deliver the full educational benefits of the changes, which will involve ensuring that, in addition to developing effective clinical skills, higher specialist trainees are able to respond to service changes and to develop further a wide range of competencies, including team working, communication skills, and the ability to identify health needs and understand the opportunities for health promotion.

The pace at which new treatments and clinical techniques are developed, combined with the need to ensure public safety, means that a doctor's education and professional development cannot end with the completion of specialist or vocational training. Independent, fully trained practitioners such as NHS consultants or general practitioners have a duty to maintain and continue to develop their clinical practice. The Government, in turn, have a responsibility, shared with the medical profession and employers, to ensure that appropriate training is available.

My hon. Friend is right to highlight the importance of research in enabling doctors to respond to new discoveries, new challenges and new problems. The national need for trained doctors who are able to apply rapidly expanding knowledge in the biological and social sciences to clinical problems remains paramount. Advances in human genetics will, as my hon. Friend suggests, bring a revolution in health care in the next century. The Government recognise the need to strengthen medical education in genetics at all stages of the continuum of training to ensure that tests are used and interpreted appropriately and efficiently. My hon. Friend may also be interested to learn that the Sanger centre at Hinxton in Cambridge is jointly funded by the Medical Research Council and the Wellcome Trust and is the most prolific public domain institution in the world dedicated to reading the sequences of the bases that make up the genomes of living species.

In publishing their White Paper, "The new NHS", and the recent consultation document, "A First Class Service—Quality in the new NHS", the Government have set out a new integrated, locally based approach to continuing professional development, which matches the needs of individual health professionals with local service objectives and patient expectations. It has set a target for the majority of health professionals to have personal development plans by April 2000.

"The new NHS" White Paper also introduced a new concept of clinical governance which embraces a range of quality assurance processes, such as clinical audit, and acknowledges the importance of continuing professional development and lifelong learning to the delivery of quality patient care in the NHS. Ensuring that the principles of clinical governance are properly reflected in medical education across the continuum provides a challenging agenda for everyone involved in the future training of doctors.

Patients are entitled to expect safe and effective care and treatment by staff who are expert in what they do. I have described a range of important and exciting developments taking place across the continuum of medical education that will ensure that the health service has the medical work force that it needs to respond both to changes in clinical practice and to increasing public expectation. That represents a substantial investment and provides clear further evidence of the Government's commitment to the long-term future of the national health service.

Oral Answers to Questions

WALES

The Secretary of State was asked—

Territorial Army (North Wales)

1. Dr. Michael Clark (Rayleigh): What discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Defence regarding proposed reductions in the Territorial Army in north Wales. [56576]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): With your permission, Madam Speaker, may I first say what a privilege it is to stand here as Secretary of State for Wales, although I wish honestly that it could have been under different circumstances? I am sure that the whole House will join me in paying tribute to my predecessor and to the tremendous work that he did on several serious and difficult policy issues during the past 18 years.

We expect an announcement to be made on the Territorial Army in the near future. I have held discussions with both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces during the past few days.

Dr. Clark: May I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his appointment to high office and wish him well? One of his responsibilities will be to ensure that Wales makes a fair and proper contribution to the defence of the United Kingdom. As the Territorial Army is a cost-effective way in which to provide manpower for the Army, will he do his best to ensure that TA regiments, particularly in north Wales, are preserved rather than reduced in size?

Mr. Michael: Wales has always made a distinguished contribution to the defence of the United Kingdom, and that will continue. I am satisfied that the Secretary of State for Defence and the Minister for the Armed Forces are engaged in ensuring that we have the right pattern for the TA for the future.

Sir Raymond Powell (Ogmore): May I be the first Labour Member publicly to congratulate my right hon. Friend on becoming Secretary of State? I am sure both that all hon. Members will share in those congratulations, and that he will do an excellent job.

Will the Secretary of State tell us what he will do not only for north Wales TA units, but for those in south Wales? The needs remain in Wales for the excellent TA, for its recruitment and for the type of person it recruits. Will my right hon. Friend spend some of his energy on ensuring that it continues its excellent work?

Madam Speaker: Order. I should perhaps remind the Secretary of State that the question refers to north Wales only.

Mr. Michael: I am grateful to you, Madam Speaker, for making sure that I do not overlook that. My colleagues at the Ministry of Defence are aware of concerns raised in correspondence in relation to both north Wales and south Wales. They are taking account of those comments as they work to restructure the TA, and they are very much aware of the importance attached to the historic traditions and the ethos of our regiments. I can assure my hon. Friend that they will give every care to the situation in north Wales, but will attend to the needs of south Wales too.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): May we, too, congratulate the Secretary of State and associate ourselves with his remarks on the excellent work of his predecessor, which was much appreciated? May I also congratulate the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, the hon. Member for Cardiff, Central (Mr. Jones), on his debut this afternoon?

Will the Secretary of State take note of my early-day motion on the future of the Territorial Army in Wales, both north and south? It is an all-party early-day motion, which has the support of Welsh Members of Parliament who do not wish to see both TA battalions go under in the review. Will he also note that Cwrt-y-gollen camp in Crickhowell trained many TA soldiers from north Wales very successfully and is to be closed by Christmas, with the loss of 40 jobs? Will he ensure that the Welsh Development Agency does something about creating employment there, for example, by building new industrial units?

Mr. Michael: Madam Speaker, as you said that I should not stray outside the boundaries of the question, I will not refer to my experiences going over the assault course in Cwrt-y-gollen. These are matters for Defence Ministers, but, as I have said, we are in contact with them and wish to ensure that the outcome of their decisions is the best possible for Wales. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his comments about my predecessor and myself, as well as my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. It is some comfort to know that I am not the only person who is new and nervous here today.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his high office, in the knowledge that he has a fine record of public work in Wales. To the business now: will my right hon. Friend make sure that, in my constituency, the drill hall at Queensferry does not close—or else? Will he ensure that the 3rd battalion of the Royal Welch Fusiliers retains a headquarters in north Wales, on the understanding that our community would not accept anything else? But we still wish him well.

Mr. Michael: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, who has always been an example to us all in being absolutely specific about the interests of his constituency and his constituents. He serves them with distinction and never allows us to forget them. He is absolutely specific in his question, but I cannot be absolutely specific in my answer. These are matters that have to be dealt with by Defence Ministers, but I am certain that notice will be taken of the comments that my hon. Friend has made today.

Mr. Elfyn Llwyd (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his appointment. I remind him, as he is a native of Colwyn bay, that, if there are any cuts in the 500-strong complement of the Royal Welch Fusiliers territorial branch in north Wales, the Colwyn Bay branch will be the first to close. Will he make the strongest possible representations to maintain this fine regiment, which has worked very cost-effectively?

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman, like other hon. Members, makes a good point about the traditions of the TA and the contribution that has been made over the years. When I spoke to my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces, he made it clear that he was aware of the different aspects and units of the Territorial Army in north Wales and of their traditions. I am sure that the points that the hon. Gentleman makes will be considered most sympathetically.

Business Start-ups

2. Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): If he will make a statement about the number of recent business start-ups in Wales. [56577]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Peter Hain): As measured by VAT registrations, there were 6,240 business start-ups in Wales in 1997.

Mr. Green: The Minister will be aware that business start-ups in Wales have fallen sharply in 1998, as compared with 1997. Given that the Welsh economy is more dependent on manufacturing industry than the United Kingdom economy as a whole and that manufacturing has borne the brunt of the Government's economic mismanagement, which has led to interest rates being higher for longer than they need be, what measures does the Minister hope to take to improve the situation and persuade the Chancellor of the Exchequer to stop crucifying Welsh manufacturing industry?

Mr. Hain: That question comes from a member of a party which presided over record interest rates, record bankruptcies and record job losses, including those in manufacturing in Wales. As for the hon. Gentleman's specific question about what action we are taking, if he took an active interest in Wales, he would know that we have been working closely with businesses throughout Wales to create opportunities for expansion and growth.

I recently attended the Confederation of British Industry conference as a Welsh Office Minister. The right hon. Member for Wokingham (Mr. Redwood) appeared on the stage there, blinking like a gormless alien, as we in Wales have seen him. All the Labour Ministers on the CBI platform were greeted enthusiastically, because they were preaching partnership with business—

Madam Speaker: Order. The Minister should withdraw the slur that he has just cast against another Member of Parliament.

Mr. Hain: I happily withdraw the remark, which was certainly meant not as an insult, but as an example of humour.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): Will the Minister take the opportunity of changes in the Welsh Office to look critically at the policy of refusing help and support to indigenous companies, either to start up or to expand, while giving seemingly endless grants to companies to come in from, say, Japan or Korea? Indigenous companies in south Wales provide a great number of jobs and they need the support of the Welsh Office and the Welsh Development Agency.

Mr. Hain: My hon. Friend makes a strong point about the need for indigenous businesses in Wales to receive proper support. It is important that we redress the balance between support for inward investors and support for home-grown businesses. That is precisely why we have given the WDA new targets to achieve exactly that.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the Minister accept that, for every one step forward taken after a lot of work by the WDA, the Welsh Office and others, we find ourselves taking two steps backward as a result of the overvalued pound undermining manufacturing industry and leading to the loss of countless hundreds of jobs in every part of Wales and every sector, including agriculture and tourism? Please will he get the message across to the Treasury that, while the pound remains at an unrealistically high level, it will be impossible for us to overcome the economic problems of our country?

Mr. Hain: The right hon. Gentleman speaks with passion about businesses in Wales and I realise that, at the level at which it has been, the pound has caused difficulties for business in Wales. However, the fact is that the pound is coming down: it is now below the level that we inherited from the Conservatives after the last election. The programme of stability set out yesterday by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will create conditions in future in which businesses can expand and export with greater vigour and success.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I warmly welcome the Secretary of State to his new position, leading his ministerial team, and I look forward to having a long and constructive dialogue with him over many months to come, without any distractions. Irrespective of where Downing street might wish to send him, I know that he will concentrate on the serious job in hand.

The Secretary of State will know that Barclays bank has just revealed new figures showing that start-ups in the last quarter are 13 per cent down on last year's figure. He will know that there will be no new start-ups in farming. He will know that unemployment in Wales is rising. He will know that exporters find it difficult to export because of the uncompetitive pound and high interest rates. Therefore, will he use his position at the Cabinet table to persuade his colleagues to reverse their policies, which are doing so much damage to businesses in Wales and to the people of Wales?

Mr. Hain: I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is grateful for the sincere congratulations on achieving his new position, if not for the rest of the question. The Government are presiding over a business climate in Wales that is based on more partnerships between Government and business than ever before. The hon. Member need only talk to small businesses and others throughout Wales to confirm that. The record of the previous Conservative Government—there was an average of 7,689 closures per year during that period—will not occur under the Labour Government, because we are determined to support small businesses.

Farmers (Bankruptcy)

3. Mr. Lembit Öpik (Montgomeryshire): What assistance he will offer farmers of smallholdings in Wales who are now technically bankrupt. [56578]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Jon Owen Jones): Smallholdings are a responsibility of local authorities, under the Agriculture Act 1970, to help new entrants to the industry. The Government provide support to small farmers for farm diversification and business management in addition to the main common agricultural policy schemes.

Mr. Öpik: I welcome the Minister to his new role. We have had pestilence, floods, storms and economic collapse, and it seems that the Book of Revelations is a better predictor of events than Welsh Office forecasts. Will the Minister at least consider providing a substantial package of support for smallholders who are facing bankruptcy to prevent what could be a massive exodus from the countryside as farmers abandon their trade and leave the land?

Mr. Jones: I recognise that the smallholders and farmers whom the hon. Gentleman represents in rural Wales are experiencing problems. I have met many farmers over the past few months and I have close relatives who have suffered gravely. The Welsh Office has invested £200 million in support for Welsh farming this year. Farmers in the uplands of Wales, who were particularly badly hit, have each received an extra £2,000 of support this year. We are concerned; we are trying to do what we can to support Welsh farming and we realise how important that industry is. Unfortunately, there are further difficulties ahead, but we hope to make progress.

Mr. Huw Edwards (Monmouth): Will my hon. Friend tell the House whether the calf processing aid scheme will be replaced when it expires on 30 November? Will he join me in welcoming the news this morning from the European Standing Veterinary Committee that it is recommending the lifting of the European beef ban? If that is done by Christmas, this Government will have lifted a ban that the previous Government caused to be imposed.

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend makes an important point about the beef ban. We should not be overly optimistic, although there are grounds for optimism with this morning's majority vote in the veterinary committee. However, the final decision must be made by Agriculture Ministers.

It is useful to note how the constructive dialogue that the Government have pursued in Europe has borne fruit as opposed to the previous Government's approach, which produced nothing but headlines and gave the farming industry no support whatsoever.

The Government believe that there is good reason for ending the calf processing aid scheme on 30 November, but Ministers are carefully considering representations from throughout the farming community about introducing another scheme in the near future.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Welsh agriculture faces its worst crisis for 50 years. I welcome the Minister to his post and press him for more specific answers about when he will stop playing fast and loose with the expectations of Welsh farmers and tell them whether the calf processing aid scheme will be extended, whether they will receive an increase in their hill livestock compensatory allowance and whether they will receive any help under agrimonetary determination or marketing schemes. Those are all questions that the Welsh National Farmers Union has asked and to which the Minister has so far replied with tea and sympathy. That will not do.

Mr. Jones: The brass neck of Conservative Members never fails to amaze me. They criticise the Government for our stewardship of agriculture in Wales and the rest of the United Kingdom, when their almost criminally complacent handling of the BSE problem turned it into a major crisis and gave this Government a legacy of agriculture problems that no other Government have inherited. The Government have the interests of British agriculture at heart and will secure improvements in the near future.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): I congratulate my hon. Friend on his new responsibilities and wish him well in his new job. I understand that his Department, with Ministers from England, Scotland and Northern Ireland, is involved in intensive discussions with the Treasury on a package to help agriculture. Will he give us an idea of what may be in that package and of the timing of any forthcoming announcements?

Mr. Jones: Many people in the farming industry in Wales have asked me that question. The Welsh Office has made strong representations to the Ministry of Agriculture. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture has listened carefully to those representations. I anticipate that we may hear from him in the near future, but I am afraid that I could not possibly comment on what he may say and when he may say it.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): I congratulate the new Minister on his position and wish him well. Will he acknowledge that smallholders and other farmers are suffering seriously as a result of the way in which supermarkets increasingly dominate the position for their own ends? Specifically, will he examine the way in which, in abattoirs, which are increasingly owned by supermarkets, animals are being graded, not according to objective criteria, but according to the specific needs of supermarkets on any one day? Is not that a total perversion of the whole purpose of grading as a method? Is not that also part of a very worrying agenda—a process in which Meat and Livestock Commission officials are involved—which requires strong and effective Government intervention?

Mr. Jones: The hon. Gentleman makes a serious allegation about the influence of supermarkets. There is a real problem where, perhaps, a small number of retailers have a powerful hold of the market, and that problem is exacerbated when most of the producers in the market are very small units. There may be a need for producers to exert their power in the market by co-operating to help secure good prices.

Social Services

4. Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): If he will make a statement about the funding of social services by local authorities in Wales. [56579]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Jon Owen Jones): In Wales, local authorities do not have budgets that are specifically ring-fenced for particular services and they can take their own decisions on where priorities lie at a local level and what funding can be afforded for social services within the overall sums available.

The Welsh Office has recently published a consultation paper, "Comprehensive Spending Review: Modern Public Services for Wales—Spending Plans 1999-2002", and is seeking views on spending allocations for next year and the baselines for the following two years. Spending decisions will be announced later this year, but, in the meantime, participation in the consultation is very much welcomed.

Mr. Lansley: I am grateful for that reply, but is the Minister aware that Powys county council has budgeted expenditure in this financial year of more than 5 per cent. less in cash terms for personal social services than in the year just past, and that, partly as a consequence, it has halved the budget from which the child protection register is to be funded? What action does the Minister propose to take, in discussion with Powys county council, to ensure that that authority has the resources necessary to ensure protection of children in its area?

Mr. Jones: Last year, local authorities in Wales participated in a process, in consultation with the Welsh Local Government Association, to agree on a formula to allocate resources between them. That formula was agreed by all the local authorities, including Powys, and it is the responsibility of local authorities in Wales to decide how they allocate their resources between their various departments.

Mr. Ted Rowlands (Merthyr Tydfil and Rhymney): My hon. Friend will be fully aware of the tragic consequences of the recent floods, which have left temporarily homeless almost 200 in the Merthyr and Rhymney valleys. Will he, therefore, consider not only what assistance and support the Government might be able to give to those families, but the possibility of appointing an inspector to inquire into why flood defences failed so badly on this occasion?

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point on behalf of his constituents, more of whom suffered in the floods than in any other constituency in Wales. Rainfall in Wales last week was greater than at any other time in the past 20 years. Fortunately, flooding was not as great a problem as it was almost 20 years ago, in 1979, because of the investment that has been made in flood protection. Nevertheless, I know that people in Merthyr suffered grievously. I shall note very carefully the points that my hon. Friend has made and bring them to the attention of my officials.

Welsh Assembly

5. Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): What estimate he has made of the costs of establishing the Assembly for Wales. [56580]

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Alun Michael): The financial memorandum to the Government of Wales Bill stated that the capital cost of establishing the Assembly was not expected to exceed £17 million and estimated the annual running costs of the Assembly at between £15 million and £20 million in addition to current Welsh Office running costs.

Mrs. Gorman: May I, too, say how nice it is to see a new face in the Cabinet? I hope that the Secretary of State's new appointment does not end up costing him his career in the House. Perhaps, in the budget, he might find some way of commemorating the person who was the driving force behind the concept of an Assembly. However, as only a quarter of the Welsh people supported the idea of an Assembly, and as the Government seem to be having difficulty in selecting a suitable person as their candidate for First Secretary—notwithstanding the qualities of the hon. Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan)—does the Secretary of State think that there is an opportunity to think again about spending all that money on an Assembly that, in dealing with the affairs of Wales, will have less power than a Bantustan?

Mr. Michael: It is very nice that Conservative Members are showing some interest in the Welsh Assembly. However, it is hardly appropriate for Conservative Members to be giving us advice on how to deal with matters in Wales when two of their number are fighting like cats in a sack for leadership of what will be an insignificant Conservative group in the Assembly. We intend to ensure that the Assembly works well for the people of Wales in delivering our promises to them—which have, over the years, led them to give us such massive support. Leadership of the Assembly will be a matter for the party with the greatest representation in Wales, not for the party that has no representation in Wales.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that there is now a general expectation in Wales that the National Assembly for Wales will improve democratic accountability, ensure better value for public money and help deliver a proper and effective regional economic policy? Does he agree that, if the Assembly fulfils those expectations, it will pay for itself several times over? Does he agree also that, if the National Assembly for Wales is successful in achieving those objectives, the people of Wales will owe a debt of gratitude to my right hon. Friend the Member for Caerphilly (Mr. Davies), the former Secretary of State for Wales, for his vision and determination in ensuring that the National Assembly becomes a reality?

Mr. Michael: Yes, indeed—my hon. Friend makes a very powerful point. I paid tribute to that work at the beginning of today's Question Time, and on a number of occasions in the past week. There has certainly been a gap in democratic accountability in Wales, which, over many years, many of us have fought to put right. I look forward to the Assembly being very effective in delivering better standards in public service, health, education and job creation for the people of Wales.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): May I be the last, but not the least sincere, to welcome the Secretary of State to his post? On the wider question of costs, what does he believe would be the cost to the standing of the First Secretary in the Welsh Assembly if he were thought to be a conscript and not a volunteer?

Mr. Michael: It is extremely important that the First Secretary should lead the Welsh Assembly with distinction and vigour. I promise the hon. Gentleman that the Labour party will provide that.

Dr. Fox: We might get an answer from the new Secretary of State if I put the question in a different way. Does the Secretary of State believe that there would be a conflict of interest for an individual serving both as Secretary of State for Wales responsible to the Cabinet and as First Secretary responsible to the Welsh Assembly? Is it possible to serve two masters?

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman obviously did not look carefully at the answers given when those issues were debated in the House before.

NHS Funding Levels

6. Mr. David Amess (Southend, West): If he will make a statement on the planned funding levels for NHS provision in Wales. [56582]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. Jon Owen Jones): Following the outcome of the Government's comprehensive spending review, we announced in July an indicative additional budget of more than £1 billion for health for the next three years. My right hon. Friend is consulting on spending plans for 1999-2002 and will announce his decisions later this year.

Mr. Amess: Will the Minister confirm that, according to the British Medical Association, the concentration of health resources on reducing Labour's record hospital waiting lists is producing clinical distortions, so that patients who need urgent operations must wait longer, while simple procedures are carried out in order to massage the figures?

Mr. Jones: I am pleased to announce that, in the next month in which figures will be published, we anticipate a drop of almost 2,000 in the number of in-patient day cases from August to September and a further drop at the end of October. I am not aware that that has been achieved at the expense of people who are waiting longer.

PRIME MINISTER

The Prime Minister was asked—

Engagements

Q1.[56606] Mr. Brian H. Donohoe (Cunninghame, South): If he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 4 November.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Donohoe: Although I welcome the commitment given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his statement yesterday to increased investment in key areas of our economy, may I put a specific question to my right hon. Friend? Can he give a specific date for the signing of the contract for the new air traffic control centre in Scotland?

The Prime Minister: I know of my hon. Friend's long-standing interest in this matter and the strength with which he has put it forward because of its importance to his constituency. I cannot give definite commitments as negotiations are continuing, but I understand that final plans are due to be submitted to the Government by the end of November and that, subject to agreeing and finalising the details, the aim is to start construction by mid-1999. That will be good news for Scotland, as much of the construction will be locally sourced.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): The Economist's survey of independent forecasts for next year puts Britain at the bottom of the growth league for the whole western world. Why does the Prime Minister think that that is so?

The Prime Minister: It is for precisely the same reasons that it puts us ahead for this year and in three years' time—that is, as a result of the economic cycle. All the forecasts put us ahead for this year and in the future. It is for the same reason that forecasts have been downgraded, for example, for the United States of America—people would not call that a weak economy. The single most important thing that we can do is hold firm to the course of economic stability; the worst thing that we could do is follow the Conservative policy of slashing public spending and reversing Bank of England independence.

Mr. Hague: Does the Prime Minister not think that the fact that those surveys put us at the bottom of the growth league for the whole western world has something to do with the 17 tax rises by the Chancellor, the failure to tackle welfare spending, the tax on savings and pensions, higher-than-necessary interest rates, and the extra £40 billion of business regulations and taxes loaded on to the businesses of this country? If the Prime Minister wants to repeat what he said about forecasts in three years' time, is he aware that, since the Chancellor announced his policies in the summer, independent forecasters have downgraded growth for this country more than for any other country in Europe and America? Is that meant to be a coincidence?

The Prime Minister: No. It simply is not right either. As a matter of fact, growth forecasts throughout the world have been downgraded. The International Monetary Fund has downgraded world growth. The European Union has downgraded growth forecasts for the EU. Every country is in the same position.

I could do no better than to quote the words of the director general of the CBI. He said:

"I don't think this downturn was essentially made in Downing Street. Certainly there is no danger at the moment to believe that we will have recession like in 1991. There are several features of our economic policy which are in a much sounder position than they were in 1990."

Mr. Hague: Why does the Prime Minister not listen to the west midlands chairman of the CBI, who said—[Interruption.] It is interesting how the Government like to laugh at business people in the front line of our economy and take the word of people who sit in offices instead. The chairman said:

"We are in for a hard and rocky time."

Why did the Prime Minister not look at the CBI survey that showed business confidence at the lowest for 18 years, or the Item Club that says that 0.5 million manufacturing jobs will go? In the mean time, the Chancellor says, "Do nothing. Worry about nothing. Publish fantasy forecasts." Has not the Chancellor failed to make the hard choices that would allow the full 1 per cent. cut in interest rates that this country needs?

Is the Prime Minister going to look at the actual figures for growth forecasts—maybe we will get him to read them—the survey of all independent forecasts, which shows this country's growth going down faster than any other country's? He can have a look at it after Question Time. Was not yesterday a massive missed opportunity to reverse the blunders of the past 18 months and to do something to save people's jobs and businesses?

The Prime Minister: The short answer to that is no, I do not agree with the right hon. Gentleman at all. As for his claim that we were laughing at the director general of the CBI in the west midlands, let me tell him that we were actually laughing at the right hon. Gentleman. The reason for that is very simple. Everyone knows, as indeed the Chancellor said yesterday, that there is no denial of short-term difficulty, and no diversion from long-term strength. Of course we are forecasting a slowdown in economic growth and that slowdown is being mirrored literally throughout the world. The question is: what is the best way to get us through this economic slowdown. We say that it is to hold firm to Bank of England independence, the £40 billion spending on health and education and the extra spending on infrastructure. We say that it is to keep in place the new deal and the working families tax credit. The shadow Chancellor yesterday pinned his colours firmly to the mast. The Conservatives are now in favour of scrapping Bank of England independence, cancelling the spending next year and cancelling the new deal and working families tax credit. If any of those things are wrong, let the Leader of the Opposition get up and say so now—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. We are carrying on.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Will my right hon. Friend consider announcing the Government's intention to join the economic and monetary union, without setting a date? Would that not help to underpin the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget? Would that not reduce interest rates, reduce the level of the pound, improve investment and lead to that rarest of economic phenomena—a free lunch?

The Prime Minister: I do not agree that there is a free lunch in this set of circumstances. We have made it clear what the policy is. It was set out by the Chancellor last year. It was repeated both by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and the Chancellor a few days ago.

That is the right policy for us: to make it clear that the economic circumstances are those of sustainable economic convergence and clear and unambiguous economic benefits. But we would be wise to steer between either saying that we will join irrespective of the economic conditions, or taking the position of the Conservative party, saying that we will never join and we will have a negative, destructive position towards Europe—[Interruption.] I am sorry if I have that Conservative party policy wrong as well, but it is difficult to keep up with it nowadays.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): The Prime Minister says that the Government's policy on the single currency is clear, but on Monday the Trade Secretary described when we would join the single currency and on Tuesday the Cabinet enforcer rushed round saying that we should wait and see if we join the single currency. Which is the Government's policy?

The Prime Minister: Both the Trade Secretary and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster outlined the position entirely correctly. To join, the circumstances must be right. Those circumstances are that there is sustainable economic convergence and the economic benefits are clear and unambiguous. The right hon. Gentleman's policy is to join irrespective of convergence and of whether the economic benefits are clear and unambiguous. He shakes his head. He has the chance to ask another question. If his view is that he would join only when the economic benefits are clear and unambiguous, he supports our policy.

Mr. Ashdown: The Prime Minister must answer for his policy. Let me remind him that one of his Cabinet Ministers has said "when" and another has said "if". They cannot both be right. When will the Government realise that this is the most important decision facing our country? The Government cannot abandon leadership in favour of a policy of nods and winks. For as long as they do, the Cabinet will remain confused, the country will remain without a lead and British industry will continue to suffer.

The Prime Minister: Let me repeat: to join, the circumstances must be right. We do not believe in joining irrespective of the economic circumstances. Those circumstances are that there must be sustainable economic convergence and the economic benefits must be clear and unambiguous. That is a plain and sensible policy. It steers between the extremes of the Liberal Democrats saying that they will join irrespective of the economic circumstances and the Conservatives saying that they will not join irrespective of the economic circumstances. In this case, I think that the third way is right.

Q2.[56607] Mr. Jim Murphy (Eastwood): My right hon. Friend is aware that, for years, many hard-working families have been stuck in a poverty trap. Those hard-working families will benefit from the working families tax credit, the disabled persons tax credit and the record increase in child benefit. Will he give a clear undertaking that his Government will continue the search for policies that reward hard-working families and in so doing will ignore the protests of the Conservatives, who, while in government, did so little for the families most in need?

The Prime Minister: We shall hold firm to the policies on the new deal and the working families tax credit. There could be nothing more crazy or disastrous in economic policy than to cancel both those items at the moment, because we would be withdrawing support in the new deal at the time of an economic slowdown and we would be preventing low-income families from getting the help and incentives that they need to get into work. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall resist Conservative calls to cancel the new deal and the working families tax credit. They make that case not on economic grounds, but for ideological reasons. The Conservative party is moving further and further to the right, but that is not where the British people are.

Q3.[56608] Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire): With an ailing president, a corrupt economy and an unpaid military, Russia is in dire need of generous international financial assistance. I believe that it is in all our interests to provide it. We fear that terrorists and rogue states may gain access to Russia's weapons of mass destruction—its nuclear, chemical and biological weapons—and use them or threaten to use them against us. Why does not the international community negotiate to purchase some of Russia's weapons of mass destruction, perhaps using the aid budget, and arrange for them to be destroyed under international supervision on Russian soil?

The Prime Minister: I agree with the general anxiety expressed by the hon. Gentleman, but I do not agree with his proposals. We have already shown strongly that we are ready to support Russian reform efforts. The International Monetary Fund has made it clear that it will do so, provided the economic reforms that we have asked for are put in place, otherwise there is a danger of simply putting good money after bad.

We and our partners are already assisting Russian disarmament. The United Kingdom has, for example, supplied specialised equipment for transporting nuclear warheads for destruction. We are leading international efforts to retrain redundant military officers for civilian life. We are encouraging Russia to ratify START 2 and move on with negotiations for START 3—the strategic arms reduction talks. There are many practical difficulties in buying up warheads; so, together with Russia and our other international partners, we are exploring ways in which to reduce the potential dangers posed by the stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction. That is a better way to proceed.

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich): Will my right hon. Friend assure me that no Labour Government would wait 18 years before listening to the people?

The Prime Minister: We listened to the people very successfully before the election, and we must carry on doing so.

Q4.[56609] Sir Paul Beresford (Mole Valley): Many extremely able business men in my area are deeply worried. They have many questions because they find the answers that the Prime Minister has given to date to be implausible. I should like to ask just one on their behalf. On one hand, the Prime Minister has downgraded his growth predictions—Treasury predictions are lower, and some of the others that we hear of are lower still—yet on the other hand, the Chancellor is saying that tax revenues for next year will remain the same. At the very least, there is a dichotomy. Will the Prime Minister clarify it?

The Prime Minister: The growth prediction for this year, on which revenues are based, has not been downgraded. It is the growth prediction for next year that has been downgraded. There is a perfectly simple answer to the hon. Gentleman's question. Most business men, including ones in his constituency, would prefer us to abandon any notion of policies that will lead to boom and bust, such as reversing Bank of England independence. Above all, they want to avoid the 7 per cent. drop in manufacturing output that we had under the Conservatives, and the boom-and-bust policies that gave us double-digit interest rates for four years—four years of interest rates of more than 10 per cent.—and interest rates of 15 per cent. for more than one year. That is the policy that we must avoid.

Mr. Michael J. Foster (Worcester): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government's approach to the single currency is good for business and good for Britain? Does he also agree with a constituent of mine, Mr. Neil Bucktin, who wrote:

"The Conservative Party no longer wishes to face the future . . . it is hardly surprising if businessmen turn their attention to Labour"?

Mr. Bucktin is chairman of Worcester Conservative Association.

The Prime Minister: I am in favour of as broad an alliance as possible, as my hon. Friend knows. I would add that, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor emphasised on Monday, it is important to make preparations so that British business is in the position to handle the advent of the euro, because it will be affected by it. When we came into office, we found no serious preparation had been made by the Conservative party when in government. The worst thing that we can do is stick our heads in the sand, ostrich-like, which is the Conservative party's position.

Q5.[56610] Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): The Prime Minister will be aware that, in another place this afternoon, there will be a vote on whether next year's European elections will operate under the completely undemocratic closed list system that he prefers, or under a preferable open list system, which gives voters some choice. Indeed, I hear talk that he and his colleagues are so worried about the result that Liberal Democrat peers are being invited to vote against their party's policy and in favour of the Government's. Why does the Prime Minister object so much to giving voters choice and the freedom to express individual views on whom they want to send to the European Parliament? Will he admit that, for him, when it comes to competition between open democracy and central control, democracy loses every time?

The Prime Minister: One of the great advantages of having the Home Secretary sitting near me is that he can inform me that the closed list system was pioneered by the previous Government in Northern Ireland.

Q6.[56611] Mr. David Borrow (South Ribble): Business leaders at the CBI conference in Birmingham this week expressed support for the Government's policy of preparing the economy for possible United Kingdom entry into the single European currency. They also expressed support for the Government's spending plans, and felt that they were sustainable and that cuts in public spending were not required. In view of the policies put forward by the Conservative party on both those issues, does my right hon. Friend agree that it will be many years before that party regains the confidence of UK business?

The Prime Minister: It is important that we hold to the plans for the £40 billion investment in our schools and hospitals precisely because it is the right investment for the future of the country, and because, in economic terms, this is the right time to make that investment. As for the social security spending, the vast bulk of the increase is accounted for by uprating pensions in line with prices, and by uprating child benefit; I assume that the Conservatives now oppose doing both. The shadow Secretary of State for Social Security has told us that he opposes the working families tax credit—

Mr. Iain Duncan Smith (Chingford and Woodford Green): Keep family credit.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman says that we should keep family credit. The opposition make policy as they go along—[Interruption.] Even if they are not listening to the people, at least they are listening to me. That is an advance, I feel.

Mr. Duncan Smith: We created family credit.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman says he is in favour of family credit, yet the vast bulk of the remainder of social security spending is the old family credit. He says that he opposes the new working families tax credit, which gives better help to low-income families. What a ridiculous economic policy to have.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): Last week, the Prime Minister said that, when the Jenkins report was published, he would be able to say whether he would meet his commitment to have a referendum in this Parliament. Now that the report has been published, is the answer yes or no?

The Prime Minister: The answer is as set out by the Home Secretary last week. As for the timing, it has always been envisaged that it would be before the next election. That remains an option, but obviously, in the light of the specific nature of the Jenkins recommendation, as the new system cannot be introduced until the election after next, that remains an option too.

Mr. Hague: What is wrong with yes or no? Let me remind the Prime Minister what he said last week, when I asked him whether he was still committed to a referendum in this Parliament. He said:

"We have made it clear that we will state our position when the Jenkins committee reports tomorrow."—[Official Report, 28 October 1998; Vol. 318, c. 329.]

Now he still does not have a position. Is that not because the Jenkins commission served up a dog's breakfast for the voters of this country? As the Prime Minister is fond of quoting the Home Secretary, I remind him that the Home Secretary said last week that the recommendations were much more complicated than the Government had expected. Does he agree with his Home Secretary about that?

The Prime Minister: What I actually said to the right hon. Gentleman was to wait and see what the specific recommendation was. It could have been for a system that could have been introduced at the next election, but as a matter of fact the report recommended a system that cannot be introduced until after the next election. That is why I have set out the policy. It is perfectly clear. If the right hon. Gentleman does not agree with it, that is up to him.

Mr. Hague: The Prime Minister wants the country to have a preferential voting system, but he cannot state a preference between yes and no. He has now avoided two simple questions, one of which was only whether he agreed with the comments that the Home Secretary made last week. He cannot say anything with any meaning on the subject because half his Cabinet and half his party disagree with the proposal. We can understand the attractions for him of a voting system that would get rid of a lot of them, but he has the Chancellor's economic policies to do that; he does not need the Jenkins commission. Why does he not now abandon the ludicrous nonsense of trying to gerrymander our voting system?

The Prime Minister: I notice that the right hon. Gentleman is rather happier talking about that than about the economy. The Tories' position is clear: they do not want a discussion, they do not want a debate, they do not want any change—but they are always against constitutional change. They were against devolution in Scotland and Wales; now they are in favour. They were against a freedom of information Act, and against reforming the House of Lords. I am more open minded. I prefer to let a debate happen.

Mr. Harry Barnes (North-East Derbyshire): Does the Prime Minister agree that decommissioning of weapons in Northern Ireland is not the same as surrender?

It occurred with terrorist groups in El Salvador and in the Lebanon in 1991. Should not there now be a timetable—the sooner, the better—so that we get rid of weapons in Northern Ireland?

The Prime Minister: I would like decommissioning to start immediately. That has been the position of the Government all the way through, and remains the position. I hope that we can find a way through the current impasse which ensures that everybody has the confidence of knowing that, when they are engaged in negotiations about the future in Northern Ireland and, in particular, when they are engaged in matters to do with the government of Northern Ireland, they can be sure that those with whom they are negotiating and discussing those issues have given up violence for good.

Q7.[56612] Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): Will the Prime Minister use his good offices and his friendship with the new German Chancellor, Gerhard—[Interruption.]

Madam Speaker: Order. Mr. Skinner, order.

Mr. Livsey: I knew that he was connected with banking—Gerhard Schröder.

Will the Prime Minister do everything that he can to lift the ban on British beef exports? Did he raise that subject with Mr. Schröder on Monday, when they met? Is he aware that the European Union Standing Veterinary Committee today voted in favour of the date-based scheme, but by an insufficient majority? Will he proceed to ban the beef war and, indeed, sign the armistice soon, before Christmas?

The Prime Minister: I am pleased that the hon. Gentleman is on first-name terms with the German Chancellor. I certainly raised BSE with him. There is not a single Prime Minister, Minister, head of state or Head of Government anywhere in the European Union who does not get the full lecture on BSE, every time that I see any of them. On the BSE position, we had a simple majority of states in favour of lifting the ban. That is important, because it means that, if we hold that majority when we come to the Council of Ministers meeting, the Commission proposal, which, obviously, we support, goes forward.

We hope to do even better than that, but there is a lot of hard negotiating to do. Today's simple majority in our favour, although not enough to achieve a conclusion today, is a big step forward. We have to do an awful lot now, in terms of the measures that my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is discussing with the farming industry and within the European Union, to help our farmers through the next few months.

Q8.[56613] Shona McIsaac (Cleethorpes): Will my right hon. Friend sort out a mathematical conundrum for me? I have a report from my local newspaper in which the Tories claim that waiting lists at Grimsby hospital have increased, yet the hospital has confirmed that the decrease is more than 1,300. Will he send his congratulations to the hospital on that marvellous achievement, and send the Tories to numeracy classes?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to do at least the first of those. Waiting lists are coming down, in my hon. Friend's area and in other areas, too. They were rising, year upon year, under the Conservatives. If we had proceeded with the Conservative plans to cancel the extra investment—the £40 billion in schools and hospitals—waiting lists would be even worse. There is only one party in whose hands the national health service is safe, and it is the labour party.

Q9.[56614] Mr. Andrew George (St. Ives): Does the Prime Minister agree that the multilateral agreement on investment, if resurrected by the World Trade Organisation, would be nothing more than a solution without a problem? Does he believe that his friend in France, Mr. Jospin, was right or wrong to withdraw French Government support from the MAI?

The Prime Minister: We have made it clear that we support achieving agreement. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman that the MAI is a solution without a problem. All these measures are part of trying to break down barriers to trade between countries. This country is a trading nation, and it is in our interest to have trade that is as free and open as possible. I would have thought that that was in the best traditions of the Liberal party.

Ms Linda Perham (Ilford, North): Will my right hon. Friend welcome the Wye Plantation agreement on the middle east and congratulate all the parties involved? As he knows, the problem with the Oslo accords has been getting the backing of the people for the agreement. Will he and our European Union partners do their best to assist the process and ensure that there is a lasting peace in the region?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to congratulate President Clinton and all those who were involved in negotiating the Wye memorandum. We will do all in our power to support the agreement. We will be discussing options for European Union action at the General Affairs Council on 9 November. Certainly, as far as the EU is concerned, we stand ready to play our part. The agreement was a tremendous achievement and it is important that the memorandum gets the support of as many countries as possible. I have already discussed it with Chairman Arafat and Prime Minister Netanyahu and I look forward to doing so again.

Q10.[56615] Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): If global factors were the reason for cutting the growth forecast for 1999, what global factors justify increasing the forecast for 2000?

The Prime Minister: Precisely because—if the hon. Gentleman had bothered to research his question more closely he would have known-all forecasts are for a slowdown next year and a pick-up in growth later. The reason is that, because of the global financial crisis, there is an effect in Asia and 25 per cent. of the world is in recession, but, in time, recovery will happen. Therefore, it is important to steer the course of stability that we have outlined, and not to engage in the panic-stricken policies of the Conservative party, which would reduce the possibility of lower long-term interest rates by scrapping the independence of the Bank of England and cancel the investment that we have made. At some point in time, it would be interesting to have a coherent economic policy from a coherent Opposition.

Speaker's Statement

3.31 pm

Madam Speaker: I have a short statement to make to the House. I see from the number of red poppies in evidence that it has not escaped the attention of hon. Members that next Wednesday the House will be in session at 11 am on 11 November. I regard it as appropriate for the House to join the nation in observing the two minutes' silence at that time to remember those who gave their lives for their country and to preserve our democratic freedom. I shall be in the Chair at that time and I invite hon. Members to join me on that occasion. I hope that similar arrangements will be made in Committees. Instructions will be issued to heads of department that members of staff who are working and who want to observe the silence will be enabled to do so.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Have you had any intimation that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry may make a statement on the implications of the millennium bug for vital services? A letter has come into the public domain today from the Secretary of State for Scotland to the Secretary of State for Defence. Apart from showing that the former seems to receive the mushroom treatment in the Cabinet—kept in the dark, with all the implications that flow from that—the letter expresses the right hon. Gentleman's fears that vital services such as electricity and telecommunications may be severely interrupted and that the Territorial Army will no longer have sufficient strength to respond to civic emergencies in some parts of the country.

That view is different from the view that the Government have expressed on the implications of the millennium bug. Is that now the Government's position—or is the Secretary of State for Scotland out on a limb again? At the very least, we should have an immediate statement from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to clarify the position.

Madam Speaker: I have not been informed that the Secretary of State wants to make a statement today. The hon. Gentleman can seek a statement either through the usual channels or perhaps in a question to the Leader of the House in business questions tomorrow.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. On Monday, in a question to the Leader of the House, I mentioned the number of questions that the Leader of the Opposition asks at Prime Minister's Question Time and the amount of time taken. Today, that amounted to six minutes in the first half and four minutes in the second—exactly one third of the time was therefore taken up by questions from the Leader of the Opposition. That cannot be right, as all hon. Members have equal status in the electorate's eyes. May I urge you, Madam Speaker, to use your good offices to arrange either for fewer questions to be asked or for someone to give instruction on how to ask short and pertinent questions?

Madam Speaker: The Leader of the Opposition is entitled to ask six questions at Prime Minister's Questions, but daily I plead with hon. Members to ask brisk questions and with Ministers to give brisk answers. I am afraid that, most of the time, my pleas fall on stony ground. However, I am pleased that some hon. Members are noticing the fact that we are not getting through the Order Paper at Question Time as quickly as we should, not only at Prime Minister's Questions but daily.

I place on record again my plea to all hon. Members—whether they are Front Benchers or Back Benchers—for brisk questions. Surely hon. Members can work out a question before they come into the Chamber, so that they know what they want to say instead of rambling on. I hope that Ministers, too, will take my admonitions to heart, as their answers tend to be far too long—quite unnecessarily so on many occasions.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): Further to that point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: Yes, Sir Peter—I hope that you are going to support me.

Sir Peter Tapsell: Indeed I am, Madam Speaker. I am going to go even further and suggest that the solution to the widely acknowledged problem of Prime Minister's Questions is that we should revert to the practice of having them on Tuesdays and Thursdays. Will you support the House by making representations to that effect to the Prime Minister?

Madam Speaker: I will certainly let the Prime Minister know of the hon. Gentleman's point of view.

Housing (Home Repossessions)

3.36 pm

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable and require the Housing Corporation to be joined in all possession proceedings by mortgagees against mortgagors in respect of the principal home of the mortgagor and his family.

The aim of the Bill is to reduce the social and welfare costs of repossessions by enabling people to keep their homes. It explores a way forward to find a more humane and, in the longer term, cheaper method of dealing with repossessions.

The Bill is timely, as the number of actions entered for repossession is rising once more and, given current economic trends, will continue to rise. Although no one expects the numbers to reach the levels of 1991 and 1992, each and every repossession is a human tragedy and a drain on the Exchequer. The Bill is also timely because of the Government's concerns about family breakdown.

Between 1969 and 1980, the number of repossessions a year was, on average, about 3,400. That number rose steadily to 26,390 in 1987 before falling to 15,810 in 1989. Between 1989 and 1991, there was an almost fivefold increase—to 75,000—in the number of repossessions. Since 1991, the number has decreased, although figures for the first half of 1998 show a small increase on those for the first half of 1997. Now, therefore, is the time to act.

People fall into mortgage arrears for a number of reasons, of which loss of income is by far the most common—it is cited in 70 per cent. of cases. A quarter of people in arrears mentioned as a factor household changes such as the loss of a partner, pregnancy or a new baby. A further quarter mentioned increases in mortgage or other regular repayments, although those reasons were rarely given in isolation.

There are added pressures on borrowers who fall into arrears. Government policy has run against the most vulnerable groups of householders. The previous Government cut the availability of income support for mortgage interest; new borrowers who lose their jobs now have to survive for the first nine months of unemployment without such help.

The change was intended to prompt a significant increase in the use of private insurance, which would replace the safety net of income support. Before the October 1995 changes, take-up of private insurance was between 12 and 16 per cent. The highest estimate of current take-up is 21 per cent., but according to the Chartered Institute of Housing that may be overstated.

The critical issue is whether those most at risk are likely to be insured. The evidence shows that they are not. About a third of borrowers would be eligible for income support if they lost all their income; of those, three quarters have no mortgage protection insurance, so at least a quarter of all borrowers have no protection and no means of paying for up to nine months if they lose their income.

A related issue is the effectiveness of private insurance. About 20 per cent. of claims are not met. That may be for legitimate reasons, but in some cases claims are rejected because of pre-existing conditions, which gives cause for concern about mis-selling. Home buyers are less secure than they were before the most recent recession.

Mortgage interest rate support has fallen further behind most people's actual repayments. The basket of interest rates used in the calculation for support includes only building societies and not the mutuals that have converted to banks, with their generally higher rates. Add in the delay between interest rate changes and the recalculation of income support, and one does not need a crystal ball to see that mortgagee arrears among welfare-dependent home owners will continue to rise.

The financial cost to those whose homes are repossessed is significant: there are legal expenses; interest payments on arrears; court fees and administration costs involved in fighting possession orders; and of course debt on the property, which the borrower will continue to owe.

The costs to the welfare budget include increased demand for social housing, through people applying directly to registered social landlords or going through the local authority homelessness route; increases in the housing benefit bill; the cost to local authorities of housing families in temporary accommodation; and the administrative costs of letting properties. It has been estimated that between 1990 and 1994 25 per cent. of households were initially rehoused in the social housing sector following repossession. Repossessions currently account for about 10,000 social housing units.

The personal cost should also be considered. Repossession leads to increased stress, which can lead to relationship breakdown and greater demand for health services. Children may have to change schools through having to move, and the emotional impact can lead to disruption in educational progress.

When courts make repossession orders, a social renting option is not considered, but for some people a conversion to rent, or even partial rent and shared ownership, could be the answer that allows them to stay in their home until financial circumstances improve. The Bill proposes that the court be allowed to consider the option of the lender's interest in the home being bought out by the Housing Corporation or another appropriate body, which would then rent the house back to the family or even grant a mortgage.

The Bill's requirements are not onerous. The court already has at its disposal the relevant evidence and an expert witness. District judges have a lot of experience in repossession matters. The Bill would allow the court to consider more options, and could result in a practical and humane resolution. It could hold out to families the hope that they could become home owners once again.

If we are to avoid a repetition of the misery experienced by thousands of households in the early 1990s, the time to act is now.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Adrian Sanders, Mr. A. J. Beith, Mr. Chris Pond, Mr. Steve Webb, Mr. Martin Bell, Jackie Ballard, Mr. Peter Luff, Mr. Nigel Jones, Mr. Stephen Twigg, Mr. Mike Hancock, Mr. Barry Gardiner and Mr. Paul Burstow.

HOUSING (HOME REPOSSESSIONS)

Mr. Adrian Sanders accordingly presented a Bill to enable and require the Housing Corporation to be joined in all possession proceedings by mortgagees against mortgagors in respect of the principal home of the mortgagor and his family: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 254].

Opposition Day

[20TH ALLOTTED DAY]

The Economy

Madam Speaker: I have selected the amendment standing in the name of the Prime Minister.

3.44 pm

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): I beg to move,

That this House notes that there is now a black hole in the public finances; that the increased burdens on business since the General Election now account for £1,500 more per employee; that the UK will be the first major European economy to suffer a serious downturn and the worst affected; further notes that the Government is squandering the last Government's golden economic legacy by its four basic blunders of increased taxes, attacks on savings, particularly pensions, excessive regulation of business and irresponsible public spending; and deplores the Government's complacent attitude to the handling of the economy and public finances.

The highest responsibility of the British Chancellor of the Exchequer is to tell the truth about the British economy and to set out for Parliament and the people the real prospects, the real problems and some real answers. Yesterday, the Chancellor casually abandoned that responsibility. He thought he could carry on for ever spinning a web of words that would protect him from reality. Yesterday, he had a duty to tell the truth, but we got a fairy tale.

The responses of economists and commentators to the Chancellor's forecasts have spanned a wide range, from scepticism to outright disbelief. What has caused most disbelief is that he not only downgraded his forecast for next year by much less than the consensus, but he—almost alone—has upgraded his forecast for future years. What has happened between June, when he made his last forecast, and now to encourage him to upgrade his forecast for future years? The clear answer is that he was becoming aware that, with growth on a downward path, a black hole was appearing in the Government's public finances.

The analyses that have been done by outside commentators, by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, by Goldman Sachs and by many others show that the Chancellor is seriously at risk of failing to meet his supposed golden rule. The growth forecasts were crucial to his analysis and it was crucial for his credibility with Labour Members that he produced figures that showed that a black hole did not threaten the economy. So what did he do? He performed a classic bit of results-driven analysis. Instead of the usual process of rubbish in, rubbish out, Ministers got the rubbish out first and decided separately how to put the rubbish in.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I shall continue to outline my argument for a little while longer, if the hon. Gentleman will allow me. That process is why we have had that incredible upgrade of future forecasts and why the responses range from scepticism to disbelief. Bronwyn Curtis of Nomura says:

"Clearly his growth forecasts are much more optimistic than the market's . . . forward looking surveys suggest output has fallen off a cliff."

The National Association of Pension Funds says:

"The growth forecasts are a hostage to fortune".

Paribas says:

"Our central forecast is for 0.9 per cent. growth and we think all the risks"— not the balance of risks, but all the risks—

"are on the downside. The chancellor's central forecast is for 1.25 per cent. growth. I hope he is right, but I believe he is wrong."

HSBC says:

"There's not a case for growth turning round in the following years."

However, that is the central assertion the Chancellor makes and on which he bases his optimistic outlook. Anthony Hilton, the city editor of the Evening Standard writes today:

"What is going to happen to put the British economy back on to its sustainable growth path? Why should it bounce back so soon and so conveniently when the rest of the world economy may be going to hell in a handcart . . . it was 'Crisis? What crisis?' all over again."

Philip Stephens writes, in that well known Labour-supporting newspaper the Financial Times:

"We shall know soon enough whether Mr Brown's gamble on optimism pays off. I hope so, but I fear not. The danger is he will become trapped in his own rhetoric."

Mr. Barry Jones: When I first came to the House, the right hon. Gentleman's father was a Conservative Front-Bench spokesman who displayed great courtesy and was always unflappable. He demonstrated his mordant wit both in the Chamber and at his party conference. The son is not as good as his father.

Will the right hon. Gentleman tell my right hon. Friend the Chancellor to his face that he welcomes the £250 million for our national health service?

Mr. Maude: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman spoilt what I took to be an affectionate tribute to my late father, which I appreciated.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether I supported the extra money for the health service. Contrary to what the Chancellor has repeatedly asserted—I heard him do so again on the radio this morning although he knows that it is not true—and contrary to what the Prime Minister said at Question Time, we have welcomed the increases in spending for health and education. We did so at the outset, and we have done so again. Let there be no doubt about it: that is what we say, and we shall say it again. The Chancellor can carry on, but Adlai Stevenson's old phrase applies: if he stops telling lies about us, we will stop telling the truth about him.

Mr. Derek Twigg (Halton): The Opposition's motion refers to "irresponsible public spending". What would the right hon. Gentleman cut from the £40 billion allocated to schools and hospitals?

Mr. Maude: I suggest that the hon. Gentleman re-read his election manifesto, and the words of his Prime Minister. I can well understand that many other people do not believe what the Prime Minister says, but I should have thought that the hon. Gentleman would believe it.

The Prime Minister said that Labour would increase spending on health and education by cutting social security bills. The Treasury engaged in a fierce argument over social security spending for a year with the then Secretary of State who, against all the odds, defeated it, a feat for which she was dismissed.

Mr. Twigg: Answer.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman has his answer.

The Chancellor has made a reckless three-year commitment on money that our economy has not earned. Problems are coming down the track as a result.

Mr. Twigg: Answer me.

Mr. Maude: I shall give the hon. Gentleman a specific answer. We do not believe that family credit—a good system that has worked well—should be abolished to be replaced by a system that will, for example, entitle some families who are higher rate taxpayers earning up to £39,000 a year to receive tax credits and welfare benefits. If the hon. Gentleman wants to say that a system that takes money from people at 40 per cent. on the one hand and gives them a welfare benefit with the other is a good use of taxpayers' money, let him stand up and do so.

Mr. Twigg: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way again. Will he say specifically what he would cut from the £40 billion allocated to schools and hospitals?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman should simply read his election manifesto. I assume that he stood on the same manifesto as his colleagues. It contained a clear commitment, which the Labour party has broken.

I was encouraging the Chancellor by referring him to some of the comments that have been made about yesterday's statement. No one believes that his downgrade of the economic forecasts to a mid-point of 1.25 per cent. is at all credible. The poll of forecasts in The Economist—a serious piece of work, regularly done among independent forecasters in the UK and other countries—finds a mid-point of 0.8 per cent. The most recent Treasury consensus of outside forecasters shows a mid-point of 0.9 per cent. How the Chancellor can justify making a forecast for the economy that is above all of those no one in the outside world can understand or believe—and I hope that the next intervention will be a little more sensible.

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that that same independent group of forecasters was forecasting a growth rate of 1.4 per cent. when, in fact, the revised projection for 1998–99 is 2.25 per cent?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman should look at what the forecast says. The consensus group suggests that the most recent forecasts—those made during October, which is the most up to date—come out at a mid-point of 0.9 per cent. How does the Chancellor reconcile that with his mid-point forecast of 1.25 per cent? It just does not add up, and he knows it.

The reality is that the Chancellor has made these numbers up to justify his public spending figures. There is one league that the Chancellor has come out top of. He has come out top of the fantasy forecast league.

To sum up the response, there is none better than Bridget Rosewell, the director of Business Strategies, who said:

"A combination of nice words signifying little, with an attack on business . . . set against forecasts nobody believes."

What coloured the Chancellor's statement and all his pronouncements, and those of his team since, has been arrogant complacency. He thinks that it is all right just to use the language. It was interesting to run a word count on yesterday's statement. Poor old "prudence" is down to only 10 mentions now. She is on the way out—bit out of favour now, as if we did not know. She has been replaced by the Chancellor's new best friend "stability". She rated 14 mentions in the course of his speech. The clear winner of the word count race was "long term", with a record 18 mentions. Well, that is pretty rich from a Chancellor whose idea of the long term is what is in next week's headlines.

Mr. Ian Stewart (Eccles): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: In a moment. I shall just point out something else that will interest the hon. Gentleman.

We searched and searched for one word that I thought must feature in the Chancellor's statement. It is high in the minds of countless people up and down the land. He knows the word pretty well; he used to use it a great deal. That word is "unemployment". That is what he left out. There was not a single mention of unemployment, not a single mention of job losses, not a single mention of redundancies; and even more shamefully, not a single measure to prevent unemployment.

Yvette Cooper (Pontefract and Castleford): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: In a moment, once I have given way to the hon. Member for Eccles (Mr. Stewart). What a slap in the face for people facing day by day, thanks to the Chancellor's policies, the prospect of losing their job and their livelihood! They will have been disgusted by his complacency.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Does the right hon. Gentleman believe that it is a useful use of a shadow Chancellor's time to count words—and then only three?

Mr. Maude: I will let the hon. Gentleman into a carefully guarded secret. One can do a word count on a computer very easily now. The Chancellor spent half his time yesterday prating on about information technology, about which he seems to know a little. At least he has heard of it. The hon. Gentleman does not seem to have heard of it.

Yvette Cooper: If the right hon. Gentleman cares so much about unemployment, why does he want to cut the new deal and the working families tax credit, which make work pay for working families?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Lady has learnt the soundbites very well. I commend her. She is very new Labour—learn the soundbite and forget about the substance. The reason is that the new deal pilots have not worked. That is why we think that it is a waste of public money and a fraud perpetrated upon a great many people.

Ms Margaret Moran (Luton, South): Will the right hon. Gentleman get his abacus out and, instead of counting words, count the 300,000 people who by next year will have been assisted by the new deal? That is about employment, not unemployment, on which the Conservative Government had such a poor record.

Mr. Maude: If the hon. Lady thinks it matters so much, when she goes back to her constituency this weekend and people talk to her about job losses and the threat of redundancy and say, "Hang on, I didn't hear the Chancellor say much about that in his statement on Wednesday," what is she going to tell them? Is she going to say, "It's all right—he just doesn't care about it"? She is going to have to defend the Chancellor, whose policies are creating unemployment and job losses every day of the week. He did not think it mattered; he did not bother to mention it.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): First, will the right hon. Gentleman recognise that welfare to work and the new deal are tackling unemployment? Secondly, will he recognise that there has been a 30 per cent. fall in unemployment in his own constituency over the past 18 months? Will he now give us straight answers to the following questions? Is he saying that the Conservative party is going to go into the next election to scrap the new deal? Will he confirm that he will go into the election to scrap Bank of England independence? It is about time we had some answers.

Mr. Maude: The right hon. Gentleman comes here crawling for advice on how to get out of the mess he got himself into. If he is so interested in Bank of England independence, why does he not ask the Chief Secretary to the Treasury whether he believes in it? Why does he not stop the Chief Secretary making gaffe after gaffe, when he stands at the Dispatch Box or goes on the radio telling the Bank of England that it should cut interest rates? If he cares so much about Bank of England independence why does he not do what the Bundesbank or the American Fed do—have people appointed for eight years or 14 years? He knows that members of the Monetary Policy Committee were appointed for three years by him and that their appointments will come up for renewal before the next election. Is that independence?

Mr. Brown: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the questions? Will he scrap the new deal and will he scrap Bank of England independence? The Leader of the Opposition did not answer those questions, so will the shadow Chancellor have the courage to tell us?

Mr. Maude: What I shall tell the right hon. Gentleman about Bank of England independence is that he has made a botched job of it. He has bungled it. He does not believe that it works and nor does the Chief Secretary, which is why his adviser spent his time in Washington briefing, behind his hand, against the Bank of England; and why the Chief Secretary goes on television and stands in this Chamber putting pressure on the Bank to change its policy and cut interest rates. They do not believe in Bank of England independence, that is for sure.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the chairman of Marks and Spencer does not agree with the Chancellor either? He has announced that the company will have to transfer much of its manufacturing to other countries because the current Government have imposed so many regulations and extra costs on the company that it can no longer afford to buy British. Is my right hon. Friend also aware that the chairman of Marks and Spencer yesterday reported a fall of a quarter in the company's profitability and said that we were in for a rocky ride? Perhaps my right hon. Friend would like to give his opinion on whether the Chancellor or the chairman of Marks and Spencer is better at predicting the future.

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend makes the point that, week by week, many companies for which Britain used to be the best location for manufacturing and doing business are deciding that they do not want to do business in Labour's Britain. That is sad, because it means that the businesses on which people's jobs depend are failing.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No. I want to make some progress and I have already given way many times.

The Government's arrogant complacency continues. As late as this morning, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry said that business was "upbeat". He said that on the same day as the latest survey by the Chartered Institute of Purchasing and Supply showed the slowdown spreading from manufacturing to the service sector. The CIPS director general said that "growth in the service sector continues to decline as the level of new business has fallen. Both business and consumer confidence are deteriorating."

That is not the only such survey—the Institute of Directors survey tells a similar story.

Labour Members might not like it and they might prefer to rest on the warm words that flow endlessly from the Chancellor, but that is the real world in which people have to live, work and do business. It would be helpful if they recognised that.

Mr. Michael Wills (North Swindon): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No, I want to make progress, and this is a short debate.

The Institute of Directors survey revealed a fall in company optimism over the past quarter. Not a week goes by without another survey showing a downturn. The CBI industrial trends survey demonstrates that confidence is at its lowest level for 18 years. So whom has the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry been talking to? All that evidence matters because one cannot solve problems unless one recognises them, but it is different for the Chancellor and the Trade Secretary—they live in a problem-free world where any talk of problems is just idiotic hysteria. Why does the Chancellor not talk to people who are doing business in difficult circumstances and find out whether they think that such talk is idiotic hysteria?

The Chancellor had the chance to put matters right but he has blown it. He is now simply playing the blame game, as the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said yesterday. The Chancellor should not blame the world. Why, in the midst of all the problems around the world, is Britain doing worst? Why, in the economic downturn, is Britain in worst and in first? The Economist survey shows that Japan is the only industrialised country forecast to be weaker than Britain next year, and Japan is mired in a deep slump. The next weakest country after Britain is forecast to have twice Britain's rate of economic growth next year. If the downturn is due to global problems, why is Britain worst and first? That may have something to do with the Chancellor and his arrogant refusal to accept that there is a problem.

Ms Stuart: The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of arrogant refusal. What is his position on the Bank of England's independence? Would the Tories reverse that policy?

Mr. Maude: I realise that as the Chancellor has made such a mess of that, the hon. Lady is anxious for guidance on how to sort it out. The one absolute certainty is that the policy cannot be left as it is. It was a botched job; it breached an election commitment; it is not working; and it must be sorted out. We shall make our proposals in due course.

Mr. Tim Collins (Westmorland and Lonsdale): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is a little rich for a party that refused to tell the public its policy on the Bank of England three days before the previous general election to expect us to clarify our policy three years before the next election?

Mr. Maude: My hon. Friend makes the point well. We see the Chancellor smiling nervously because he knows that what he said before the election was sharply at odds with what he did. That is why the policy was botched and he got it wrong, and it cannot be left as it is.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No, I want to make progress.

I return to why Britain is in first and worst. The Chancellor said blithely yesterday that every country has downgraded its forecasts because of world events. If one compares The Economist poll with what was forecast in June when the Chancellor published his fiscal and economic strategy, one finds that there have been downgrades—not universally, but in almost all industrialised countries—but no country in Europe has been downgraded as much as Britain. Not only is The Economist proposing a worse growth forecast for Britain next year than for anywhere else in Europe, but it has downgraded its forecast for Britain by more than for anywhere else.

Japan is the only industrialised country in the world that will have less growth than Britain—we know about Japan's problems—and the only other comparable country is Australia, which also has a downgrade of 1 per cent. However, even that is a downgrade from 3.2 to 2.2 per cent., so the proportional downgrade is very much less than Britain's. There is a problem, and it is a problem for Britain, which will be first into the downturn and, as I said, will have the worst growth of any country except Japan.

Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): You have said that three times before.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman should listen. Things have to be said three times if Labour Members are to understand. They are living in their own little fantasy world, with fantasy figures, adrift from the real world where there are problems that need to be solved.

Mr. Edward Davey: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: The hon. Gentleman made such a silly point earlier that I shall not give way to him.

We have said this before and we shall say it again: the Chancellor took over a golden economic legacy. There were the best prospects for a generation.

Yvette Cooper: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: I have given way to the hon. Lady once; I shall make progress now.

The economy was showing growth faster than that of any other major European country. It had low inflation—the longest period of consistently low inflation seen in Britain for nearly 50 years—and we hit our inflation target. There is nothing very special about all the stuff that the Chancellor was saying yesterday about having brought inflation down; he has simply managed to get inflation back to where it was when he inherited it.

We had low unemployment—unemployment had been falling steadily. The Chancellor now takes credit for its continuing to fall for the first year and a bit after he took over. It is very nice of him to take the credit for it, but I honestly do not think that it was his doing. That was part of the economic legacy, and it has taken some time for the malign effects of his change of policies to come through—sadly for those people who, week by week, are losing their jobs.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham) rose—

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Mid-Bedfordshire) rose—

Mr. Bercow: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Maude: If my hon. Friend will forgive me, I shall not give way. I shall make progress now.

We also saw record inward investment. What is happening today is very different. Business failures are up already. The Dun and Bradstreet survey shows that, after five years of falling business failures, the figures are rising. Jobs are being lost and factories closed; it is happening all the time. I have a very long list of job losses and factory closures. Many of them are extremely familiar to the Chancellor; many of them are taking place in constituencies represented by Labour Members.

Labour Members know the truth. The Chancellor could not see it yesterday but, when he announced his growth forecast for next year of 1 to 1.5 per cent., we saw the looks of blank disbelief on the faces behind him. Labour Back Benchers did not believe him any more than did the commentators outside.

That is the reality—job losses, factory closures. What should the Chancellor be doing about it? Why did he commit the country to three years' public spending way above any conceivable growth in the economy? He is behaving exactly like the hedge funds that he was so keen to criticise earlier in the week—making long-term commitments against short-term revenues. He is being as irresponsible and reckless as they were.

As a result of that recklessness, Britain will bear the burden of higher borrowing—and, therefore, of higher interest rates than would otherwise have been needed.

Yvette Cooper: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Maude: No; I shall not give way.

Why did the Chancellor attack savings as he did? I am sorry not to see the Paymaster General in his usual place; or perhaps he is in his usual place. How crass it was to let the Paymaster General loose on the savings culture that had been so carefully built up over the years, with his bungled plan to scrap PEPs. In March, the Red Book showed the savings ratio falling gradually over the Parliament, but already, such a short time later, the savings ratio is down by a quarter—at just the stage in the cycle when people should have been encouraged to save more, not less. The effect has been to push money into consumption, and to push interest rates higher than they need have been. Well done, Paymaster General: another outstanding contribution to British business.

Why did the Chancellor chase up business costs as he has? He knows, because his figures and the Red Book show it, that his business taxes and the Government's extra regulatory burdens will cost British business £40 billion a year. That is the cost of Labour: £1,500 for every person employed in this country.

Yvette Cooper: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No, I shall continue; I am drawing to an end.

The Chancellor talked a great deal yesterday about productivity. Apparently, low productivity is now entirely the fault of British workers and British managers—it is all their fault. The Chancellor, the Trade Secretary and the Prime Minister wander round the countryside lecturing British business men and workers on how they must work harder and do better, and on how low productivity is all their fault and nothing to do with the Government. However, the Chancellor should listen to some comments made by business people who have invested in Britain in recent years.

In October 1995, three years ago, the president of Philips said:

"The most competitive country in Europe today is the UK.

It has a great sense of realism, a great sense of competitive spirit—the factories we have in the UK are the most changed factories in the world.

For manufacturing, Britain is the most competitive country in Europe today."

What has changed? Has the work force changed? Has the management changed? Has the country changed? No, only one thing has changed—the Government.

In October 1995, BMW—which owns Rover, and was memorably told last week by the Trade Secretary to sharpen up its act—stated:

"Great Britain is currently the most attractive country among all European locations for producing cars.

This results from the structural reforms initiated by Margaret Thatcher in the early 1980s".

What has changed? Why is BMW now closing plants, laying people off and reducing capacity? What has changed since 1995?

The Prime Minister may remember that Siemens opened a plant in his constituency. In August 1996, Siemens stated:

"Our decision to build the new semiconductor plant here in the UK is a recognition of the pro-business environment which exists and the skills and commitment of the British workforce"—

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Maude: I shall not give way.

The chief executive of Siemens went on:

"But let me make one point clear here, and that is that we have not invested here because we see the UK as a low-wage economy. On the contrary."

The Government have concerns about productivity? Those great multinational companies chose to come to Britain because Britain was a good place to do business. Why are those companies now closing their plants and laying people off? What has changed, besides the Government? Nothing.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Byers): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maude: No, I shall not give way; I am finishing my speech.

It was 10 Downing Street, not the Opposition that ascribed psychological flaws to the Chancellor. Although I would not go along with that ascription—I would go along with economically flawed, for sure—I encourage the Chancellor to keep open somewhere in the dark recesses of his mind a tiny place where he acknowledges even the merest possibility that he may be wrong. He knows that the price of his mistakes will be measured in lost jobs and business failures. If that happens because of his arrogant complacency, he will never be forgiven.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"notes that the Government inherited an economy set to repeat the same cycle of boom and bust seen over the past 20 years, that inflation was heading way above target because of the previous Government's failure to accept the Bank of England's advice and the public finances were in large structural deficit; recalls that under the previous Government inflation rose to 10 per cent, interest rates remained in double figures for four years and one million manufacturing jobs were lost, while net borrowing increased to £50 billion and the national debt doubled in just four years; notes that the previous Government's policies increased inequality and failed to tackle the structural weaknesses in the economy; commends this Government for its decisive action to build a stable economy, introducing a new framework for monetary policy under which inflation is now at target and set to remain there and interest rates are less than half their previous peak, reducing government borrowing by £20 billion last year and, because of prudent management of the public finances, remaining on track to meet its tough fiscal rules and invest an additional £40 billion in education and health, with an extra £250 million for the National Health Service this year, addressing structural weaknesses by tackling unemployment and poverty with the New Deals and tax and benefit reform, supporting British business by cutting corporation tax, doubling public investment to improve Britain's infrastructure and addressing Britain's productivity gap; and notes that there are now 400,000 more people in employment than at the General Election and that Britain is better placed to steer a course of stability in an uncertain and unstable world.".

I am grateful to the Opposition for today's debate, which gives us an opportunity to explain why independence of the Bank of England is the right policy for Britain; why international financial reform is necessary to deal with the world situation; why the welfare-to-work programme introduced by the Government and the working families tax credit—which Conservative Members would abolish—are the right policies for Britain; why there is a productivity gap that even the previous Government recognised had to be dealt with, even if the shadow Chancellor will not admit it; and why good, efficient public services, in which we will invest £40 billion over the next three years, are right, and the best thing for Britain's future.

I do not think that the House or the country will take lectures from the former Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who glossed over the fact that, between 1990 and 1992, when he was Financial Secretary, interest rates were without exception above 10 per cent. During that time, interest rates went up to 15 per cent., the public sector deficit was rising to £50 billion, unemployment was rising by a million, manufacturing output was falling by 7 per cent., manufacturing investment was falling by 15 per cent. and inflation rose to nearly 10 per cent. That is why the country will take no lessons from the Conservative party on how to run the economy.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Does not the Chancellor accept that the real reason for the catalogue that he has just set out is that we mistakenly stayed in the exchange rate mechanism for far too long? Furthermore, are not the policies that he is pursuing, including the granting of independence to the Bank of England, in pursuit of a policy that means that we will no longer have control over our economy? Both he and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry clearly committed themselves to that policy at the recent CBI conference. Does he accept that, by throwing away our ability to control our own affairs, he will condemn this country and those who work in it to massive continuing unemployment?

Mr. Brown: I know that the hon. Gentleman seeks every opportunity to bring the European debate to the Floor of the House, and I was grateful for his support during the general election campaign by raising those issues, but the mistakes made in the late 1980s were to allow inflation to get out of control, to allow wages to rise uncontrollably—to 11 per cent. in 1990—and to have interest rates at over 10 per cent. for four years.

The hon. Gentleman asks about the Bank of England and monetary policy. By making the Bank of England independent, we have set in place a long-term monetary framework for this country. It is the first building block of an economic strategy for the future. The shadow Chancellor says that that must all be changed. In other words, his policy is to scrap independence of the Bank of England—

Mr. Maude indicated dissent.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Is that his policy or not?

Mr. Maude: As the Chancellor has made such a mess of it, it cannot be left as it is. If he could not tell the country what his policy was three days before the election, we shall not outline our final policy three years in advance. However, one thing that is for certain is that, because he has botched and bungled independence of the Bank of England, it cannot be left as it is. Most people agree with that.

Mr. Brown: The Opposition say that they have the answers to the problems of the economy, but they cannot answer the first fundamental question about monetary policy. I take it that the right hon. Gentleman would not leave the Bank of England in control of interest rates. He says that it must be changed. He is at odds not only with the rest of the country and the Labour party, but with many sensible Conservative Members, who know that it is the right course of action for the country.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe) rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall give way to someone who supports a central bank, even if it is an independent central bank in Europe.

Mr. Clarke: I did not seek to intervene on that point. However, I happen to believe in the liberty of Back Benchers to be attracted by the independence of the Bank of England. I know of no independent central bank whose membership comprises full-time officials of the Bank of England plus academic economists who are friends of the Chancellor and his advisers, nor a central bank that has made such mistakes as unnecessarily to raise our interest rates to the highest level in the developed world to avoid an inflationary boom that was never a danger.

In reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash), the Chancellor talked as though he took over the economy in 1988 rather than 1997. He draws comparisons with the boom and bust of the late 1980s, not with what he actually inherited. The last peak in interest rates was, if my memory serves me right, at 6.5 per cent., when we achieved a soft landing in 1996. We then resumed steady growth and falling unemployment, for which the right hon. Gentleman has just taken credit. We hit an inflation target of 2.5 per cent., which he and his botched-up independent bank have wrecked.

Mr. Brown: That was an amazing intervention by the former Chancellor. He wants to forget the 1980s and the fact that he was Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and for Employment, and held many other Government offices, just as the shadow Chancellor wants to forget that he was Financial Secretary to the Treasury between 1990 and 1992. They cannot escape their record: interest rates at 15 per cent., and they were above 10 per cent. for four years. The answer to that is to have a credible long-term framework for monetary policy. I am glad that he now agrees that there is an attraction in the independence of the Bank of England.

Perhaps now Conservative Members can resolve this problem among themselves. The former Chancellor supports the idea of independence; the shadow Chancellor opposes it. Perhaps they should have a referendum of their party members to resolve the problem.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): As the right hon. Gentleman knows, I have made several speeches in the previous Parliament and in the present one explaining why I wholly oppose an independent central bank, but I speak for myself. Assuming that the Bank remains independent, may I put this important point to him—a technical point that he should consider?

It will not have escaped the right hon. Gentleman's attention that the new Finance Minister of Germany, Mr. Lafontaine—presumably he has a good deal of political sympathy with him—has been telling the European central bank that he is extremely unhappy that it is limited by the Maastricht treaty to having purely an inflation target. As he has made clear publicly, he wants those criteria changed to include growth and employment.

If we had to go on with an independent central bank, which I hope we will not, can we not move at least to change its criteria, so that it has to take account of growth and employment, and becomes much more like the Federal Reserve bank in the United States, which does not operate with such narrow criteria and instructions?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for entering the debate about the independence of the Bank of England. The Conservative party now seems to be as divided on that as it is on Europe. The former Chancellor is attracted to it, the shadow Chancellor is clearly against it, and now a Back Bencher says that he has to speak in a personal capacity because he does not know what the policy is.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire) rose—

Mr. Kenneth Clarke rose—

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Brown: I must take the intervention of the hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer). Perhaps he can tell us what the policy is on the independence of the Bank of England.

Sir Michael Spicer: I was wondering what the Chancellor's policy was. He has made a virtue of the independence of the Bank of England, yet it seems that he is one of those who have been outed as hellbent on handing over its powers to the central bank of Europe and on abolishing all its independence. How does he square those two things?

Mr. Brown: We have set the five economic tests for membership of the single currency. On the future of the Bank of England, the reason why I support independence and believe that the Conservative party, on reflection, will believe that it is against the national interest to scrap the independence of the Bank, is because, for 30 or 40 years, this country has lacked the long-term monetary framework that is necessary for stability—long-term objectives that are set down clearly, free of party politics and short-term pressures, rules that the Bank and the system have to follow, and transparency in the reporting of decisions.

One reason why long-term interest rates fell from 7 per cent. and why the differential with Germany, which has been a low-inflation country, has narrowed on long-term interest rates is precisely because we made the Bank of England independent.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon) rose—

Mr. Brown: Of course the Liberal Democrat party supports us in that, although not in everything else. I do not believe that any sensible political party will veer from that position.

Mr. Bruce: Will the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge the curious position of the Conservative party on this issue? The only major country in the G7—indeed, in the western world—that still does not have an independent central bank is Japan, which the shadow Chancellor has been pointing out is locked in a serious slump, and is hardly an ideal role model for having a bank that is under political control.

Nevertheless, will the Chancellor acknowledge that the shortness of the appointments to membership of the Monetary Policy Committee has been a genuine issue? Will he accept that it would be much preferable if those appointments were extended beyond the life of a Parliament, so that independence would not only be granted, but go beyond the life of any single Government?

Mr. Brown: I am happy to enter a debate about the future arrangements for the Bank of England. I believe that the arrangements that we have set down, with a five-year appointment for the Governor and up to four years for membership of the Monetary Policy Committee, are right. We are hearing sensible questions about the way forward from the Liberals. We have not heard what the Conservatives would do. Would they scrap the independence of the Bank of England? If they cannot answer that question soon, nothing in their economic policy has any credibility. The shadow Chancellor—

Mr. Maude rose—

Mr. Brown: Ah, the shadow Chancellor is going to answer the question now. I am very grateful to him.

Mr. Maude: I am getting fed up with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who would not even answer the question on polling day, yet is pressing for an answer from us three years before the election. There was nothing about the issue in Labour's manifesto, and nothing was said to the electorate before the election, yet he criticises us three years before the election for not producing a final answer.

Mr. Brown: The right hon. Gentleman is getting very excited—and more and more red—but he does not seem able to answer the one question that the House is waiting for him to answer: would he scrap the independence of the Bank of England? The Conservatives cannot have a credible economic policy unless they can tell us their position on monetary policy and the independence of the Bank of England.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I shall give way after I have made some progress, because there are five issues to be addressed.

The first is on monetary policy. We have set out a clear policy. Long-term interest rates have come down. Because of our policies and the early action that was taken against inflation, it was possible for the Monetary Policy Committee of the Bank of England to respond to the international economic conditions as it did last month, bringing interest rates down from 7½ per cent. to 7¼ per cent. That is a big contrast with the 15 per cent. interest rates at the beginning of the 1990s.

The second issue is that we should play our part in rebuilding and making changes in the international financial system. That is why we have proposed a global financial regulator. Our proposals have been accepted by many countries. We have also taken action on a fund that will be available to help countries in difficulty. We are insisting on transparency in the future workings of the private and public sector. Those are sensible proposals that G7 countries have agreed to.

I said when the former Chancellor was not here on Monday that he had contributed to developing proposals for the international financial architecture. The problem is that those on the Conservative Front Bench cannot tell us the party's position on those issues. The Conservatives seem to be opting out of the world as well as opting out of Europe. A sensible economic policy for this country requires answers on how to reform and strengthen the international financial system.

The third issue of economic policy is international and national economic stability, which must be backed up by a policy for welfare to work in this country. That is why we have taken the action that we have. Some 300,000 people will benefit from the new deal by next Easter. Almost 30,000 companies have agreed to take people on. About 150,000 young people are part of the new deal, and 90,000 long-term unemployed men and women will be offered opportunities in 26 areas from the end of November.

Disabled men and women are being invited to join, backed up by a disabled persons tax credit. Lone parents are being given the chance to get advice, information, help and child care to enable them to get the chances that they want. Almost every household name company in the country supports the programme, and I am grateful to them.

I invited individual Members of Parliament from the Opposition parties to be ambassadors for the programme. We sent them details of how it would work, so that they could play a part in their constituencies. However, six months into the new deal, the shadow Chancellor said yesterday that it was a failure, and today that it is a fraud. I do not think that it is either a failure or a fraud. I think that, on reflection, the Opposition will change their mind about that policy as well.

The Opposition opposed the windfall tax, which made the welfare-to-work programme possible, yet one of their own Members, the hon. Member for South-West Bedfordshire (Sir D. Madel)—I do not know whether he is present—was reported in his local newspaper as saying:

"When we are returned to power, we will build on this scheme, which is doing a lot to help people."

Do not other Conservative Members agree that the new deal is doing much for young people? It is about time that the Conservatives recognised that that policy, too, is right for the country.

The Conservative party is opposing the working families tax credit—a measure which is similar to the earned income tax credit that was expanded by Ronald Reagan in America. The programme enjoys all-party support—from Republicans to Democrats—in the United States. The Conservative party wants to prevent work paying more than benefits as a result of the introduction of the working families tax credit, which improves family credit. Why do Conservatives refuse to extend to 1.5 million people, as we want to do, the benefits that they, under family credit, made available to 800,000 people? What dogma has taken over the Conservative party to the extent that it does not want to reduce the marginal rate of tax for low-paid workers?

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton) indicated dissent.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman, a Front-Bench spokesman, says that the Conservatives will definitely abolish the working families tax credit. I am sure that my hon. Friends will agree that this has been a very revealing debate. The Conservatives would abolish the working families tax credit; an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman is prepared to say it.

Mr. Gibb indicated dissent.

Mr. Brown: If the Conservative party stands on that policy, 1.5 million low-paid workers will face a major wage cut as a result. It will have to answer to the British electorate for that.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: May I remind the Chancellor that he inherited the welfare-to-work policy? We argued that the working families tax credit would simply replace our system of family credit, and we rejected it because the American experience is that it is more expensive, less effective and more open to abuse. The only reason why the Chancellor adopted it was to fiddle public spending figures—to pretend that money spent on it was not public expenditure any more—in order to keep down the anticipated growth of public expenditure over the next three years to a mere 2.75 per cent. in real terms per annum.

Mr. Brown: History books will show that the original proposal for family credit in the 1980s was very similar to the working families tax credit. It was rejected due to opposition in the Conservative party. That was not right for the country.

As people see the benefits not of just family credit but of a guaranteed minimum income of £190 a week, which is available to those who have families and who take up the opportunity to work, they will realise that the working families tax credit is a far superior system. Even the right hon. and learned Gentleman, a former Chancellor, who has changed his mind on issues such as the Bank of England, will change his mind on this policy. Our policy of building on stability is a new deal for young people and the long-term unemployed, backed by a minimum guarantee of money for families in work, so that work pays for everyone who is able to do it.

I think that, on reflection, the Conservative party will change its policy on the minimum wage, too. A minimum wage, which was acceptable to Sir Winston Churchill and is applied in America and all countries that have a higher standard of living than ours, is a minimum necessary not simply for economic efficiency but for social justice. On that issue, the Conservative party has much thinking to do. I look forward to hearing the results of it.

The next building block in our economic policy is what we will do about productivity—[Interruption.] We mention productivity and the Conservatives start to laugh, as if they do not recognise it as a problem. I can tell them who first wrote about productivity as a problem in the 1990s. It was the former Deputy Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who, year after year, published competitiveness White Papers saying that our productivity had to improve. [HON. MEMBERS: "It did."] Does the shadow Chancellor say that there is no productivity gap with any of our competitors?

Mr. Maude rose—

Mr. Brown: He may be able to correct us now.

Mr. Maude: What I will say is that, as a result of what we did, productivity did improve. It is since the election that it has started to fall. Why did Siemens, Philips and BMW praise Britain to the skies as a place to do business then, whereas they are now withdrawing?

Mr. Brown: The revealing aspect of the shadow Chancellor's answer is the fact that he started it with the words, "What I will say is that—". In other words, he cannot deny that there is a productivity gap with our competitors. It is a sad reflection on 18 years of Conservative government that we have a gap of 20 per cent. with some of our European competitors and 40 per cent. with some of our American competitors.

British business and the Government, unlike the Conservative party, are prepared to examine those issues, to discuss them seriously and to consider practical things that can be done. We have been prepared to consider the venture capital industry, for example, and what we can do about employee shareholding and how to encourage science and innovation. The shadow Chancellor may not want to comment on any of those announcements, but they represent significant advances for science and innovation, and for small businesses in this country. We have cut small business taxation and given advances for training and skills—

Mr. Bercow rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall not give way at this stage— [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] All right, I will.

Mr. Bercow: I thank the Chancellor for rethinking his decision; let us hope that it presages a rethink on all sorts of other issues on which he has cocked up in massive style—

Hon. Members: Wash your mouth out.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman might like to withdraw that remark and rephrase it.

Mr. Bercow: I withdraw that ill-advised term, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In his foreword to Labour's business manifesto of April 1997, the Chancellor wrote:

"We will not impose burdensome regulations upon business because we understand that successful businesses must keep costs down".

How does he square that ringing declaration with the reality of an additional £1,500 per person tax and regulatory burden in the lifetime of this Parliament? Is that not a contradiction, and will he not apologise?

Mr. Brown: We have cut corporation tax— [Interruption.] Now the Conservatives want to deny that we have cut corporation tax. This is a revealing debate. We cut corporation tax—[Interruption.] They are getting angry. We cut corporation tax from 33p to 30p, and small business taxation from 23p to 20p. We have introduced a long-term capital gains tax rate of 10p in the pound. All those measures have been welcomed by business. It is a pity that business and the Conservative party are so much at odds these days that the Conservative party cannot also welcome them.

I have raised the issues of monetary policy, stability and the international financial system and how we shall improve it. I have also challenged the Conservative party on welfare to work, and Conservative Members do not seem to be able to give answers. Productivity, which they seem to regard as a joke, is serious to every business; it is something on which business wants to work with us.

Let us deal with the final building block of our policy—the fact that the country needs and deserves good and efficient public services. I thought that the shadow Chancellor would welcome the fact that we had a surplus of £5.5 billion on the current account this year, the fact that we have kept under our spending ceilings, which he and his party said we would never be able to do, and the fact that a net borrowing requirement, prudently estimated in March, has turned into a surplus and allowed us to repay debt.

I thought the right hon. Gentleman would have welcomed the fact that the public finances have eliminated the current structural deficit as a result of the work that has been done. Instead, he is unprepared to recognise that we were left with a £28 billion deficit, and that the Labour Government have been prudent, sensible and cautious with public finances in a way that his party was not.

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire) rose—

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire) rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall not give way; I am explaining to the Conservative party what has happened to the public finances.

Conservative Members' answer on every issue is that they would cut public spending. Their answer to the question about what they would do about the economy is that there should be a moratorium on our public spending commitments. They started off by saying that public spending was unwise; then they said that they would not carry it out themselves; then they said that it was reckless; and then the shadow Chancellor, who needed a further comment to get attention, said that our public spending programmes were madness.

This afternoon, we have heard the shadow Chancellor say that he does not want to cut into health and education, but the only way that he could make the savings for reckless, extreme—as he calls them—spending programmes would be to cut into the £40 billion for health and education. That is the majority of the additional spending that we are undertaking; that £40 billion is absolutely central to the increase in public spending.

If the shadow Chancellor is telling us that he would not put health and education at risk, he must tell us which other billions he would cut, and in which areas. The Conservative defence and law and order spokesmen say that they would spend more. In which area would he achieve those billions of pounds of public spending cuts? Again, the public deserve a proper answer.

Mr. Maude: As he so often does, the Chancellor has said something that is plumb wrong. He said that the health and education spending increases are the majority of the public spending increases. The total, under the Government's funny accounting, is £110 billion over the next three years, of which health and education is no more than £40 billion. Nearly as much as both of those put together is social security spending, which the Chancellor and the Prime Minister promised to cut.

Mr. Brown: Let us be clear about this. The Conservatives entered the election campaign saying that they would maintain the basic state pension, and raise it in line with inflation. I assume that that is still their commitment. [Interruption.] No? Well, the debate gets more and more interesting, and is quite a revelation. The shadow Chancellor cannot give us a simple answer. Would he maintain the level of the basic state pension in line with inflation? If he cannot give that answer, he is breaching—[Interruption.] It has taken the shadow Chancellor some time to come to this point. Let us hope that we get a direct answer.

Mr. Maude: The country will be disgusted by a Chancellor behaving in such a way. He is responsible for the downturn starting in this country, and all he can do is make cheap debating points. He should grow up, stop being an adolescent, student politician, and take his job seriously.

Mr. Brown: The whole House, including Conservative Members, will note that the shadow Chancellor did not answer that question. He cannot give us an assurance, even though it was in the Conservative manifesto, that he would raise the basic state pension in line with inflation. This has been a very revealing debate.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire) rose—

Mr. Lansley rose—

Mr. Brown: I do not think that two Back Benchers can rescue a shadow Chancellor in this difficulty, no matter how hard they try.

If the shadow Chancellor will not answer the question, every pensioner in the country should know that the Labour Government are raising the pension in line with inflation and have provided winter fuel payments, but the Conservative party will not guarantee that it would do that if it was in government.

We know now that there would be cuts in public spending if the Conservatives were ever in government. We know that health and education would be at risk, but there has been a £40 billion increase, which we will stand by. We know also that the pension is not something which the shadow Chancellor will guarantee. The Conservative party initiated the debate, and Conservative Members wanted to ask questions of us. The Conservative party must now answer all the questions. This Government are maintaining economic stability. We are improving public services. We will work with business to increase productivity. Unlike the Conservative party, we will be fair to every citizen, and that is why the House should support our amendment.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I was confused by the direction of the Conservative attack. I have come to the conclusion that the only matter about which the Conservatives are sure is that they want the country to go into recession as that is their only hope of making some political gain. Although there are differences between the Liberal Democrats and the Government, we agree that we want the country to succeed. Our debate is about the policies that will ensure that success and the revenues that will underpin the public services in which we want to invest.

The Conservatives talk about fantasy forecasts, but we have had many opportunities to debate their forecasts and the substantial revisions that they had to undergo when the outturn did not fulfil the early promise. What is the Conservative policy on inflation these days? The Chancellor pressed the Opposition for clarification on several occasions on the subject of the Bank of England without receiving any coherent answer. The rhetoric appears to be that it was wrong to give the Bank of England independence and that it should be taken back under political control, which should then be used to reduce interest rates regardless of the implications for inflation.

Mr. Maude: That is what the Liberal Democrats say that they would do.

Mr. Bruce: It is not and the right hon. Gentleman will hear why. The reality is that Japan is the only country in the Group of Seven with a nationalised bank and, as a consequence, there has been a cosy arrangement between the politicians and the private sector, which has brought the country to its knees—hardly a model that we want to emulate. The reality is that markets recognise that independent banks take the short-term political interference out of decisions to control monetary policy. The Chancellor is right to say that that yields the benefit of lower interest rates in the long term.

The issue that dare not speak its name is how we learn to live with the euro. The Conservative party thinks that it has resolved the issue by simply saying, "We want nothing to do with the euro for eight years." That is completely at odds with the traditional pragmatism of the Conservative party when it had aspirations to government. No one knows what will be the responsible decision in eight years' time and the meaning behind much of what the Conservatives are saying appears to be, "Under no circumstances will we ever join."

Mr. Cash rose—

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman should contain himself. Given that the euro will be established by 11 countries on 1 January, we will have to do business with that market and live with it. How will we compete if our interest rates continue to be double the European average? The Conservatives have nothing to say about that. They have no strategy or game plan as to how we should live with the euro. They want political control of the Bank of England so that they can manipulate interest rates regardless of the effect on inflation. They want the freedom to have interest rates double those of the rest of Europe. If that is an economic policy, I want no part of it.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, in practice, he is saying that the Liberal Democrats are prepared to tell their constituents that they will no longer have any real control—through the ballot box—over interest rates and inflation and, therefore, employment? Does he accept that it is ultimately a political decision and that the Liberal Democrats, in common with the Government and some others, are prepared to sell this country down the river?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman should stop deceiving his constituents that he, let alone the Government—perhaps even more than the Government—has the power over such issues that he implies by his questioning.

We live in a global market—that is reality, not an opinion—and markets must be taken into account. Interest rates across Europe are at least 3 per cent. lower than those in the United Kingdom. It is unrealistic to expect us to compete with no strategy to close that gap. The hon. Gentleman is naive if he thinks that the rate set by the European central bank—whether we are in or out of the euro—will have no effect on the decisions that this country takes, regardless of whether the Bank of England is under political control.

Mr. Bercow: The hon. Gentleman seems badly confused. In an interdependent economy, of course Sainsbury's must take account of the prices that are set by Tesco. Does he seriously believe—as he seems to, on the logic that he used in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Stone (Mr. Cash)—that the chairman of Sainsbury's would give up to the chairman of Tesco the right to set prices at Sainsbury's?

Mr. Bruce: That is a classic example of treating the economy of a family or a business as if it were the economy of a nation. We operate in a market, and we must take account of trends in that market.

The Government will have to decide on a strategy to deal with the situation in which we find ourselves. The downturn in the economy—which the Chancellor acknowledged yesterday, although he did not dwell on today—has been caused much more by the management of domestic policy than by international factors. In his reply to my question yesterday, he cited the $3 trillion fall in the world stock markets, but that figure takes account only of what happened between July and September. Over the year, the stock markets have not fallen at all—they are still, on the whole, at record high levels. For the vast majority of citizens, what has happened in the stock markets is not a factor that will fundamentally alter individual decisions.

In the pre-Budget report, the Chancellor compares our growth forecast with the weighted average of the G7 figures, which include the figures for Japan. If Japan is taken out of the equation, the downward thrust of British growth is, as the shadow Chancellor said, sharper than that of any of our major partners. The Chancellor has not acknowledged that fact; he certainly has not admitted that it has anything to do with his policies.

Liberal Democrats support the independence of the Bank of England. We believe that it is unwise for Ministers inadvertently or deliberately to lean on the Bank, as that could be counterproductive. As Mr. Trichet warned yesterday, the greater the pressure from politicians, the more likely independent bankers are to resist it—bankers must be allowed to make objective decisions.

That does not mean that the Chancellor can say, "It's nothing to do with me, guv." His fiscal and spending policies provide the framework within which the Bank operates, and that is where he has failed to strike the right balance. Because he has not pursued the strategies that would have enabled the Bank to reduce interest rates, which has created the disparity whereby our exchange rate has continued to be uncompetitively high, there has been a recession in manufacturing—he admits at least the risk of such a recession next year.

If the downward revision of our growth forecast and productivity is more to do with domestic economic management than world activity, which the Chancellor chooses to blame, his failure to make any changes will mean that his figures are over-optimistic and the Government's ability to sustain investment in public services may be undermined, which neither he nor I want.

Sir Michael Spicer: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point about the fact that the Government's fiscal policy does not match their monetary policy. However, should he not address that point to the Liberal Democrats? His party is the most profligate of all in pressing for more public spending, so how does he square that circle?

Mr. Bruce: I understand where the hon. Gentleman is coming from but, like so many hon. Members, we do not read one another's policy documents in detail. To have a proper fiscal policy, if one makes a commitment to invest in health and education, one shows how one will raise the money to pay for it. The Conservative Government did not do that. The irony is that they told us that they would cut spending and then boasted about the increases that they delivered; they told us that they would cut taxes, and they increased them. One does not get something for nothing. If one wants to make an investment in public services, one has to raise taxes.

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bruce: No, I will not, because I think that our position is clear and I want to discuss the Government's pre-Budget report.

We welcome the innovation of the report and the principle that it establishes, allowing better consideration before tax changes. As one who participated in the process last year, I know that the consultation was genuine and led to improvements in the quality of the changes that were introduced or, indeed, not introduced.

I hope that the Government will reconsider some of the tax wheezes that they seem to favour to provide incentives for various types of behaviour. We are in favour of simplifying the tax system and removing anomalies and will support the Government when they endeavour to do that, but well-meaning tax breaks often end up as wasteful tax loopholes that are quickly abused. The Chancellor, in opposition, was a master of exposing tax loopholes, so I hope that he will not create too many in government.

In evidence to the Treasury Select Committee, Andrew Dilnot said:

"Thinking back over the last 20 years, I can think of no tax scheme which has been particularly successful in its original objectives . . . any attempts to use the tax system to encourage a particular activity will generate all of the foreseeable problems we can imagine, a number we had not foreseen, and in general rather less of the good than we had hoped for."

Those are reasonably wise words. The Government's proposals on individual savings accounts and capital gains tax are already causing problems, to which we will return on the Finance Bill.

It is easier to identify problems with productivity than to come up with practical solutions. There is an argument about how much of a productivity gap there is and how much it has improved in recent times. We will support measures that genuinely improve productivity, but most of those should come from the companies and businesses themselves, not from the Government. The problem has not arisen suddenly, and it is certainly not the cause of our current reduction in growth forecast.

The weakest chapter in the pre-Budget report is the section on productivity, which contains an awful lot of waffle. I think that we would all agree that it is desirable to as we are told on page 37, but does that really need to be written in a Government report?

"keep to a minimum the number of unnecessary corporate failures",

We welcome the extra money for the health service, but would it not be better to be realistic about funding in the first place? I know that the Chancellor likes to have a lollipop to pull out of the hat in his pre-Budget report, but is it sensible to throw £250 million at the national health service in the last five months of the financial year rather than providing it in a planned way over the course of the year?

We welcome the commitment to new measures to reduce pollution and the work that the Government are doing on tax to reduce carbon emissions from businesses, but am I right in thinking that the Chancellor's welcome for Lord Marshall's report was less than overwhelming? He promised to look at the matter very carefully and said that the report "moves forward the debate". Thank you, Lord Marshall, and goodbye? Will the energy tax join pensions reform, monetary union and other matters in being kicked into touch? As one political commentator said yesterday, it will soon be standing room only in the long grass.

The central issue in the pre-Budget report was the outlook for growth, employment and borrowing. The Chancellor has forecast a modest and short-lived downturn, but the question being asked in the House and outside is whether that is wise. Unlike the Tories, the Liberal Democrats do not pray for a recession before going to bed each night. We understand that recessions tend to occur when economic policy cannot respond to deflationary forces—for example, if there is an inflation problem or a profound currency problem—but we do not currently have such problems in the United Kingdom. The Liberal Democrats, therefore, agree that the best guess is a slowdown and not a collapse in growth, and we hope that that is the outcome.

I am surprised that the Chancellor has chosen to be quite so relaxed about our prospects. He has even revised the growth figures for 2001. I wonder whether he could not resist the chance to stick the shadow Chancellor's black hole down his throat. I accept that that prospect was inviting, but I am not sure that a 3 per cent. central prediction for growth for 2001 is prudent. It would be above trend if it were delivered. If that figure is too optimistic, the Chancellor may find that his borrowing forecasts are a little optimistic.

We agree that the Chancellor has given latitude on the golden rule and he has a margin for error built into the calculations, but we are concerned by his estimates for manufacturing output. Many people working in farming and manufacturing industries will have listened in vain for some words of encouragement from the Chancellor. He forecasts 0 per cent. growth next year as a central tendency, so even he acknowledges that we could face a recession. The private sector consensus is closer to minus 0.5 per cent. and some commentators have gone as low as minus 3.5 per cent. The CBI survey, the results of which are the worst since 1980, estimates that manufacturing is likely to be in recession next year and that, over the two years, job losses could exceed 400,000.

[Mr. Bruce]

The Government have not addressed that crisis. The Chancellor's manufacturing forecasts look like proving both complacent and wrong.

The situation may be even worse. No Chancellor wants to forecast a recession in any sector of the economy, but the danger is that, in masking his concern, he has produced a policy complacency that puts jobs at risk. I made that argument last week and I shall not repeat it, but I remind the Chancellor that lately the pound has been higher than it was in the 1990 recession and real short-term interest rates have been higher than in the 1980 recession. If those problems are not addressed, we face a continual haemorrhage of jobs from the manufacturing sector. In his July Budget last year, the Chancellor diagnosed that problem, but he has failed to deliver his own prescribed cure for rebalancing the economy.

Yesterday, the Chancellor failed to give the Bank of England a clear message. If he had said that he will not ease fiscal policy in March and, in the present climate, that he will not go ahead with his 10p tax rate, that would have enabled the Bank to bring down interest rates sharply. The Chancellor must surely acknowledge that interest rate cuts—and not tax cuts—must now be the priority. It is unnecessary to dangle in front of us tax cuts that he cannot deliver at the risk of failing to give the Bank of England the scope to the deliver the rate cuts that are desperately needed. If his complacency causes the Chancellor to ignore that need, interest rates may not come down sufficiently fast. I worry that the Chancellor's reading of the situation is that we have passed the worst and that the Bank of England is so depressed by the situation that it will reduce interest rates as a consequence of its negative outlook. The Bank has certainly not received any policy guide from the Chancellor. Without a shift in policy, thousands—even hundreds of thousands—of manufacturing jobs will be lost.

I hope that the Chancellor's optimism is borne out. He is in charge of the economy and we all hope that he is right. I hope that he understands that the issue is neither the global economy nor the productivity gap. He has a responsibility to share with the Bank of England the policy that will deliver what all of us need. That policy is lower interest rates and a competitive exchange rate that can ensure a slowdown, followed by sustainable growth and the ability to fund quality public services.

5.9 pm

Mr. Christopher Leslie (Shipley): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) as it was interesting to hear him say that it is wrong to dangle major tax cuts before the public. I know that he has advised people not to read the policy documents of other parties, but I have read closely his pronouncements in "Moving Ahead", the financial policy he set out at his party conference. His proposals included changing personal income tax allowance from £4,195 to £10,000, which would cost the Exchequer £29 billion.

I do not like to quote the hon. Gentleman's words back at him, but those proposals hit me in the face when he said that when we make a commitment, we have to take responsibility for saying where the money is coming from. As long as we establish that the Liberal Democrats are beginning to say where the money is coming from, that is the important thing. They have said that they want to cut what they regard as ill-judged tax reliefs and to impose a significant energy tax, although the details are unclear.

To raise £29 billion would mean astronomical changes in the tax system. That amount is nearly half the total income tax take, and it is more than the combined amount we spend on law and order, trade and industry and defence. We must find out how the Liberals would raise the money. They talk of ill-judged tax relief, but scrapping tax relief on occupational pension schemes would raise only £9 billion. It would be interesting to know whether they would do that, and I would be happy to give way to the hon. Member for Gordon if he wants to clarify the point.

Does the hon. Gentleman want to scrap tax relief on redundancy payments? That would raise only £1.1 billion. If the hon. Gentleman were to try to raise the whole £29 billion by adding to the price of petrol, he would have to triple its price. I urge him to take his own advice: when he makes a commitment, he must take responsibility for saying where the money will come from. I shall happily give way to him if he wants to specify how he wants to pay for that. Will he? No answer. I need not dwell on the Liberals, who are obviously not interested in their own policies.

Let me focus instead on what is left of the rabble that is the official Opposition. Not many of them are here, and I am sorry that the shadow Chancellor has gone because I had many questions for him. He came out with so much concern for employment that I wondered whether he was considering resigning his directorships at Asda and at Gartmore Shared Equity Trust to let someone else have a go at those extra jobs. Perhaps employment does not figure so personally in his interests.

The Conservatives persist in talking down the economy. They constantly pick away, trying to find any loophole that will gain them some political advantage. They point out any statistic they can find, throwing bar charts and all sorts across the House at us. They try desperately to say that there will be a meltdown, a catastrophe or a depression. Many economists, industrialists and bankers are worried that if the Tories continue to talk like that—and they must take responsibility for what they say—they may talk down the economy. Lloyds bank said last week that talk of global meltdown raised a real danger of talking ourselves into a United Kingdom recession.

The Conservatives contribute—perhaps unwittingly—to that problem. Or maybe that is exactly what they want. They want to keep the ball rolling. They want to cash in on political opportunism whenever they can. That is their agenda. They play games and throw mud without ever saying how they would change things. Would they reverse the Bank of England's independence? We heard policy-making on the hoof from the shadow Chancellor when he tried to answer that question, until the hon. Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Collins) stepped in and said that other Governments have not laid out policy until after elections. Now we have the threat of their not being prepared to say what they will do about the Bank of England.

Mr. Townend: Rubbish.

Mr. Leslie: Will the hon. Gentleman say exactly what Conservative policy is?

Mr. Townend: We did not say that we would not tell the public. The Chancellor will not tell the public the tax changes in the next Budget. We shall tell the public the policies on which we shall fight the next election in a year or two years from now. We shall not tell them now. Your party is in Government. It is your duty to debate the issue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that I have nothing to do with that.

Mr. Leslie: The hon. Gentleman is on the fast track towards becoming the new shadow Chancellor. They certainly need a new one following the performance given earlier by the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude). We have just heard that Conservative policy has changed again within the past hour. The Opposition were not going to announce what they would do about Bank of England independence until after the next election. Now the hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) says that they will announce their policy within the next two years, and we can look forward to that. Let us write the date in our diaries in red while we wait to hear what their policy will be. It is not only Conservative and Labour Members who will be interested. The whole country waits to hear what the Conservatives propose. The risk that their election would pose to the economy is substantial. The people of the UK need to know what they would do. [Interruption.] They can bluster all they want, but they clearly do not like to be asked what their policy is. They are all over the place on public spending, too.

Mr. Lansley: Would the hon. Gentleman try to explain something in the Chancellor's pre-Budget report rather than talking about Opposition policies? Why has the Chancellor reduced from 2 to 1 per cent. his economic assumption underlying public finances for growth in 1999–2000, while simultaneously increasing from £344 billion to £348 billion his anticipated Government receipts? Why does he forecast that growth will go down, but receipts go up? Is that another of the Chancellor's fantasy forecasts?

Mr. Leslie: That is an intriguing intervention. The Conservatives plainly do not want to talk about the solutions that they offer to the country. After all, this is only an Opposition debate.

The hon. Gentleman knows that the UK is not in isolation from the other countries of the world. We live, work, employ and manufacture in a global economy. We must recognise that worldwide downturns and problems will affect us. We must put policies in place that will get us out of difficulties.

Mr. Barry Gardiner (Brent, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that if the hon. Member for South Cambridgeshire (Mr. Lansley) had been in the Chamber earlier or, if he were here, had unblocked his ears while his point was being answered, he would know that revenue projections for next year are based on this year's growth, which has not been downgraded, not next year's growth which has been.

Mr. Leslie: I thank my hon. Friend.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leslie: No. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Mr. Gardiner) offered the embryo of a great speech that we shall perhaps hear later this evening.

Mr. Lansley: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Leslie: No.

I want to focus on public finance and expenditure over the next three years. An extra £40 billion has been committed for health and education. That financial expenditure will not only bring benefits to the whole country in terms of better public services, improved infrastructure and better capital but have an impact on the economy as a whole. I am intrigued to know just what the Conservative party proposes. Conservative Members talk about the downturn, the slump, the great depression and the meltdown that they foresee, or rather they would love to see as they rub their hands, yet they want to slash public expenditure right at the time when the supposed downturn is taking place.

I want to know from the Front-Bench spokesman how the Conservatives reconcile cutting public expenditure at the time of a supposed downturn. Do they not realise that that would magnify all the economic problems as a result of changes in the global economy and hurt this country in a much more significant and ingrained way? I should like to know whether they realise what effect their proposed massive spending cuts would have on the economy. Such cuts would be devastating. The Conservatives' blindness to even the most obvious economic factors will come to haunt them at the next general election.

There were discussions earlier about exactly what public spending on services the Conservative party would consider cutting. We all know that health and education would be a target. The Conservatives were specific in setting out the social security budget as something that they wished to target. They would scrap the £5 billion of expenditure on the new deal to get people off benefit and into work, which is thereby reducing unemployment and, as a corollary, cutting costs to the Exchequer such as jobseekers allowance and other things over the long term. That is the way to bring down social security expenditure, and that is exactly what we are doing.

The Conservatives want to scrap the working families tax credit. They are not bothered about the poverty trap or getting people off benefit and into work. It is the old, 1980s Conservative party coming back and haunting us. I am not old enough to remember the election of Margaret Thatcher in 1979—[Interruption.] Well, I probably am, but it might not have been the first thing on my mind at that time. It was refreshing to hear again all the mistakes that were made in the 1980s. The Conservatives still have not learnt. They want to start right back where they began. They have no concept of where they went wrong. That is good because, as long as they do not realise what is happening, the rest of the country will. We realise what is going on and the people realise what went wrong, but the Conservatives are absolutely nowhere on economic policy.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): The hon. Gentleman seems to be advocating the old Labour Keynesian economics of spend, spend, spend. Can he explain why some of his socialist friends in Governments in Europe, who are much better at spending than his Government, have higher unemployment than Britain? Will his Government have higher or lower unemployment when they leave office—in the not too distant future, I hope—than when they took office?

Mr. Leslie: There we have it—the dogma of the Conservative party. Conservative Members wish to slash vital public services regardless of the effect on the wider economy. They are oblivious to the needs of the wider economy and the state of demand in this country. The effect of cutting public services would be astronomical. Conservative Members need to think carefully about their position.

During proceedings in Committee on the Finance Bill, the Conservative party proposed a number of changes. They moved a series of amendments which amounted to a £6 billion reduction in the funding available for public services. So as well as opposing the windfall levy on the privatised utilities, the Conservatives have committed themselves to reducing the funds available for public services by £6 billion. They have a variety of choices available to them. They could add the extra money that they would need to borrow, raise other taxes to compensate, which is what I suspect is on their agenda—they would increase VAT on fuel, among other things—or they could cut vital public services. Those are the questions that the Opposition need to answer and pursue.

We have heard today that the Conservatives threaten the basic state pension and its uprating by inflation. Perhaps when they target social security expenditure, they also threaten child benefit and benefits for disabled people. We shall have to find out in the coming months. We await their policy with interest.

The state of the economy is interesting, not least because we have to acknowledge that we do not live in a vacuum. I think that the Conservative party sometimes imagines that we do. The old protectionist agenda cloaks it in its historical role. There have been significant international changes. Change has occurred in Japan and ricocheted around Russia, and through Latin America and other areas. Serious threats have been posed by large financial institutions such as the hedge funds, Long-Term Capital Management and others. Economic issues affect us all.

I am proud of the leadership that has been shown by my right hon. Friends the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister on the international level in the G7 and other forums to move to a more transparent international financial system, to ensure greater supervision and regulation of large capital movements and to ensure that the International Monetary Fund and World bank are more able to nip embryonic problems in the bud. That is an important point. As we saw on Monday, the Conservatives have no answers to give.

The Government have put us on the right course to the sustainable, high-productivity, high-growth economy that we all want by setting domestic fiscal policy, committing themselves to public spending and the capital expenditure that we know is so important. The monetary policy framework has been set out, with independence for the Bank of England so that stable, long-term objectives can be met. I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on putting those firm foundations in place.

Sir Michael Spicer (West Worcestershire): The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) made a good speech for the first 90 seconds. He was right about the Liberals. Given his Front-Bench's love-in with the Liberals I am not sure whether he will earn himself promotion, despite all the flattery in the last part of his speech—it was not such a good speech at the end—but he is right about the Liberals. He was especially right in saying that, although the Liberals would increase taxes—they are unashamed about that; it is something that they think would be a good thing—the revenue would in no way meet the bills for the profligate suggestions that they make. Never a day goes by without some Liberal spokesman making some great grand gesture for expenditure. The idea of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) that the Liberals are the people who have the balanced view is wrong. The hon. Member for Shipley was right to point that out, and I am glad that he did.

The real irony of this debate has been that for the past two hours, Labour Members, including the hon. Member for Shipley, have been jumping up and down like a jack-in-a-box defending the independence of the Bank of England and asking all sorts of rude questions of us. Yet they are the same people—including the Chancellor, to whom I put this question in an intervention—who are hellbent on abolishing the independence of the Bank of England and handing over its reserves and powers to the European central bank. It is an enormous hypocrisy on the part of the Government and the governing party to pretend to take the line that they do when they are hellbent on abolishing the independence of the Bank of England.

Those who have not been jumping up and down defending the independence of the Bank of England are likely to be those such as the Chief Secretary who are muddled about the exact nature of that independence. As my hon. Friend the Member for Louth and Horncastle (Sir P. Tapsell) pointed out in a sharp intervention earlier, the nature of that independence needs thinking about carefully, especially on the afternoon when the Monetary Policy Committee is deliberating on what interest rates will be tomorrow. I congratulate my hon. Friends on the Front Bench on having chosen today for this debate, and I am glad that Labour Members have raised the pertinent question of the Bank of England, on the very day that the Monetary Policy Committee sits.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury does not appear to have taken on board the exact nature of the remit given to the MPC. It is worth quoting section 11 of the Bank of England Act 1998, because in meetings of the Select Committee on the Treasury, it has become clear that many Labour Members are becoming more and more muddled about the role of the MPC. That role is clearly defined in section 11, which states:

"In relation to monetary policy, the objectives of the Bank of England shall be—

(a) to maintain price stability, and"— this is the crucial point—

"(b) subject to that, to support the economic policy of Her Majesty's Government".

The legislation goes on to define how the inflation target is to be set. None of that is the same as that which applies to the Federal Reserve or the European central bank. Therefore, it is interesting and relevant to make clear the role of our central bank in relation to economic policy.

Given that extremely tight context, which makes the inflation target the only real objective that the MPC has to consider as a matter of priority, it is relevant to ask what inflationary pressures face the MPC this afternoon. That is not a subject which has arisen in our debate, but it is one that the members of the MPC will discuss if they are doing their job properly, according to statute and the law of the land. It is by no means an easy question for the MPC to answer.

The first point is that not one single forecast provided by the Government shows any sort of undershoot of the inflation target. Most of the forecasts veer either towards the target or above it, but no one is talking about there being an undershoot of the statutory target at the current rates of interest. I did not invent the target—the Government invented it and they set the law of the land.

If, when looking at inflationary forces, one takes the figures for broad money, one sees that the latest figures show that 12-month growth rates have risen to 9 per cent. from 8.7 per cent. in August. The money supply is a definite determinant of the rate of inflation. Although there are arguments to be had about how strong a factor it is, no one would deny that, if one is printing more money, one is creating inflationary pressures. The figure for M4 is currently rising, not falling. Furthermore, no one would deny that the labour market is still extremely tight—for example, unemployment is considerably lower than it was in the first quarter of this year.

The hon. Member for Shipley asked why we worry so much about expenditure, which brings us to the question of the Government's fiscal policy. That policy has to be seen, not only in terms of new hospitals and the context in which the Government wants it to be seen, but in terms of its effect on the MPC's remit on inflation and, therefore, its effect on interest rates. One of the hypocrisies that we hear time and again from hon. Members of all the other parties, including the Liberals, is their failure to take the point that, having for better or worse established by statute such a clear-cut policy on inflation—I personally think that having a fixed inflation target is for the better—if they are profligate in public spending and print money in the way they are printing it, the effect can only be to force the MPC to keep interest rates up, with all the detrimental effects on unemployment and other economic consequences that that carries with it. That is the point which continues to be missed: if the Government are profligate in their fiscal policy and spend beyond what the country can afford and if, therefore, inflationary pressures are created, it will result in higher interest rates and in poverty.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): The hon. Gentleman has twice mentioned the so-called profligacy of the Government's public spending targets. Will he tell us in which areas he would make cuts in order to bring public expenditure back under control?

Sir Michael Spicer: The hon. Gentleman's party is in government and it is the Government's job to set targets and to write statute. It is up to them. That is what winning elections means: if one wins an election, one is in charge of priorities. I do not have the books in front of me and I do not know the Government's priorities. I can list various things that I would not be doing were I in government—for example, I would not be reforming at vast cost to the country the highly effective GP service that the Conservative Government left behind. There are many things that I would not be doing, were the Conservatives in government, but, sadly, we are not in government.

It is the responsibility of Labour Members, whose party is in government, to go to the councils of the parliamentary Labour party, or wherever such matters are discussed, and determine what action will result in a public expenditure policy that keeps interest rates down. That is the point which Labour Members keep missing. They miss it because many of them believe that, somehow or other, someone will give the thumbs down to the Governor of the Bank of England and the MPC when they try to raise interest rates. They have not read the statute properly and believe that we operate the same system as the Federal Reserve, but we do not: we live under a different system, one which is of the Labour Government's own making. It is the Labour Government who have to find the solution; otherwise, interest rates will continue to rise. The question is whether the pressures from public expenditure will, as the Government suggest, create a balanced economy.

Mr. Love: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is dishonest of the Opposition to set up this debate to chide the Government on their economic policy, but to refuse to offer any alternatives on the best way forward?

Sir Michael Spicer: It is not the job of the Opposition to govern the country. That is what the electorate determined a year or so ago. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude) said, why should the Government come crawling to us for solutions to problems that are entirely of the Government's own making? That is the crucial point.

The reason the problems are of the Government's making is that, when one examines the concept of balanced growth, of which the Government have been making much for the past 24 hours, one realises that it does not stand up. The growth assumptions on which the so-called relatively balanced budgets are projected simply do not stand up to scrutiny. No serious economist or commentator would agree with the Government's growth projections, or be able to give any reason why the projections should be increased for the year after next. That is the most extraordinary thing for the Government to have done.

Even given the Government's own projections, the MPC is sitting down this afternoon having to take into account a deficit for the next five years that is £11 billion higher than it had to consider when it last discussed interest rates. That £11 billion has arrived out of nowhere, based on extraordinarily optimistic growth figures. Although it has not been widely noticed, it is no wonder that long-term interest rates have begun to harden in the past 48 hours. That is absolutely logical.

I asked the Chancellor yesterday how he can square a profligate expenditure programme with trying to help the MPC to reduce interest rates. I got no answer. The members of the MPC must be scared out of their wits this afternoon as they consider the public expenditure plans in cold print in the context of the interest rate policy, which no doubt they want to try to accommodate with what are conceived to be the nation's needs on growth, unemployment and so on.

Unless the Government stand ready to change their expenditure or tax plans if their growth forecasts prove to be wrong—we have not heard anything to that effect—the MPC can have no alternative but to assume that the Government are embarking on an expenditure programme that the nation is unlikely to be able to afford and which will therefore be inflationary. Given the Government's stance and, above all, the terms of reference that they have set the MPC, it would not be surprising if the committee decided to hold interest rates at their present level. The crucial point is that the nation should understand that all the pain that that would cause would be entirely the Government's fault.

5.40 pm

Mr. Geraint Davies (Croydon, Central): There has been a pathetic and miserable attempt by the beleaguered Opposition ranks to talk down Britain. They are not in the real world, let alone the global economy. Opposition Members think that we can arbitrarily set interest and exchange rates as if Britain exists in a vacuum. They live in a fantasy land of away days dreamed up by the Leader of the Opposition where everyone dresses up as Val Doonican and pretends that the UK floats around on its own.

Global circumstances are difficult. A quarter of the world is in recession; global growth forecasts have been halved; the US is rescuing hedge funds; the Japanese are rescuing banks; Hong Kong is rescuing companies; and the UK has, rightly, adjusted its growth rates. Where has the Tories' black hole gone? Why has it disappeared?

First, the starting point of the economic analysis is much better than people had assumed. The 1998–99 Budget forecasts growth of 1.75 per cent., but that has been revised up to 2.25 per cent. because, under Labour, the economy has fared much better. [Interruption.] No, it is true, and therefore public expenditure has improved and borrowing is lower. Prudent management has reduced the budget deficit from £28 billion a year to £8 billion a year. The projected surplus over five years is £33 billion. A reduction of 1 per cent. in the gross domestic product growth rate would cost £6 billion over two years, so there is a large margin of opportunity for manoeuvre.

The revised growth targets and rates are realistic and cautious. People will remember that the Chancellor revised the original trend forecast from 2.5 to 2.25 per cent. The economy is in good shape to face a slowdown which, by now, everyone should accept will occur.

Mr. Bercow: Like other hon. Members, I am accustomed to the hon. Gentleman's display of gut-wrenching deference to the European Commission in most debates. Will he explain to the House whether he agrees with the European Commission's prediction that this country will next year slump to the bottom of the European growth table; if not, why not?

Mr. Davies: The last time the hon. Gentleman spoke after me, his mother was in the audience; sadly, she is not here to take him home. I shall move on to EU growth rates in a moment. It is important that we discuss why the growth rate projections from the European Commission are lower than they were.

We are in good shape to face a slowdown in the world economy because the Government have cut debt and controlled expenditure and inflation, and interest and exchange rates are beginning to fall. If the Conservatives were in power, with their resistance to the independence of the Bank of England and current interest rates, inflation would go out of control and, in the midst of a downturn in the global economy, they would increase interest rates at the worst time while cutting back on public expenditure on health and education. That would be a disaster.

Looking back over the past 18 years, it is remarkable that the Conservatives caused two domestic recessions when the global environment was relatively stable. We now face choppier waters in the global economy and this Government are steadily and surefootedly leading us ahead using long-term investment.

The European Commission has forecast growth rates. First, anyone who has rudimentary knowledge of economics—which the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) appears to lack—knows that Britain is at the top of the economic cycle and other economies are at a different stage. The economy is near capacity, but we have created an extra 400,000 jobs since we have been in power. The economic management challenge for the Chancellor is to put into productive work more people who have been dislocated from the economy through lack of training or opportunity. We have introduced the new deal and the working families tax credit to make work pay for people who were left on the scrap heap by the Conservatives.

We have done so well and are so high in the economic cycle that we have fewer opportunities for growth than our European counterparts. As I said, interest rates are beginning to fall because of the slowdown in the world economy. Exchange rates are now 10 per cent. lower; the pound has fallen from DM3.10 to DM2.75. Britain will come out of the slowdown more quickly and strongly than other EU countries, and that is implicit in the growth forecast. Hon. Members may ask why, and I shall answer that in a moment.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's point that Britain is at a different stage in the economic cycle, to which he has pertinently drawn attention. Will he develop his argument further and say what are the principal causes of our cycle being different from the continental norm and what measures the Government will take to correct that so that we can enjoy the benefits of a single European currency?

Mr. Davies: I am glad that certain Conservative Back Benchers are so enthusiastic about the single European currency.

Current and past events demonstrate that the United States and the UK lead the economic cycle while the core of Europe—Italy, Spain, France and Germany—lags. The UK and the United States went into recession in 1991, and France, Italy, Germany and Spain did not follow until 1993. The UK and the US began to move out of recession by 1992, but the rest of Europe did not follow until after 1994. Those cycles explain some of the changes in the EU forecasts of which the shadow Chancellor, the right hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. Maude)—who, I presume, has returned to Asda—has made such play.

Mr. Swayne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way again?

Mr. Davies: No, because I know that other hon. Members want to speak.

The first of the Government's main planks for tackling economic developments has been to introduce monetary stability through the independence of the Bank of England. That means that interest rates are now responding to the global environment rather than the domestically created environment, as under the Howe and Lawson recessions.

Secondly, although we inherited about £400 billion of debt, which was costing £28 billion a year, we have brought those costs down to £8 billion a year. As a result, we need not make cuts in health and education spending; in fact, we have drastically increased that spending, by £40 billion. The Opposition would obviously cut some of that amount from their pronouncements about our recklessness. They deny that, but it is self-evident.

Thirdly, as has been alluded to, Britain is now a leading player—the Chancellor is probably the leading player—in pioneering international reforms to enable us to live in a more stable world, by supporting reforms of the International Monetary Fund and making financial transactions transparent. Governments are shaping the future, instead of reacting like headless chickens, as they did previously. You will remember, Mr. Deputy Speaker, how humiliating it was for the Conservatives when we dropped out of the exchange rate mechanism.

Fourthly, we have the welfare-to-work measures—the new deal, making work pay, to bring back into the productive economy more and more people left permanently on the scrap heap by the Conservatives.

Fifthly, we have a focus on increasing productivity. It is no use saying, "It has nothing to do with us." In productivity, we lag between 20 and 40 per cent. behind many of our competitors. We are in the process of generating an enterprise culture by linking business enterprise into the school and university system, by encouraging venture capitalists and by encouraging regional development. Our challenge is to engage more people in the economy and to make them more productive, to make the whole of Britain more successful. Those changes, be they in management training, venture capital or enterprise, are some of the assumptions that underpin the Chancellor's cautious growth rate projections, which have been dismissed by the Opposition, who have no ideas for improving British industry.

If the Tories were in charge today, there would be no new deal. Where would they find the £5 billion? The people would still be on the dole. There would be no increase in opportunities for affordable work, so people would languish on the dole. There would be no Bank of England independence, so interest rates would have been held back for political reasons, then jacked up as the world economy slowed. Finally, there would be savage cuts in health and education. Opposition Members ask, "What about the welfare budget?" I remind them that, when we talk about welfare, we talk about old people, pensioners, children and the disabled. All those people would suffer if the discredited Opposition had an opportunity to govern, as has again been revealed today.

I very much commend the opportunities that have been placed before the British public again by our magnificent Chancellor, and I am happy to reject the ridiculous motion and to support the Government amendment.

5.52 pm

Mr. John Townend (East Yorkshire): With respect, some Labour Members need to learn that the Opposition's job is not to do the Government's job, but to hold the Government to account. I shall try to do the latter in my contribution.

This is supposed to be a green Budget. Incredibly, in yesterday's statement and in today's debate, Labour Members have hardly mentioned the word "taxation". Yesterday, I tried to intervene on the Chancellor. I now ask the question that I would have asked him, and I hope that, in her reply, the Economic Secretary to the Treasury will answer me. My question is, do the Government expect that, in this Parliament, the total burden of taxation—national and local—will rise or fall as a percentage of our national wealth? It is a simple question; I should like an answer.

Yesterday, as I listened to the Chancellor's statement, I was struck by his self-satisfaction, and his complacency and gross optimism made me think that he was living in cloud cuckoo land. He was self-satisfied about the condition of the public finances, and proudly boasted that this year the budget would be £5.5 billion in surplus.

Hon. Members who have been in the House for a long time know that I always welcome a surplus. However, the Chancellor did not say who has paid for that surplus. First, it has been paid for by tomorrow's pensioners, who have seen the Government rape their pensions by no less than £5 billion—not in one year, but every year. Secondly, it has been paid for by the motorists, who have suffered the biggest increase in fuel tax in living memory, yielding the Government an extra £2 billion a year. For the first time in my life, it is possible, on the way home from the continent, to fill up in Calais more cheaply than in this country.

Obviously, we have an anti-motorist Government, who are hitting people who live in rural constituencies such as mine, who need a car to get their children to school and to get themselves to work.

Mr. Gardiner: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that it was stated in the previous Government's Budgets—their plans were laid out for all to see—that fuel tax would increase each year? Does he accept that, in the first year of the Labour Government, we are keeping exactly in line with those plans, so the increase was as projected by the Conservative party?

Mr. Townend: That is not correct. The Government have inflated the increase by far more than we would have done.

I readily accept that the previous Government made a mistake in putting up tax to that level—falling for the greens—but the present Government have put it up by 6 per cent. more than inflation. If that process continues for five years, there will be a horrendous increase of 30 per cent. more than inflation.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: My hon. Friend has given the House the correct figures. The Government have increased the fuel tax inflator by 6 per cent. over and above inflation, and value added tax is imposed on top. That means that his and my constituents, in rural areas, will face a staggering 35p a gallon increase in April 1999. Does he believe that his constituents will be disadvantaged by that?

Mr. Townend: I do, and I assure my hon. Friend that I shall urge the Conservative Front-Bench team and the Leader of the Opposition not to go into the next election as an anti-motorist party. I should like us to give a commitment not to increase the price of petrol by more than inflation. That, of course, is a personal opinion.

I shall now talk about complacency. The Chancellor is still fighting the last battle—the battle against inflation—whereas the battle that threatens us in the months ahead is the battle against deflation. As was correctly pointed out yesterday, Japan, the second largest economy in the world, is suffering from deep deflation. Despite an interest rate of 0.25 per cent., its economy is shrinking rapidly, with no sign of recovery. Russia is broke, and the German banks will have a large write-off of their Russian debts. Latin America is teetering on the edge of a financial crisis. Those events, and the problems of some of the American hedge funds, have severely weakened and damaged the world banking system, to an extent as yet unknown.

However, I believe that, in the United Kingdom, despite the Chancellor's optimism about growth next year, we face recession. Agriculture is in deep trouble. Farm incomes are collapsing. Bankruptcies are increasing. Regrettably, because of their Euro-fanaticism, the Government are taking no meaningful action to tackle that problem. As a result, in the beef and pig sectors, British farmers do not have a level playing field with the continent.

Mr. Love: According to Budget projections, growth should be about 1 per cent. next year, increasing to 2.5 or 2.75 per cent. in succeeding years. Is not the hon. Gentleman's talk of recession actually talking Britain down?

Mr. Townend: Certainly not. It would be pointless for me, a representative of a rural constituency, to pretend in the House that everything in the garden was lovely in respect of agriculture. I should not be doing my job if I did that. I am not a professional politician like many people here. I entered politics as a business man because I believed in things. It has always been my practice in the House to say what I think—even if my comments are not always approved by my own party—and I do not think that the hon. Member for Edmonton (Mr. Love) is right.

I should be very surprised if the hon. Member denied that manufacturing industry has for months been suffering because of the high pound and high interest rates. Now, service industries are weakening, and each week brings more announcements of job losses in banks and City financial institutions.

I am very proud to be one of that small and—I should like to think—distinguished hon. Members who have run and owned a small business. I am therefore able confidently to tell Ministers, "I know what is going on out there." I can also tell the Chancellor that, in the past six weeks, in the north of England—not only in manufacturing, but increasingly in service industries—small businesses are suffering from the downturn and from declining profitability.

I know that the Chancellor will say, "I'm not to blame." Labour Members have already said, "We're not to blame—it's the world economy." What rubbish—[Interruption.] Labour Members laugh, but do they deny that small businesses' profits are falling largely because of the rising costs of implementing Government legislation? The Chancellor should be more honest and accept his share of the responsibility.

Does the Economic Secretary to the Treasury really know the cost to small business of implementing the working time directive? The directive is having a serious effect on the hotel and hospitality industry in my constituency. It is also undermining the split-shift system that is vital to the industry. Furthermore, individual proprietors, small business men, are having to keep far more detailed records—do far more paperwork—to satisfy the horde of Government inspectors who will enforce the regulations.

Does the Economic Secretary realise that the cost of the minimum wage to small business is not only the cost of merely raising workers' wages to the minimum wage, but the cost of raising the remuneration of those earning more than the minimum wage, to retain differentials?

Mr. Bercow: Does my hon. Friend agree that Ministers are guilty not only of arrogance but of ignorance? Last week, on the Floor of the House, the Chief Secretary, and this morning, in Select Committee, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry were both utterly ignorant of the report recently produced by the distinguished firm of accountants, Chantrey Vellacott. It showed that the rise in regulatory burdens in the first two years of this Labour Government will be no less than 17.3 per cent. Is not their ignorance of that dramatic impost on British business a worrying portent for the future?

Mr. Townend: My hon. Friend is right. Furthermore, do not Ministers show their hypocrisy when they talk about productivity and competitiveness? It is the Government who have been destroying the competitiveness of much our industry.

Does the Economic Secretary know the cost to small business of implementing the packaging waste regulations that came from Europe? Does she realise the cost to small business of implementing the new European parental leave regulations—which came to Britain as a consequence of accepting the social chapter? Does she realise how massively costs to small business have been increased because of fuel tax increases, particularly on DERV? Every small business is involved in the delivery and the receipt of goods.

Does the Economic Secretary appreciate the burden of high interest rates, which bear down disproportionately on small businesses, which suffer from one of the highest overdraft rates in Europe? The Chancellor says, "Don't blame me, guv—blame the Bank of England." The hon. Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) gets very excited and asks whether Conservative Members would take away the Bank's independence. That question will probably be irrelevant because, if the Chancellor has his way, the Bank of England will have no independence, its functions having been transferred to Europe. We should certainly like to take away the independence of the European central bank and maintain our own independence.

Interest rates are the Chancellor's responsibility. He was the one who gave away the right that he and his officials had to fix the Bank rate. He must have done that because he did not think that he and Treasury advisers were capable of fixing interest rates at a level that was appropriate for the efficient running of the United Kingdom economy. Alternatively, perhaps he gave away the power because he did not think that he would be able to resist the political pressure applied by his spendthrift colleagues.

When we talk about lowering interest rates and reducing inflation, Labour Members should realise that—as my hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) said—there are two sides to the equation: whereas a tighter fiscal policy allows lower interest rates in ensuring economic efficiency, a lax fiscal policy and high expenditure necessitate higher interest rates. Yesterday's green Budget proposed some small measures that will help. However, compared with the burdens on small business that the Government have imposed since they have been in power, those measures are chickenfeed.

I should like specifically to deal with tax incentives enabling employees of large companies to buy shares in the companies in which they work. Although I welcome such incentives, they distort the investment situation to the detriment of those who work in small businesses and are unable to buy shares, because the businesses in which they are work are either sole traders, partnerships or family-owned companies in which the family is not prepare to allow equity to be held outside a small family circle. If the Chancellor really wants to encourage saving and investment, he should give equivalent tax allowances for stock market investment to people working in small businesses.

All the signs are that the Government will end up like every other socialist Government—as a Government of high spending, taxing and borrowing. For the sake of our country, I hope that I am wrong. However, I believe that the pre-Budget statement will come back in future years to haunt the Chancellor. Ultimately, it will be the British people who will pay for his complacency.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): What a difference a year makes. In last March's Budget statement, the Chancellor was predicting that the economy was growing at an unsustainable rate, and maintained that interest rates might have to rise five times. He predicted also that the Bank of England would be able to meet its inflation target by using only one narrow measure: raising interest rates. If the Government had not run such a tight fiscal policy, the Chancellor would be able to reduce interest rates, and our competitive exchange rate would be down much more than it is from the April 1998 level of DM3.1 to the pound.

Last March, the Chancellor predicted growth of 1.75 to 2.25 per cent. He now states:

My forecast for 1999 of 1 to 1½ per cent. growth in our economy will see Britain steering a stable course, even when one quarter of the world is in recession."—[Official Report, 3 November 1998; Vol. 318, c. 682.]

How can anyone accept the Chancellor's predictions when, only yesterday, he had to reduce so drastically his previous growth forecast? What growth rate will he forecast by the time we get to the real Budget, next March? I suspect that he will have to reduce his growth forecasts even further.

Britain's leading financial institutions are forecasting growth rates that are lower than those complacently forecast by the Chancellor. For example, Barclays bank predicts a growth rate of 0.8 per cent. next year; Goldman Sachs predicts a rate of 0.5 per cent; Morgan Stanley predicts a rate of 0.5 per cent; Warburg predicts 0.3 per cent; and JP Morgan predicts no growth whatever.

Regrettably, the Chancellor's forecast is complacently high. He is complacent about the amount of tax take that he will have next year and wants to spend more in real terms on the health service, on education and, above all, on social services. Indeed, next year the social services budget is likely to bust through the £100 billion mark for the first time ever.

Mr. Geraint Davies: What cuts would the hon. Gentleman make in health and education? Is he keen to cut funds for the disabled, children and pensioners? The shadow Chancellor would make no commitment to retain the state pension. What else would the Opposition cut?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: That is a stupid question. Labour are in government, and it will be found that over the economic cycle the Labour Government have spent money unsustainably. If the hon. Gentleman really wants to know how to save money, he should look at the £7 billion of fraudulent claims in the social security system. What about the £1 billion budget for health service computers, which do not even work properly and are unlikely to meet compliance targets by 2000? What about the £150 million wasted on reforming the GP fundholding system in the huge primary care groups, which will disadvantage my constituents? Savings can be found in plenty of areas of Government policy, if only Labour Members had the imagination to look for them.

Mr. Davies rose—

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I hope that the hon. Gentleman's next intervention will be a little more sensible than his last one.

Mr. Davies: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the previous Government had 18 years to make savings from the long list that he has just given, particularly from social security fraud, but that they failed to do so?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: We left the Government a golden economic legacy. Such a scenario, with growth exceeding inflation, has been achieved only twice since the war. That is the only way sustainably to increase Government expenditure commensurate with lower taxes.

I now wish to deal with the subject of keeping taxes down to their optimum level. We spent 18 years encouraging inward investment and were very successful at it. One year, we had a quarter of all Europe's inward investment from firms such as Siemens, Fujitsu and Lucky Gold, which all invested huge sums in this country. They are now so worried about our long-term economic future that they have decided that it is no longer viable to remain here. We shall lose jobs. The Government are far too complacent about the employment figures. No Labour Member has been able to say whether employment will be higher when Labour leaves office than it was when they took office. I fear for the jobs of my constituents and those of other hon. Members. Jobs will be lost over this economic cycle owing to the Government's economic mismanagement.

One has only to look at some of the measures, both economic and social, that the Government have implemented. One of the first was to join the European social chapter; emerging from that was the disastrous working time directive. They have instituted domestic measures, such as the minimum wage, which will damage employment. All those measures combined will lead to an unemployment rate that is common in Europe, but not yet common here.

[Mr. Clifton-Brown]

In Europe, the average unemployment rate is 10 per cent. and there are almost 20 million unemployed people. I never want to see this country with unemployment rates approaching that figure, but I fear that the Government's complacent economic policies will lead us in that direction.

Mr. Bercow: My hon. Friend is developing a powerful thesis. Does he share my shock that, this morning, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry described the estimated annual £200 million cost of the parental leave directive as "marginal" and merely a drop in the ocean? Is not that outrageous?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) resumes his speech, may I advise the House that only a short time remains for Back-Bench speeches? Constant interventions will remove the opportunity for some hon. Members to speak.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: I shall observe your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and try to be as succinct as possible.

My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The red tape that has been imposed on businesses, particularly small businesses, which has come from both this country and Brussels—

Mr. Ivan Henderson (Harwich): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Labour Members cannot hear, let alone understand; and if they cannot hear, they cannot understand.

I am worried that the Item Club predicts the loss of 500,000 jobs in this country. Some of the policies introduced by the Government seem to be leading us in that direction.

I wish to deal with fiscal policy. There have been five base rate increases since the Government came to power. Interest rates are now at an unsustainable 7 per cent., which is 2 to 3 per cent. above the European average. That imposes huge cost burdens on businesses, particularly small businesses. However, the most important factor is that millions of people are paying more for their mortgages each month than they need to. Interest rates could now be lower if the Government had not botched up matters. We should look towards more stable spending, and the Monetary Policy Committee must decide whether confidence will prevail in the world economy. If it does not, the problem will not be meeting inflation targets; it will be deflation.

The world economy is based on confidence. In Japan, confidence has disappeared from the system and the Japanese Government have had to take extraordinary measures to try to reflate the economy. Just last week, they gave each man and woman £160 each to spend in an attempt to boost the economy. If confidence starts to disappear from the American economy, we shall all be affected. As an old prophet said, if General Motors catches a cold, we all catch 'flu—or something like that. If the American people stop spending, we shall undoubtedly be hit.

I urge the Government to look seriously at the role of the Monetary Policy Committee. First, it needs to be given a much wider role, not just the single remit of hitting an inflation target set by the Government at 2.5 per cent. That could drive the country into even deeper recession. Secondly, the Government should look at the MPC's composition. Only one member of the committee has had real experience of business, so members do not understand the misery that they are imposing on small manufacturing businesses by not running a more realistic interest rate policy. An interest rate that is more in line with those in Europe would make this country more competitive.

I wish quickly to mention a number of other issues. A Cabinet Committee is looking into public expenditure. Will the Economic Secretary explain what would happen if a Government Department were to overspend its budget? We are told that some expenditure might be held back next year. Does that mean that if the Department of Social Security overspends, some people will not be paid their jobseeker's allowance next year?

The Government's economic policy has led the country into recession, and we shall go into deeper recession still. This afternoon, the Prime Minister could not make up his mind on one of the most important economic topics that the country has faced since the war—whether to join European monetary union. He could not tell us whether, in principle, we would join—[Interruption.] Labour Members laugh, but it is one of the most important questions that business men want to know. The Prime Minister would not and could not say because half his party is opposed to it, and half is in favour, and he does not know what economic conditions will be in place when we face the prospect of a referendum. Therefore, why cannot he tell us whether he is, in principle, in favour of joining if the economic conditions are right? I believe that that is what his policy is, but why cannot he tell the House in clear terms what it is?

This recession has been made in Downing street. We will get a deeper and deeper recession. Tax receipts will drop, unemployment will go up, and we can blame it fairly and squarely on the Chancellor's botched economic policy.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): When the House has debated the record and policies of Chancellors, it has debated the mix between monetary and fiscal policy: whether he is going for a tight monetary policy with a tight fiscal policy, or some other combination. Since the Government made the Bank of England independent, with the possibility of the euro down the track, our debates on the economy have changed. We welcome that, but what the House has not caught up with is the different ways in which fiscal policy can be actively used to affect the management of the economy.

One of our major criticisms of the Government is that they have not caught up with the dynamics of the changed decision-making process that they gave birth to. We feel that the Chancellor and Her Majesty's Treasury are not taking sufficient account of the effect of their fiscal policy on the interest rate decisions of the Bank of England.

So we have to start at the basics—analyse the way in which active fiscal policy can work. The Conservative Government, particularly in the Lawson era, said that active fiscal policy had no role in demand management. The new Government have rejected that ideology, but they have not made it clear how they envisage fiscal policy working in the short and medium terms.

The Government have set fiscal rules. They have set a framework for the long-term direction of fiscal policy, which we welcome, but they have not made clear how they envisage the role of fiscal policy in the short and medium terms. That is an important theoretical issue, with practical implications because of the independence of the Bank of England and the way in which fiscal policy, set in the short and medium terms, affects its decisions.

There are three ways in which fiscal policy helps in managing the economy. First, there is the aggregate effect—tightening or loosening fiscal policy can affect aggregate demand. Of course, there can be cyclical tightening or loosening, but there is also discretionary tightening or loosening. That is the decision of the Chancellor: whether, on a discretionary basis, he wants to take money out of the economy, or put it in through tax and spending.

Secondly, the way in which fiscal policy is tightened or loosened can affect the economy—the decision between different taxes and different spending; between whom in the economy to hit with taxes and whom to relieve of taxes; the decision on whether to increase public sector pay of certain groups of workers. All those types of decisions—micro-elements of fiscal policy setting—have a macro-effect. It is in that sector that the Government have made some of their major mistakes.

There is a third way in which fiscal policy affects macro-economic management. That is the rhetoric that lies behind the setting of fiscal policy because it can affect expectations of consumers and business. We saw that in the Lawson boom period. His rhetoric after the 1988 Budget seemed to suggest that national debt would be paid off, and that there would be income tax cuts for ever more. That engendered a feeling of euphoria, so people in the private sector borrowed loads of money and spent, spent, spent. Nigel Lawson's rhetoric fuelled the economic boom.

Similarly, the rhetoric of today's Chancellor is important in relation to the decisions that private sector agents take. Of course, with the independence of the central bank, the Chancellor's rhetoric is also important in relation to the Bank's decisions.

I am glad that the House has allowed me to explain the process in which fiscal policy affects economic management. When we look at fiscal policy from its theoretical basics, we can understand where the Government have made their mistakes in their first 18 months in office.

Our contention is that the Government got the fiscal policy judgment wrong in the July Budget of 1997. The Chancellor said in the House that the economy was unbalanced, manufacturing was slowing and consumers were still spending at quite fast rates, but the fiscal policy that he then proposed did not match that analysis. He failed to take the heat out of the booming sector—the consumer sector—but ladled taxes on to the sector in decline: the manufacturing sector.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, if the remit to the Monetary Policy Committee had been wider than merely trying to meet an inflation target—for example, if things such as growth and unemployment had been built into the remit—we would have had a more realistic fiscal policy last year?

Mr. Davey: I cannot agree with the hon. Gentleman. I do not think that there is a connection. It was his party that signed the Maastricht treaty, whose mandate for the European central bank was similar to that introduced by the United Kingdom Government, but my point is that the fiscal policy that was set in the July 1997 Budget was wrong.

In yesterday's pre-Budget report, the Chancellor set out the fact that fiscal policy was tightened on a discretionary basis.That is clear because the Government increased taxes on industry and savings and squeezed public spending in their first two years—there was a discretionary tightening of fiscal policy. However, they failed to apply the tightening of the fiscal policy correctly. They tightened it not on those people who were spending, but on those who needed help. That is why manufacturing has been hit so badly—because of the Chancellor's mistaken judgment on where the tightening should take place in the economy.

The rhetoric was wrong. It gave all the wrong signals. Consumers were not told that their actions—the way in which spending was still taking off—were damaging economic prospects. The euphoria of the election victory or the fact that the Government's hands were tied after their fairly irresponsible election promises never to use personal taxation to govern the economy may have been the Government's excuse; but if they are really serious about managing the economy for the long term, and we have heard how many times the Chancellor uses that phrase in the House, they should be prepared to take difficult decisions, tough decisions, on personal taxation when they are necessary.

The evidence that the markets felt that the Government had got their fiscal stance wrong in July 1997 was shown almost immediately after that Budget because there was a rise in the pound. The expectation was that, because of the Chancellor's fiscal decisions, interest rates would have to rise—and indeed they did.

The point of that analysis is to show that this downturn, the recession in manufacturing, has been directly caused by the Chancellor. It is, to use the soundbite that is so popular among Conservative Members, a recession made in Downing street. By using fiscal policy properly, we can affect our country's economic future, even though the Bank of England is in charge of interest rates.

Mr. Gardiner: I have listened with great care to what the hon. Gentleman has said about fiscal policy and tight fiscal policy. Does he recall his remarks on 10 July last year? He urged the House to face up to the need for higher interest rates. He blamed the Conservatives for their reluctance to raise them at the correct time, but also blamed the Government.

What did the hon. Gentleman blame the Government for? He blamed the Government for their too tight fiscal policy, yet at the same time he opposed the £5.2 billion tightening of fiscal policy, which was the windfall tax, and the £5 billion tightening of fiscal policy, which was the abolition of the advance corporation tax credit.

[Mr. Gardiner]

He should remember his remarks, made in this Chamber not so long ago, when he lectures the Government about fiscal tightening.

Mr. Davey: The hon. Gentleman quotes me out of context. In that full speech, I made it clear that it was the way in which the Government were tightening fiscal policy—the fact that they were loading taxes on the business sector—that was the problem. In our alternative Budget, we proposed clearly where taxes should go up, so it was not tightening of fiscal policy that we were running away from. We were criticising the Government for the fact that they were making the wrong fiscal policy judgments.

It is now time the Government looked at the way in which fiscal policy can be used to support the economy in the short and medium terms. They have had many reviews to do with fiscal policy and launched many papers about how it should be set for the long term; but with an independent central bank and with monetary union a not too distant prospect—I hope—the Government need to revisit fiscal policy theory and decide whether they are prepared to use fiscal policy actively to promote the interests of this country.

6.29 pm

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): The House cannot take too seriously speeches calling for taxation to be used as a means of fine-tuning the economy. Those policies are understandable from the Liberal Democrats, because we know that they want to give up control of monetary policy to the European central bank in Frankfurt, which would leave us with only fiscal policy to regulate or control the economy, but we cannot take them seriously because they never say what they are calling for. What taxes do they want to increase, and what taxes do they want to reduce, now or in the future? Their policy is confused and confusing.

Mr. Edward Davey: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman has made his contribution.

No economist seriously suggests that tax changes can be used to regulate the economy. They are too blunt and slow-acting in their effects. That is why it is generally accepted that interest rates must be used from time to time. It is a matter of regret that the Liberal Democrats want to give up that domestic instrument to a bank based in Frankfurt, whose interest rate changes would only by coincidence have anything to do with the domestic requirements of the British economy.

Mr. Davey: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As I have referred to the hon. Gentleman, I shall give way.

Mr. Davey: The right hon. Gentleman incorrectly says that we have not stated our fiscal policy proposals. If he is so concerned about Opposition parties stating their policies, will he tell the House the Conservative party's policy on the independent central bank?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman has a short memory. I do not remember whether he was a member of the Standing Committee that considered the Bank of England Bill. I think he was, in which case he will have heard us at length and repeatedly setting out our objections to the Bill. It was the wrong policy brought forward for the wrong reasons at the wrong time, in defiance of an election promise to the contrary. That is why we opposed the Bill. By the way, the legislation has not resulted in an independent Bank of England. If that is what the hon. Gentleman was after, he has not got it. All our criticisms and observations about that mistaken policy have turned out to be tragically justified and true.

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Later, possibly, but I am aware of the shortness of time.

I want to place on record our disappointment that the Chancellor, who had an opportunity in the debate to defend and explain the figures in his pre-Budget report, instead engaged in irrelevant bluster and obfuscation that left no one any better informed about the implications of his policies for the British economy.

We may be witnessing an unfolding tragedy, because the Government are defying almost all independent observers and commentators in their growth forecasts. Instead of recognising the severity of the growth decline that the British economy faces, the Chancellor has gone, almost isolated, for a little dip next year and then an extraordinary acceleration in subsequent years, way above what he forecast only four months ago. No explanation was given for this sudden spurt—a sort of millennium boost for the British economy that we are told will manifest itself in 2000 and thereafter.

In addition, the pre-Budget statement contains a £9 billion increase in public expenditure over the next three years, set out on page 121. Meanwhile, on page 120, the Government are assuming that unemployment will remain flat at its September level. No one can believe that that is a realistic or prudent assumption. Then the Chancellor tells us that his new annual borrowing requirement—what used to be called the public sector borrowing requirement before all the definitions were changed—will be less than he predicted only four months ago.

The truth, as has been widely said in the press, is that we are faced with fantasy economics. That discredits the Chancellor's announced policy for everyone else in the G7 of increased transparency and rigour in the publication of national accounts. If he continues to defy what the rest of the world knows about the real economy, he will undermine confidence in public policy.

I should like to re-engage the Chancellor for a moment with the real world of job losses and increased job insecurity. The small print of the pre-Budget document contains some evidence of a severe manufacturing downturn. Page 109 records, almost in passing, that manufacturing output next year may fall by 0.25 per cent. The Chancellor did not refer to that in his statement, but it is in the small print. The same page contains the frightening fact that by far the fastest-growing items of national accounts are imports, which are increasing by 7.25 per cent. this year. The balance of payments will weaken by between £7 billion and £9 billion every year. That is the real economy.

I recognise and forgive the fact that no Treasury Ministers have any experience of running, or even working in, a business. Perhaps the only exception is the Paymaster General, who sadly attends none of our debates these days. He certainly has experience of dealing in a number of companies, but no one in the Government, from what I can tell, has ever worked in or run a business of any size, as my hon. Friend the Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) pointed out.

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) referred to the distinguished and honourable club of those in the House who have experience of running a business. I count myself among the members of that club. I particularly recall the time under the previous Government when the exchange rate stood at $1.95. Trying to run a business with such a high exchange rate was very difficult.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I did not know that the hon. Gentleman had made it to the Front Bench. I was simply pointing out that no one in the Government had any experience of running a business. If the hon. Gentleman has such expertise, I wish that he had a little more influence.

I wish that the Government would at least listen to business men. Ministers may have no direct experience, but that does not mean that they cannot listen. We have heard nothing for businesses of any size from the Chancellor. He merely crows about his one great achievement, which was getting inflation down to his target of 2.5 per cent.

Some unkind people might observe that that had a great deal more to do with the downturn in the world economy and the strong pound leading to cheaper imports than anything that the Chancellor has done, but let us be generous and concede that the Chancellor has achieved the goal of getting inflation down to the level that he inherited. In the last month of the previous Parliament, we achieved our inflation target of 2.5 per cent. or less. Inflation then went up under the new Government, and the Chancellor has now at last got it back down to our level.

If that is such a triumph for the Chancellor's management of the economy, why does he not take similar responsibility for everything that has gone wrong? At that point he falters, and suddenly the problems have nothing to do with him, but are all the fault of the global slowdown. As many of my hon. Friends have pointed out, that does not explain why the slowdown in the global economy has affected this country almost uniquely. We are by far the worst affected, except for Japan, where different considerations apply.

The reason is not a mystery. It is a result of the policy errors of two Budgets over the past 17 months. There were 17 tax rises in the first Budget. There has been an ill-judged attack on savings, too. The two most successful savings vehicles of all time—TESSAs and PEPs—were abolished and supposedly replaced by the wholly untried individual savings accounts, details of which are still unclear. There was the notorious £5 billion-a-year raid on pension funds. At the same time, the Chancellor was exhorting everyone to save more. That was exactly what the British economy did not want. That is why we are facing a downturn and a drop in growth that is far worse than any of our continental and overseas competitors—bar Japan.

Mr. Caplin: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I will not; I have several other points to make in answering those already made.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) pointed out the mismatch between Treasury policies on taxation and expenditure, and Bank of England monetary policies, which are pulling in the opposite direction. To try to compensate for policy errors, the wretched Monetary Policy Committee has had to set interest rates way above what was otherwise required. That has helped to drive the economy to the brink of recession.

The Government's fourth policy error is the huge extra regulatory burden that has been dropped on British industry. The Chancellor has suddenly discovered a productivity gap—he mentioned it again in his speech earlier—yet he has done more than anyone to widen it. He tried to widen it when he was in opposition, by voting day after day, year after year, with all his hon. Friends, against all the trade union reforms, industrial reforms and privatisation measures that transformed the productive potential and productivity of the British economy.

Now that he is in office, the right hon. Gentleman is widening the productivity gap by imposing a £39 billion burden on business in this Parliament through extra taxes and extra business regulation. All those figures are from the Government. Departments have calculated in compliance-cost assessments the additional burden on British business men who face international competition.

Businesses do not want fantasy economics or lectures about their lack of productivity from the Chancellor; they want the measures to be reversed. They do not want gimmicky trivia about what the Government may do to tackle the problem in consultation in the years ahead; they want to be relieved of the £39 billion burden of extra regulation. They do not want another energy tax that is dreamed up by a consultative committee on the environment, consultation about a new banking committee, or another inquiry into the venture capital industry. They are not interested in the drawing up of what the Chancellor calls public service agreements—especially because they know that, for this Government, consultation means the Government talking to representatives of a few big businesses in London and totally ignoring the real concerns and requirements of business men in our constituencies.

Nor do business men like the misleading way in which the Chancellor pretended in his speech that employers will not pay national insurance contributions on earnings below £83 a week. Incidentally, that is a recycled policy. The Chancellor did not tell the other side of the story: businesses' national insurance contributions will rise in April from 10 to 12.2 per cent. That is the bad news; that is what will cost jobs. The Chancellor is entirely silent on that. That is why businesses do not trust the Government. They are not a business-friendly Government, because they speak only in half-truths.

The Chancellor is paying the price of 17 months and two Budgets of policy mistakes and financial blunders. The tragedy is that the rest of the country—businesses, savers and unemployed people—will shortly be paying the price. In winding up, will the Economic Secretary confirm that, even at this late stage, the Government will, in all modesty, propose a package of reforms to restore and revive the economy, rather than simply presiding over its decline?

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): This debate on the economy was called by the Conservatives, and how revealing it has been. It certainly revealed in the first half hour that the Conservative party will shortly have to find another shadow Chancellor.

The Conservatives have made it very clear today that they are saying no to Bank of England independence, no to £40 billion extra spending on health and education, no to the minimum wage, no to the new deal for unemployed people, no to the working families tax credit, which will make work pay, no to parental leave, no to fair standards for working people, and no to the single currency—even if it is best for British people and their jobs. Most revealingly, we heard from the shadow Chancellor that the Conservatives are even saying no to protecting the basic pension against inflation.

Mr. Maude: The hon. Lady knows perfectly well that that is untrue. Our position remains exactly the same; we remain committed to the basic state pension, as we always have been. Are the Government committed to maintaining the basic state pension without means testing—yes or no?

Ms Hewitt: We made plain in the manifesto our commitment to the basic state pension as the foundation for security in old age. The right hon. Gentleman has refused to say, just as he did in his opening speech, whether the Conservative party is still committed—as we are—to raising the basic state pension in line with inflation.

Mr. Maude rose—

Hon. Members: Give way.

Ms Hewitt: No, the right hon. Gentleman will not answer the question.

Mr. Maude: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Economic Secretary has directly misquoted me, and is refusing to give way in order to allow me to set the record straight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Whether hon. Members give way is entirely a matter for them.

Ms Hewitt rose—

Mr. Maude: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms Hewitt indicated assent.

Mr. Maude: I should make it clear, in case the hon. Lady does not understand, that our commitment to the basic state pension and to raising it in line with inflation remains exactly as it always has been. She knows that perfectly well. Is her party committed to maintaining the basic state pension without means testing?

Ms Hewitt: It was in our manifesto, as I said, and as the right hon. Gentleman knows. I am delighted that, after giving the shadow Chancellor three opportunities to answer during his opening speech, we have finally heard a reply on the question of inflation.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Grantham and Stamford) rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is clearly not giving way at the moment.

Ms Hewitt: The next question for the Conservative party is where it would cut public spending. It is against our public spending.

Mr. Davies rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have just told the hon. Gentleman that the Economic Secretary has no intention of giving way at the moment. He should therefore resume his seat.

Ms Hewitt: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Conservative party has now said that it would not wish to cut public spending by breaking the link between pensions and prices. I welcome that, but the shadow Chancellor has said that our public spending commitments on health and education are madness, and one of his colleagues described them as profligate.

Where would the Conservatives cut public spending? They have revealed this evening that they are against the additional public spending on health and education. The Conservative party is saying no to British business and no to the British people; no wonder British business and the British people are saying no to the Conservative party.

Then we heard from the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce). What a difference there was between his constructive opposition and the shambles of the official Opposition. The hon. Member for Gordon, like the Chancellor and all my other right hon. and hon. Friends, supports the British economy, and will not talk it down as so many hon. Members have done this afternoon.

The hon. Gentleman asked a specific question about the excellent report by Lord Marshall, a former president of the Confederation of British Industry, about business use of energy—the report that has just been denounced by the Conservatives. The question for the hon. Member for Gordon is whether he is in favour of an immediate energy tax on business or whether, like us, he thinks it sensible to consult on the complex technical issues that Marshall raises, before we make a final decision on the recommendations of that interesting and helpful report.

Mr. Edward Davey: Are the Government in favour of an energy tax in principle?

Ms Hewitt: As the Chancellor said yesterday, we welcome the Marshall report. It is a constructive contribution to the debate, and we want to consult further on the technical and design issues it raises before making any decision on its recommendations.

My hon. Friend the Member for Shipley (Mr. Leslie) made another of his immensely enjoyable and well-informed contributions. They are becoming one of the most entertaining and welcome features of the economic debates in the House. I welcome the fact that he explained that it is the Conservative party that is talking down the British economy.

Mr. Lansley: As the Minister is keen on the Labour manifesto, will she explain why it said:

"An explicit objective of a Labour government will be to raise the trend rate of growth"?

All that has happened since the election is that the Government have reduced their estimate of the trend rate of growth, and they are now predicting that they will consistently under-perform it in this Parliament.

Ms Hewitt: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will therefore support the measures that we are taking to raise productivity in the British economy and put the macro-economic framework and public finances on to a sound basis. That is how we will raise long-term growth.

The hon. Member for West Worcestershire (Sir M. Spicer) complained about the Chancellor's revised economic forecasts. Perhaps I should remind him that the International Monetary Fund forecasts 1.2 per cent. growth for the United Kingdom economy next year, the European Commission forecasts 1.3 per cent. growth next year and 2.1 per cent. growth for 2000, and the National Institute of Economic and Social Research forecasts 1.1 per cent. growth next year, 2.2 per cent. for 2000 and 2.6 per cent. for 2001.

The Government's forecasts announced yesterday are revised, of course, to take account of what is going on in the world economy.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford) rose—

Hon. Members: He has not been here.

Mr. St. Aubyn: I attended the opening speeches, and I should like the Minister to explain whether she would like the Bank of England tomorrow to concentrate on her Government's great forecasts for next year and deliver only a small cut in interest rates, or to concentrate on the average of the growth forecasts, which are much lower, and deliver a bigger cut in interest rates?

Ms Hewitt: I realise that the hon. Gentleman has not been present for most of the debate, but perhaps he would like to tell us where he stands on independence for the Bank of England. We have given the Bank of England the responsibility to take the tough decisions that are needed to keep inflation under control, and we will back it in the decisions it makes.

To return to the hon. Member for West Worcestershire, what he did not tell the House is that, since the general election, there has been a 15 per cent. drop in unemployment in his constituency. We all welcome that, and I hope that he does too.

My hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Davies)—

Sir Michael Spicer: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Hewitt: No.

My hon. Friend made a thoughtful and well-informed speech, in which he rightly paid tribute to the Chancellor for his work and his role in bringing together the G7 countries in agreement on the steps urgently needed to stabilise the world economy. What a pity that neither on Monday nor this evening could the Conservatives bring themselves to welcome that statement, which was agreed with Governments of the right as well as of the left and centre. They lack the generosity to congratulate my right hon. Friend on his work in bringing that about.

The hon. Member for East Yorkshire (Mr. Townend) talked about rural restoring—an extremely important issue. However, he did not tell us that, as the Chancellor announced in the Budget, the Government are putting £50 million into rural transport funding, are freezing vehicle excise duty, and will cut that duty by £50 for the least polluting cars. He also failed to tell the House that there has been a 20 per cent. drop in unemployment in his constituency since the election.

Mr. Townend rose—

Ms Hewitt: I am afraid that I cannot give way; I am conscious of the time. I have taken enough interventions, and I must make progress.

The hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown), in a rather excitable contribution, seemed to suggest, although the shadow Chancellor takes a different line, that he does not want the inflation-proofing of the basic pension that is part of our social security budget for next year.

Mr. Clifton-Brown rose—

Ms Hewitt: Let me ask the hon. Gentleman one more question first. Does he want to see the minimum income guarantee for pensioners to which we are committed, which we have introduced and which is in the social security budget for next year? Does he want to see the increase in child benefit that is also in the social security budget for next year?

Mr. Clifton-Brown: Will the Minister now tell the House clearly whether her party is committed to means-testing the basic state pension, and whether she intends to tax child benefit?

Ms Hewitt: It is high time that the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues read our manifesto; we made the position absolutely clear.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will the Minister give way?

Ms Hewitt: No; I have answered the question.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not know whether you are aware of the fact, but the hon. Lady does not appear to be in command of her brief. Every time one of my hon. Friends puts a question to her, she merely repeats the answer already given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Is it proper that she—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is clearly not a matter for the Chair.

Ms Hewitt: I am afraid, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that it is the Conservative party that is not in command of itself in the House.

Of course, the hon. Member for Cotswold failed to mention that unemployment in his constituency has fallen by 29 per cent. since the general election.

Mr. Clifton-Brown rose—

Ms Hewitt: No.

The hon. Member for Kingston and Surbiton (Mr. Davey)—

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The hon. Lady, rightly, keeps mentioning the fact that unemployment has fallen in all those constituencies. We all welcome that, but she sounds as if the Government are taking the credit for it. They inherited a situation in which unemployment had been falling for years, but since her Government have been in power, the rate at which it has been falling has been slowing all the time. The reason for the debate is that unemployment will go up next year—sharply in the north and the midlands, and probably in my hon. Friends' southern seats as well. Does she intend to say a word about monetary or fiscal policy to explain why the Government's policies have produced a reverse in this country's jobs market?

Ms Hewitt: Not even the right hon. and learned Gentleman can rescue the Conservative party—there are 400,000 more people in employment since the general election, and more people in employment than ever before. We have tackled the inflationary pressures, and cut the £28 billion deficit which we inherited from the previous Government, we have reduced unemployment, and we are now tackling the productivity gap. We have made the tough decisions needed to end the boom and bust of the Conservative years and to achieve the macro-economic framework, the sound public finances and the investment in good public services that will enable the United Kingdom to steer the course of stability that we want and need in an increasingly unstable world.

I regret that the official Opposition are unable to recognise the mistakes they made, and unable to acknowledge the steps that we have taken. I commend our amendment to the House.

Question, That the proposed words be there added, put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments), and agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House notes that the Government inherited an economy set to repeat the same cycle of boom and bust seen over the past 20 years, that inflation was heading way above target because of the previous Government's failure to accept the Bank of England's advice and the public finances were in large structural deficit; recalls that under the previous Government inflation rose to 10 per cent, interest rates remained in double figures for four years and one million manufacturing jobs were lost, while net borrowing increased to £50 billion and the national debt doubled in just four years; notes that the previous Government's policies increased inequality and failed to tackle the structural weaknesses in the economy; commends this Government for its decisive action to build a stable economy, introducing a new framework for monetary policy under which inflation is now at target and set to remain there and interest rates are less than half their previous peak, reducing government borrowing by £20 billion last year and, because of prudent management of the public finances, remaining on track to meet its tough fiscal rules and invest an additional £40 billion in education and health, with an extra £250 million for the National Health Service this year, addressing structural weaknesses by tackling unemployment and poverty with the New Deals and tax and benefit reform, supporting British business by cutting corporation tax, doubling public investment to improve Britain's infrastructure and addressing Britain's productivity gap; and notes that there are now 400,000 more people in employment than at the General Election and that Britain is better placed to steer a course of stability in an uncertain and unstable world.

Agriculture

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): I have selected the amendment in the name of the Prime Minister. I must remind hon. Members that there will be a 10-minute limit on all Back-Bench speeches.

7.13 pm

Mr. Tim Yeo (South Suffolk): I beg to move,

That this House deplores the failure of the Government to respond to the deepening crisis in agriculture and to secure an end to the beef export ban; applauds the achievements of British farmers in raising animal welfare and environmental standards; recognises that a thriving rural economy depends on a viable agricultural industry and that this can be achieved by giving farmers a chance to compete on equal terms as summarised in the Opposition's call for a Fair Deal for Farmers; calls on the Government to renew or replace the Calf Processing Scheme, restore HLCAs to 1993 levels and take up agri-monetary compensation for the livestock sector financed by the underspends on the agriculture budget; urges action to establish honesty in labelling to help consumers make better informed choices, to encourage the purchase of home grown food by all public sector bodies and cut the burden of excessive regulation; calls for an immediate ban on the sale of food not produced to standards required in Britain; and condemns the hostility consistently displayed by Ministers to the country people in local government finance, transport and planning policy.

First, I must welcome the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the Dispatch Box. We are delighted that he has decided to take part in this debate. After all, it is his first chance to speak in a major agriculture debate since his appointment a little over three months ago.

Mr. Clive Betts (Lord Commissioner to the Treasury): It was the summer recess for most of that time.

Mr. Yeo: That is true, but it is also true that for the past three weeks the House has had to debate in Government time all sorts of non-urgent measures, one of which was inspired by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on Thursday, on the important but not urgent subject of quarantine. So, this is the Minister's first chance to speak in such a debate and we welcome him to it.

As the right hon. Gentleman knows, in those three months the problems that face farmers have got much worse. Pig farmers have been going bankrupt, sheep farmers have been forced to shoot their flocks, and beef farmers still await an end to the export ban, while dairy farmers and cereal growers are suffering from falling returns. It is no exaggeration to say that the industry is in crisis. At first, the Government seemed inclined to ignore that crisis or even to deny it. Now that they have been forced to admit its existence, they seem confused about what to do. We have called today's debate to give the Minister a chance to end that confusion. Last Thursday, he told the House:

"Farmers are looking not for a debate, but for answers."—[Official Report, 29 October 1998; Vol. 318, c. 484.]

If it were left to the Government, they would get neither.

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cotswold): Does my hon. Friend agree that what we want from the Government is a level playing field for agriculture? Does he also agree that, this year, about £310 million is available under the agrimonetary compensation scheme? Nine other Governments have applied for it and it is high time that ours did, as that would considerably benefit our farmers.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is right. Farmers are looking for a level playing field. He will be amazed to hear that I intend to refer to agrimonetary compensation later as it is mentioned in our motion.

Mr. Robert Jackson (Wantage): A decision is pending which will be important for agriculture, given that it is in crisis—the referral of Milk Marque to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Given the condition of the industry and all the uncertainties and difficulties in which it finds itself, does my hon. Friend agree that it would be undesirable for that decision to destabilise that important sector?

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is right. It is important that, where possible, we should strengthen the hand of dairy farmers. It would be damaging if the outcome of the inquiry weakened Milk Marque's position or that of other potential groupings in the dairy industry.

In opposition, we have the power to deliver a debate and we intend to use it this evening to tell the Minister the answers that he should be giving to farmers. Those answers are urgently needed because, this very evening, farmers are agonising over their future and need to make plans for the winter against a background of certainty, not doubt. Let no one underestimate the severity of the problem. As the Country Landowners Association said:

"For the first time in a century the depression in prices has extended across all agriculture."

Farmers Weekly has even published a leader warning of the risks of suicide among farmers. In 15 years of representing a farming constituency I cannot remember a bleaker period and right hon. and hon. Friends who have been in the House twice as long tell me that they cannot either. It is not merely farmers who are being destroyed; the entire rural economy has been hit. The fabric of our countryside is threatened—those parts of it which the Deputy Prime Minister has not covered in concrete through his damaging planning decisions.

Mr. Betts: Nonsense.

Mr. Yeo: The Deputy Prime Minister made a statement from the Dispatch Box in February that he would raise the target for the proportion of new homes built on previously developed sites and, since then, he has not allowed one county to revise its structure plan, so it is not nonsense; it is a fact and it is damaging green fields throughout the country. It is helpful of the Labour Whip to make it clear in a sedentary intervention that the Government do not care about the issue.

Today is the Minister's chance to stop the dithering and to show that the warm words that he has been dispensing so freely are backed up by action. We have heard his hints that help is on the way, so let us have the facts. If he has no more to say than the Minister of State said last week, he will provoke fears that, once again, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has been outgunned by the Treasury and that the Government's policy on farmers is limited to hoping that the problems will ease if the pound goes down.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): Why did the previous Government never pay agrimonetary compensation to farmers?

Mr. Yeo: If the hon. Lady took the trouble to meet any farmers, she would learn that the current crisis in agriculture is of a wholly different order from anything that was experienced under the Conservative Government.

If the Government's policy on farming is limited to hoping that the pound will go down, the Minister will find that he has more trouble to face. To help him, we set out in the motion what needs to be done. The Government must either renew or replace the calf processing scheme. I warmly welcome reports today of progress towards lifting the ban on beef exports, but, even if the ban is lifted soon, it will take time for British producers to regain their market share. To end the calf scheme without even having a firm date for lifting the ban would be rash, so I urge the Minister to continue such help, at a lower rate if necessary, but certainly for another year.

Hill farming is one of the most vulnerable sections of the industry. The National Farmers Union report, "Protecting Our Upland Heritage", pointed out that two out of three Welsh hill farmers had incomes of less than £190 a week last year. The Farmers Union of Wales predicts that, this year, incomes will fall by more than half. In Wales, many farmers are working for incomes well below the minimum wage. Not surprisingly, among the FUW's priorities is the need for an increase in hill livestock compensatory allowances.

Last week, the Minister of State referred to the Government's intention to consider changes to HLCAs in the context of Agenda 2000. He said that the Government planned to consult on options for a new scheme later this year. That is all very well, but what is happening now? The hill farming review is supposed to take account of current conditions; surely an immediate increase in HLCAs is justified in response to the current crisis. Perhaps the former Secretary of State for Wales let the cat out of the bag when he said that no money was available. Is the review nothing more than a sham?

Mr. Anthony Steen (Totnes): I am grateful for this opportunity to draw the attention of the House to hill farmers not only in Wales but in Devon and Somerset. Is my hon. Friend aware that the earnings of Dartmoor hill farmers—and we should not forget the lowland farmers—are as low as those of Welsh hill farmers? I hope that he will tell the Minister what he should be doing about that, as the Minister clearly has not got a clue about what he should be doing.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Everything I have said about Welsh hill farmers should be understood to apply to the equally urgent needs of hill farmers across the country.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): Why did the previous Government freeze HLCAs in 1992? I suspect that it was not because hill farmers were doing so well; then, as now, they were on the margins of viability. Why the sudden change?

Mr. Yeo: I thought that I had explained that the purpose of the review is to reflect the current situation.

[Mr. Yeo]

The previous Government took decisions in relation to the situation that faced hill farmers at the time. I am asking this Government to do the same. Given what the former Secretary of State for Wales said, however, we fear that their minds have been made up regardless of hill farmers' needs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) mentioned agrimonetary compensation. Given the crisis in the livestock sector, why have not the Government drawn down the full amount of compensation? I am advised that £48 million is available this year for the livestock sector. Although taking up that money would of course cut Britain's rebate from the European Union, it would still represent good value, as the actual cash help to farmers would considerably exceed the net cost to the taxpayer. If the Minister does not take up that money, will he explain why he wants British farmers to be at a disadvantage to those farmers in other European countries who utilise that help when they are eligible to do so?

On the issues that I have mentioned, let us have no more dithering. Today, let the Minister show that he cares as much as we do about the survival of Britain's farmers.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): Will the hon. Gentleman return to his shopping list and say what amounts of money he suggests should be set aside in this year's expenditure plans to pay for his proposals?

Mr. Yeo: The hon. Gentleman has obviously read the motion—I am about to come to that very point.

We have tried to make life easy for the Minister—[HON. MEMBERS: "Shame."] We must remember that the Minister is not his predecessor. I admit that that is not a demanding benchmark, but he deserves a fair chance. The motion points out that, this year and last year, there has been an underspend in the agriculture budget. In plain English, that means that the Labour Government decided to spend less on agriculture during their first two years in office than the outgoing Conservative Government would have done if they had been re-elected.

Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way; he has been extremely tolerant in taking a number of interventions, not least from Labour Members, who seem hellbent on referring to the past when they should be focusing on their responsibilities for the present, which are indeed onerous. Of course farmers faced difficulties under the Conservative Government, but those difficulties have now turned into crisis and depression. In my constituency, farmers—especially those in the pig industry—face particularly severe problems. Farm-gate prices have fallen by some 60 per cent. in the past two years. We look forward to hearing the Minister give a response that will, unlike those that he has given in the past, tell pig farmers what short-term help they will receive to prevent even more of them from going bust in the next few months.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is right. It is no exaggeration to say that agriculture is threatened by depression. He is also right to highlight the problems of pig farmers, which I shall deal with in a moment.

As I was saying, the Government have cut help to farmers—help that they would have received from a Conservative Government—just as the industry is sliding towards depression. The cost of the measures that I have proposed is significantly less than the underspend on the agriculture budget in the past two years.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (East Carmarthen and Dinefwr): Does the shadow Minister recognise that the Government's expenditure on agriculture is greater than that for the whole of the Department of Trade and Industry? There is one reason for that—the Conservative Government's legacy of BSE.

Mr. Yeo: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman is saying that the Government are spending too much on agriculture. If so, I have no doubt that the Minister will respond to his point.

In our fair deal for farmers campaign, we have also highlighted non-financial issues, such as the sale of imported food that has been produced under conditions that are not allowed in this country. I believe that many consumers would be shocked if they knew what was happening.

I take the example of pigs. British pig farmers have invested heavily to meet the higher animal welfare standards that the public rightly demand. That has made their costs higher than those of their European competitors. British pigs are no longer reared in stalls or on tethers and they are not fed on meat and bone meal, yet British bacon sits on the counter alongside bacon imported from countries where animal welfare standards are lower and restrictions on feeding are less tight, and consumers remain in the dark.

British pig farmers are suffering from unfair competition, and that situation should stop now.

Mr. Yeo: I am glad that I have carried the Minister on that point.

Mr. Paul Tyler (North Cornwall): As I asked the hon. Gentleman this question last week and he has had 10 days to think about it, I hope that he will be able to answer. If it is time for that unfair competition to stop now, why was it not the time for it to be stopped when it started? Under the previous Government, the pig sector was very hard hit by exactly the same problem. I constantly pressed Ministers to do something, but nothing was done. Why not?

Mr. Yeo: I deeply regret giving way to the hon. Gentleman, who made a very childish contribution at business questions last Thursday and who has displayed his extraordinary ignorance of the subject that he is trying to address. The pig sector is going through a major crisis: pig farmers are going bankrupt every week. That situation requires an urgent response and could not be more different from the highly profitable conditions that pig farmers enjoyed under the Conservative Government.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): Is my hon. Friend aware that, yesterday morning, my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Norfolk (Mrs. Shephard), my hon. Friend the Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Prior) and I attended a meeting in Norwich with a large number of pig farmers who made the point that, although there have been problems in the past, there has never been such a crisis in pig farming? They are not people who complain or whinge, and they are not subsidised—I know that the Minister will agree with that—but they are literally at the end of their tether. They want more than good words and an appearance by Ministers at a pig industry breakfast. They want the Government to take action and not simply to go through the motions of support.

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. His knowledge of and interest in the pig industry contrasts sharply with the ignorance displayed by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler). I hope that pig farmers in the west country will be aware of how little he knows about the subject.

A great deal of poultry is being imported from the far east. Avoparcin, a growth promoter which was banned in Europe two years ago, is still widely used in feeding poultry in the far east: another fact which, I suspect, is not widely known by consumers. The Opposition believe that the sale of food produced by methods not allowed here should be halted.

If good British beef can be banned from entering the rest of the European Union, the Government should be able to find a way of stopping the importation of illegal food. They could start by reading article 36 of the treaty of Rome, which is now article 30 of the treaty of Amsterdam, which allows restrictions on imports if they can be justified on the grounds of protecting the health and life of humans and animals. Will the Minister urgently investigate how such items can be prevented from coming into Britain, or does he prefer to let the British public remain in the dark and go on buying food the production of which has involved unlawful methods?

I was delighted by today's news that the supermarkets have agreed to make it clear to consumers which food is grown in Britain and which is merely processed here.

Mrs. Angela Browning (Tiverton and Honiton): My hon. Friend will recall that, in last Monday's debate, I and my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) asked why schools in Devon serve Irish rather than British beef. The following day, the chief executive and the Liberal Democrat leader of Devon county council explained to us and, I believe, to the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett), that no British company wanted the contract.

I did not believe that to be the truth, and I wrote to the council leader immediately asking him to print the names of all those who had tendered for the contract. I have not received the names. I contacted him again today and he told me that he would write to me shortly. Is not that disgraceful from a council led by a party that says that we should support British farmers?

Mr. Yeo: My hon. Friend performed a valuable service for the House, for the voters of Devonshire and for food producers in the western region by exposing the Liberal party's duplicity. I am pleased that she is pursuing the matter and deeply shocked at the failure of the council concerned to give a straight answer to a straight question. The Liberal party has been shown up for what it is, preaching one thing but doing another.

It was unsatisfactory that food could be labelled as British when in fact it was sourced outside this country, and we have been calling for some time for the distinction to be made clear to consumers. I pay tribute to those involved in taking that important step forward and I hope that action will be immediate.

Steps must also be taken in the public sector. Some weeks ago, I wrote to the Home Secretary and to the Secretaries of State for Health, for Education and Employment and for Defence to ask whether they would issue guidance on food purchasing to prisons, hospitals and schools. To date, only one of those four Departments has even replied to my letter. That does not suggest that helping local farmers is a high priority for the Government.

The one Department that replied, the Department for Education and Employment, made it clear that it did not want to issue guidance on the matter, preferring to leave it to the local authorities: hardly encouraging, since most local authorities offer no guidance apart from a consistent hostility towards beef among Labour-controlled councils.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): All local authorities work under the competitive tendering regime. Which Government were responsible for introducing that?

Mr. Yeo: There are still ways in which councils could encourage local farmers. Sourcing food locally produces higher quality and better value for money, and I understand that the Government wanted that to be done under their best value programme for local councils.

As we have heard, not only Labour councils are letting down British farmers; the Liberal Democrats are at it as well. I hope that the Minister will accept that the public sector has many opportunities to buy locally produced food. Will he at least find out whether his Cabinet colleagues are willing to give a lead? Does he agree that their failure even to answer my letter after seven weeks suggests that they do not care much about the countryside?

It is just over five weeks since the Meat (Hygiene and Inspection) (Charges) Regulations 1998 came into force. They impose a heavy cost on abattoirs, and especially small ones, which are required to pay for the much more intensive supervision of their work that now takes place. The extra costs are a burden and tend to reduce the prices that they can afford to pay farmers for livestock. Will the Minister find out quickly how those costs are being met in other European Union countries? Does he recognise that the costs may be placing an unfair burden on Britain, putting businesses and farmers here at a disadvantage relative to the rest of the EU?

In our campaign for a fair deal for farmers, we are concerned about the Government's general attitude to the countryside. Farmers are already struggling and the morale of the whole rural community has been further weakened by the Government's hostility. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh dear."] That was an instructive reaction. Government Back Benchers, some of whom may even claim to represent rural seats, are trying to rubbish this point. Let me remind them that, last year, the Deputy Prime Minister cut by £100 million the cash that was given to rural councils, resulting in fewer services in rural areas. Will that cut be reversed when the cash help—the revenue support grant—for next year is announced in four weeks' time?

[Mr. Yeo]

Have the Labour Members who are trying to rubbish this point made any representations on behalf of their constituents? Will the Minister tell us whether he has made representations to the Deputy Prime Minister? Does he understand that the matter is important to the rural communities? Will he tell us this evening what he has been doing?

While the Minister is speaking to the Deputy Prime Minister, will he also tell him to drop the threat of a new law for a right to roam? Good progress is being made on increasing access to private land on a voluntary basis. Why will not the Government let that continue, without more threats?

We warmly welcome the progress that is being made towards lifting the beef ban. I wish the Minister well in his efforts to have it lifted at the Agriculture Council meeting later this month. Does he recognise that even if the ban is lifted, it will take some time before the markets are recovered? Will he confirm that the lifting of the ban will be partial, not total, and that it will still not be possible to export beef on the bone, and the export of pedigree cattle—the best of British breeding stock—will still not be able to resume?

When will the Minister see sense and accept our request for a lifting of the ban in Britain on beef on the bone? That ban was introduced by his predecessor last December. It damaged confidence in British beef just when the Government should have been trying to boost it. The ban was not justified then and is not justified now. Even a year ago, one of the options from the Spongiform Encephalopathy Advisory Committee, SEAC, was to publish the research and the risk assessment and to let consumers decide. Will he agree this evening to do that?

Agriculture is in crisis—a crisis that affects the entire rural community. Action is needed now. Any delay by the Minister amounts to fiddling while Rome burns. I have set out three financial measures, which could be paid for out of the underspend on the agricultural budget, and five other steps that would not cost the taxpayer a penny. Farmers in every corner of Britain are waiting for the Minister's reply. The best early Christmas present to them would be for him to accept the Conservative motion, which I commend to the House.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Nick Brown): I thank the hon. Member for South Suffolk (Mr. Yeo) for arranging the debate, and for the welcome that he has again given me to the Dispatch Box.

Leaving to one side all the political rhetoric and knockabout, and dealing just with the ideas that the hon. Gentleman advanced, it is clear that there is not as much between us as those observing these proceedings might think. Many of the ideas that he advanced are perfectly sensible and it is entirely reasonable for him to invite Government to consider them.

Nevertheless, I beg to move, To leave out from "House" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

"welcomes the Government's strong commitment to the United Kingdom farming industry and to the wider rural economy; recognises that the lifting of the beef export ban in Northern Ireland represents the first crucial step towards lifting the ban from all parts of the United Kingdom; welcomes the steps which the Government has taken since May 1997 to support the beef and sheep industry via EU agri-monetary compensation and relief from charges; acknowledges the steps taken specifically to help the sheep, pig and cereal sectors with targeted EU measures; and endorses the Government's intention to bring about a secure and viable future for United Kingdom farming by seeking a reformed Common Agricultural Policy, which is more economically rational, which reduces the bureaucratic burden on farmers, which enhances targeted support for the rural economy, which serves the consumer well and which contains fair and common rules to ensure that the United Kingdom's farming and food industries can exploit their competitive advantages in European and world markets." [Interruption.]

I see that Opposition Members are disappointed—they thought that I would simply accept the motion and we could all go home. Unfortunately, that is not possible. As they have arranged for the debate and taken the trouble to get me to the Dispatch Box, the least that I can do is to respond to the hon. Gentleman.

I acknowledge that agriculture is going through difficult times, and that the times are hardest for hill farmers and those more generally in the livestock sector. I acknowledge that times are difficult also for others in agriculture. There are a range of reasons for this, some sector-specific and some general. In some sectors, supply is out of balance with demand, not just in the United Kingdom, but in western Europe.

Against that background, I freely acknowledge that the terms of trade in the recent past have been difficult for British farmers. The collapse of important export markets in Russia and the far east has exacerbated the problem, as has the ban on the export of British beef, which has not only made life difficult for farmers, but led to loss of important markets. Over-optimistic assumptions about the scale of future demand were made in some farm sectors.

The industry's problems are exacerbated because all those factors, each of which would cause problems on its own, have come at the same time. Agricultural production is a cyclical industry. Its current difficulties are heightened because most sectors of the industry are suffering a downturn simultaneously.

Mr. Woodward: Will the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that farming is in recession? If so, does he propose to take immediate action to help farmers out of the recession?

Mr. Brown: I do not want to engage in a semantic debate about crisis, recession or difficulties. That would not help. If I were a farmer who was making an assessment about how to get through the present problems, and looking hard at what the Government could do to help, but acknowledging that ultimately I had to make my way in the marketplace, I would not want to go to see my bank manager, if I were asking for my loan facility to be extended, and hear the bank manager say that the Minister had just confirmed that farmers were going through a crisis.

One must respond proportionately and accept that the ultimate decisions will be made by individuals who are quite capable of taking charge of their own affairs in the marketplace. Government have a responsibility to be candid about the shape of the marketplace. That is particularly important in the agricultural sector, because the parameters are set to some extent artificially by the workings of the common agricultural policy.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Brown: I shall work round the Chamber, if that is acceptable to the House.

Sir Robert Smith (West Aberdeenshire and Kincardine): Does the Minister recognise that if a farmer goes to his bank manager and presents his books, the bank manager is likely to foreclose on the farmer unless he is aware that there is a general crisis. From my conversations with bank managers, it seems that their head offices are being helpful and telling bank managers that a 50 per cent. drop in the books is not unique to a particular farmer and represents not a failure on the part of that farmer, but the crisis facing the industry. It is important for farmers that bank managers understand that—

Mr. Brown: I have got the point. The banks follow these matters closely, for obvious reasons—it is their money that they are lending. I do not want to make matters worse for farmers through the use of inappropriate language. I want to deal with the situation in its proper terms and to advance remedies.

Mr. Robert Jackson: Does the Minister agree that one of the things that farmers can do to help themselves is to co-operate? Will he bear in mind the importance of agricultural co-operation when the Monopolies and Mergers Commission reference comes to him?

Mr. Brown: That is an important point. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not say too much specifically about Milk Marque, as it would not be proper for me to do so in the current circumstances. More generally, the hon. Gentleman's point is right. In my meetings with farmers, I have been urging them to come together collectively to make sure that the producer side can make a unified response to others in the marketplace who seem more powerful than they are, particularly the big retailers.

Mr. Cynog Dafis (Ceredigion): The Minister speaks of markets and of redressing the balance of power. During Welsh questions this afternoon, I raised a related matter. It is alleged that in abattoirs, of which a large share is owned by supermarkets, the grading of cattle is being carried out not always on the basis of objective criteria, but on the basis of the purchasing requirements of supermarkets at a particular time on a particular day, and that Meat and Livestock Commission officers doing the work of grading are obliged to participate in that. Is that not wrong? Does it not show that supermarkets are acquiring inordinate power in the abattoir system and the marketplace generally? Should not the Minister examine the matter carefully and always—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the Minister answers that question, I remind the House that Madam Speaker has put a limit of 10 minutes on Back-Bench speeches because this is a short debate. Interventions, especially long interventions, only take more time out of it.

Mr. Brown: I am not sure that hon. Members are not taking their 10 minutes out of my time as I slowly work my way round the Chamber. I shall make sure that the hon. Gentleman gets a full written response to his question, as I want to consult officials. On supermarket criteria generally, he is right. The supermarkets do lay down exacting standards, which they expect to be met. If he is suggesting that that is being done improperly, I do not believe that to be so, but I will check with officials and if it is so, it will be prevented. I want the marketplace to operate in a fair and transparent way. I shall take two more interventions, then I must make progress.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for giving way so generously. He has mentioned the marketplace four times in one sentence, rather as if he were a cross between Hayek and Milton Friedman. Does he understand that the marketplace in agriculture is imperfect? Our farmers want the right to compete on a level playing field, and there is no use his telling them to compete in a free market if no one else works to the same rules. They want the right sort of Government support so that they can compete effectively against foreign farmers.

Mr. Brown: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is preaching to the converted. As I have said already, the marketplace in agriculture is particularly distorted because of both the peculiar common agricultural policy regime and the actions that national Governments must take to fit that regime to current circumstances. Sometimes, those actions make matters worse rather than better. I follow the strand of the hon. Gentleman's thought, and I can assure him that I will do all I can to get sensible reform of the CAP. I hope that the World Trade Organisation round will bring further progress, and that enlargement of the European Union as we embrace the countries of the east will provide another liberalising element. In any event, world trade is liberalising, and there is no good reason why agriculture should be left out. I give way at last to the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman).

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for saving the best until last. He has talked about bank managers and farmers' financial problems. He has also commented on the basic causes of those problems. What would he say to my pig and poultry farmers who tell me that the value of the pound means that their products are less competitive than imported products, which are more attractive to shopkeepers? The cost of their overdrafts is also dictated by the Government's financial policies. What would the right hon. Gentleman urge the Chancellor to do about that?

Mr. Brown: I would not urge him to devalue the currency artificially, any more than I would urge him artificially to overvalue it. It is odd that the debate is being conducted this way round with Labour Members defending market assessments of the currency's value while Conservatives urge that we both disregard the fact that currency is a store of value and devalue it so that it can have a particular impact on one sector of the economy. I have acknowledged that the terms of trade have not helped agriculture in recent times, but those terms fluctuate, and that is at least part of the cause of the economic cycle in the industry. I cannot extrapolate from a specific problem a general policy on exchange rates. That would not be sensible, and the previous Government did not do it either.

Mr. Ben Bradshaw (Exeter): Does my right hon. Friend find it puzzling that while farmers representatives in the National Farmers Union and the Country Landowners Association share the Government's policy of joining the euro as soon as it is in our economic interests to do so, the Conservative party, which claims to be the farmer's friend, has ruled out joining for 10 years?

Mr. Brown: I do not find that puzzling. Some hon. Members may not know that in 1990 the current Leader of the Opposition also shared our policy. It seems that those who have brought their minds to bear on the matter see some merits in our policy.

Having taken a fair tranche of interventions, I shall return to my prepared response to the motion. I am willing to respond, but, before doing so, I was willing to listen, not just to my professional advisers and to farmers' representatives, with whom it is proper that I discuss these matters. I made an enormous effort to meet farmers themselves, and to ask them what they think the Government should do. They, of course, have told me. My approach to the current situation will be based on the representations made to me by farmers themselves.

Strategically I have three tasks: responding to the present situation; engaging farmers in the Agenda 2000 CAP reform package; and carrying the whole sector—farmers, retailers and middlemen alike—together through the changes and restructuring currently taking place, including the challenges presented by a new round of negotiations in the WTO and by EU enlargement, to move us into the more liberal agricultural markets of the next millennium.

Let me say something more about the present situation. The Government have already taken a series of steps to help UK agriculture. My predecessor paid £85 million in agrimonetary compensation to UK suckler cow and sheep producers early in 1998. He ensured that the Government met the costs in 1998-99 of Meat Hygiene Service enforcement of controls on specified risk material from cattle and sheep, which had a value to the industry of £35 million. He ensured that the Government met the start-up and first year running costs of the new cattle tracing system, which had a value to the industry—beef and dairy producers alike—of a further £35 million. Traceability is here to stay. It is fundamental to the operation of a modern industry and the Government cannot and will not go back from it.

Mr. Tyler: Is not it a little perverse to suggest that those sums were in some way to the benefit of the industry when they were in fact compensation for the incompetence of the previous Government? Those were not hand outs to the industry, but compensation for the damage done to it. Will the Minister comment on the information being put before the Phillips inquiry into BSE by civil servants and former civil servants? That makes it quite clear that former Ministers connived with deception as to what should and should not be put into the public domain, and that they were extremely complacent about the consequences of doing so. Will the Minister ensure that the inquiry hears evidence—

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to anticipate a public inquiry that has not yet reached any conclusion?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that the hon. Gentleman was referring to evidence that might be before the inquiry rather than anything else.

Mr. Brown: The inquiry will report to me and to the Secretary of State for Health. I do not want to say anything to jeopardise it or pre-empt it.

On the narrower point made by the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) about industry charges, I am not sure that I agree. The charges were necessary for the industry. Traceability is certainly necessary if the industry is to operate in a modern environment. Our major trading partners, including those whose markets we are trying to get back into, would look askance if we had no competent traceability scheme in place. I opened the British cattle traceability scheme formally at Workington last Friday, although it has been running for a few weeks. I was very impressed by how the work has been organised and by the enthusiasm of a relatively young work force who are making a go of something that is relatively new to the UK. As well as being enthusiastic about what they are doing, the work force understands its importance.

I have outlined what my predecessor did. In normal conditions, I believe that at least some of the costs that I mentioned should have been borne by the industry. However, the steps that we have taken recognise that market conditions are not normal. Since I have been Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, I have initiated the following steps to help. We have made use of a scheme for private storage aid for sheepmeat, following up the earlier scheme in March. I accept that the money does not go to farmers, but it is intended to strengthen market prices and to benefit all sheep producers. We have removed obstacles to the export of whole sheep carcases to France from the UK, with effect from 8 October, and I acknowledge the help of the hon. Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) in his role as Chairman of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments.

The EU opened a private storage aid scheme for pigmeat in September 1998, and all EU producers should benefit from the firming up of prices that should result from taking meat off the market. The UK exceptionally allowed an increase in the moisture content of grain entering UK intervention, in recognition of the wet summer, and the value of that to all UK cereal producers is £0.5 million. We are acting on the EU decision that will allow early payment of £100 million in EU subsidy to beef producers.

Those measures have been welcomed by farmers and farmers' representatives, but I do not regard them as a sufficient response to the present difficulties. I am working on a range of proposals with others in the Government, and I hope soon to be in a position to be able to say more to the House. The proposals under discussion are all based on a range of ideas put to me by farmers or their representatives. The range of ideas offered is not so very different from that offered by the hon. Member for South Suffolk.

We all understand what is under discussion. I know that there is great interest in how much I am able to deliver from one perspective or in what the announcement will be from another. I apologise but I am not able to say anything to the House tonight for reasons which I think those who have experience in these matters will recognise are perfectly good reasons. As the more experienced among us will know, if an early answer is wanted it is no.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Does the Minister accept that farmers are in such a complete state of crisis and suicidal depression over these matters that even though the right hon. Gentleman cannot yet announce what his package will be, some indication of when he will make the announcement would in itself be helpful for the morale of farmers across Britain? Will he make his announcement before Christmas, for example?

Mr. Brown: I am making progress, which should be of some comfort to the hon. Gentleman. I hope to be able to make an announcement within weeks and preferably within days. Further than that I think it is unwise to go without tipping my own negotiating hand. Suffice it to say that I am taking my new responsibilities very seriously and applying some old skills.

Mr. Steen: If there is a little time before the Minister makes his statement, will he examine carefully the experience of French farmers, who have the availability of cheap borrowing and not the ordinary bank rate, which means that they can borrow money at 2 or 3 per cent? That availability to our farmers would help them tremendously over the crisis. Is the right hon. Gentleman planning to consider an alternative scheme by which farmers can borrow at a much lower rate than the bank rate? Is that on his screen?

Mr. Brown: That is an interesting philosophical point. It is rather odd that the parties are again this way round. I believe in free markets and that there should be no artificial construction for one sector to deal with an industry's specific problem. The hon. Gentleman is advocating a specific reduced rate of interest to deal with a particular sector in the marketplace. When I was elected to this place in 1983, we used to have these discussions. I used to do my best for my shipbuilding constituency. The arguments then used to be the other way round. I used to be advocating special state aids and the Conservative party used to explain that that was not the right way forward. We seem to have passed each other as we have crossed from Opposition to Government. Anyway, there we have it.

Farmers complain that there are subsidy regimes in place in other countries that are not available to them. Where these regimes are outwith the European rules it has been the time-honoured position of the Government that the Commission should address that. We have had some success in making these representations in the past. I shall have something to say on the specific point in a moment.

My principal announcements are delayed—I am certain that the reason is obvious to everyone in the House—because they cost money. Let me knock down the idea that farmers are always asking for money from the public purse. They have not done so. Not one farmer or farm representative has asked me for a commitment from public funds to bail out the industry. I have been asked for measures targeted at the present position, a sense of direction for the future, a constructive dialogue within the sector—with our European Union partners as much as within the United Kingdom—and for political leadership. All of these I intend to provide.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I am pleased to hear what the Minister has just said about the representations that he has received from farmers. There are many of us who believe that subsidies are not the answer for any industry. It is a fact of life that agriculture is subsidised in this country and on the continent, but will the right hon. Gentleman take on board as a matter of principle that the Government can make absolutely sure that it does not add to the overhead burden—the cost to the industry—by Government measures? That would be helpful to the industry and something entirely within the gift of the Government.

Mr. Brown: I am sympathetic to the hon. Gentleman's representations. I acknowledge to the House the specific efforts that the hon. Gentleman has made for the pig farmers who he represents. I am sympathetic to the pig sector because it does not receive large payments from the public purse, even in the current difficulties. I freely acknowledge that the pig sector is in crisis because it asked for a state handout to bail it out. It has made points along the lines of the hon. Gentleman's intervention. I shall have something to say about that when I get to the pig sector in my statement.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): To take up some of the previous interventions, perhaps I should say thank you for a substantial arable area payment cheque that I received recently, along with many other farmers. These cheques have helped to keep people employed. Following the intervention from Ludlow, I urge my right hon. Friend to understand that the sort of regulation that guarantees the safety of food is imperative to safeguard the interests of consumers and those of farmers. I hope sincerely that my right hon. Friend will be able to make progress on that, perhaps in the Queen's speech.

Mr. Brown: Yes. I shall have something of substance to say about the Food Standards Agency and how the Government intend to make progress with the proposal immediately after the Queen's speech. Of course I cannot anticipate the Queen's speech.

On the broader question of food standards and whether we should somehow make a concession that would perhaps have an impact on the public's perception of the public health debate, the answer is no. However, there are some technical aspects that the industry has asked me to consider, which I am looking at. Of course, the public's safety must come first and I must be alert to questions of cross-contamination as well as to issues concerning the specific operations of the industry.

I refer specifically to the beef sector. As we all know, one of the most important things that I could do would be to lift the export ban in Europe. The motion deplores the fact that I have not done so. The House will want to know that today, in the Standing Veterinary Committee, a Commission proposal that would allow the United Kingdom's date-based export scheme to go ahead received a favourable response from a simple majority of the EU member states. If this vote is repeated in the Agriculture Council on Monday and Tuesday, 23 and 24 November, the way will be open for British beef from cattle born after 1 August 1996 to re-enter European and world markets.

I hope that that is welcome on both sides of the House—[Interruption.] I am grateful to the Opposition for acknowledging that this is important to our country. The Opposition spokesman, the hon. Member for South Suffolk, is right to point out that this is for deboned beef. The scheme does not allow for the export of live calves. It does not allow for the export of beef on the bone, but it is an important start. It will enable the British industry to work to get back into markets that we have lost. We shall have to make a substantial effort to get back into those markets, the more so because of the surplus of beef in the EU at present. It is not an easy time to re-enter markets.

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): Today, I talked to a major exporter of Scottish beef in Inverurie, who had a very substantial export business to Italy, Holland and France. Almost all that beef was on the bone for sale to high-quality restaurants and distributors. They bought it specifically because it was on the bone. They do not want to buy deboned beef. What efforts will the right hon. Gentleman make either to lift the beef-on-the-bone ban here or to ensure that exports of beef on the bone will be allowed shortly after the ban is lifted?

Mr. Brown: Of course this is not the end. I intend to continue to get British deboned beef into other world markets from which it is currently excluded. I intend to make steady progress in getting beef on the bone, when it is safe to do so in response to scientific advice, back into world markets. It is not as though this is one announcement after which the Government will call it all dealt with. I want to make steady progress so that British food products—livestock products—from every sector are back where they should be in world markets. Further, I want British products to be acknowledged for what they should be, which is among the safest products in the world. I want our country's name to be synonymous with excellence. I do not want consumers to be afraid to buy British because they are not certain of the quality or, indeed, the safety of the product. That is my ambition and I shall make remorseless progress towards achieving it. The announcement that I have made is important, but it is by no means the end.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey): Following on from what he has just said, will the Minister also ensure that, when the British housewife goes to the supermarket or other retail outlet to buy a British product, she can tell whether she really is buying British? Within his current proposals, what can the Minister do to promote British beef and the buying of it, and to overcome some of the current difficulties with labelling?

Mr. Brown: When the British consumer goes to the supermarket, I hope that she—or he—will buy British, not because the retailer has stuck a Union Jack on the product, but because he or she wants to buy the product because of its quality and the safety and farm welfare standards pertaining to the rearing of livestock in the United Kingdom.

How will consumers know what they are buying? They will have to be told, which is why I am discussing with retailers a UK-specific scheme that will enable consumers to make an informed choice. That suggestion was made by Opposition Members, by Labour Members and by the industry. It is right that I, as the Minister, accept my responsibilities for getting the producer and retail sides of the industry together to discuss proposals of that sort. I think that the House will welcome the comments that I shall make later about my meeting yesterday with the British Retail Consortium.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): Bearing in mind the success of campaigns to persuade people—although they need little persuasion—of the excellence of British beef, pork and lamb and to ensure that consumers are able to recognise such products in supermarkets by their labelling, will the Minister also tackle the catering industry? That industry uses a great deal of meat from a variety of sources, but when people go out to eat, they do not necessarily know that what they are eating is the best of British.

Mr. Brown: Together with my hon. Friend the Minister of State, I am taking a hard look at the catering industry. One third of all livestock products go through catering rather than home retailing, so it is right to pay attention to the catering industry. Clearly, a labelling scheme would not work in quite the same way, but there are other methods of ensuring that customers are informed about the origins of the product that they are eating. We are giving careful thought to the matter. I share the objective of the hon. Member for Congleton (Mrs. Winterton): I, too, believe in informed consumer choice and a free marketplace.

The position that we are now in regarding the export ban has not been easily achieved. We are making progress because our case is founded on science and on the technical implementation of the date-based export scheme, which is itself based on the agreement reached by European Heads of Government in Florence. I have to persuade other Farm Ministers that there is a case for lifting the ban. We have to explain our position to the technical specialists in other countries and to Commission officials. It is also important that I explain the British Government's position to individual Commissioners and to Members of the European Parliament. I pay tribute to the officials from my Department and from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office who have worked so hard to present Britain's case. We are getting there, and we are doing so because we are constructively engaged with the institutions of the European Union.

Before they are so free with their condemnation, may I gently invite the Opposition to reflect on three points: why we have a beef ban in the first place; which party was in power when it was imposed; and, if the lifting of the beef ban is such an easy thing to achieve, why the previous Government did not achieve it? I invite Conservative Members to think back to their "beef war" against Europe, to consider whether it successfully advanced our national interests and to consider whether the approach adopted by the present Government is more likely to succeed in advancing the interests of British agriculture. I shall not press the point any harder than that, but everyone—especially objective observers—will be able to draw his or her own conclusions.

Mr. Gill: We do not need time to think about it. The fact is that, at the time of the general election, the Labour party said, "Give us control and we shall solve all these problems at the stroke of a pen," but that has not happened. I am sure that the Labour party has learnt a great deal during the past 18 months, not least that ending the beef ban is not just a matter of going to Brussels on a charm offensive.

The Minister is up against the same problems that faced the Conservative Government in negotiating the end of the beef ban and it has taken him a long time to achieve what he has so far achieved. The question to which we and the industry want to know the answer is, why on earth have the Labour Government not ended the ban already, given the promises that they made 18 months ago?

Mr. Brown: Give us another fortnight, at least. The fact is that the British electorate listened carefully to what the Labour party had to say during the last election and decided to give us a chance to do a range of things, including lifting the beef ban. The truth is that we are making some progress. If ending the ban was so easy, the previous Government should have done it. Instead, their war with our partners in the European Union persuaded all 14 of them to gang up against the UK and, when the Conservatives asked the electorate what they thought of that, the electorate responded. My hon. Friends and I are the beneficiaries of that response, as are the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Tyler: As a totally objective observer, may I say that we Liberal Democrats warmly welcome the Government's approach in this respect? It is clearly far more constructive and it is delivering results; however, there is a long way to go. We should not raise great hopes of opening the market door to Europe, because the prices there are so low that that will not be of great help to us. The prices in the rest of the world, where we held some extremely valuable markets, are as important. As the door starts to open and the ban is removed, will the Minister and his officials consider seriously those third-country markets?

Mr. Brown: I hope that I made it plain that I want British foodstuffs back on world markets and want there to be no health impediment to British agriculture products and those products to be regarded as excellent on world markets. That is my ambition for this country and I intend to make remorseless progress towards achieving that.

Mr. Paterson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Brown: Once more, then, in fairness to other hon. Members, I must draw my remarks to a conclusion and allow others to speak.

Mr. Paterson: I am grateful to the Minister for giving way a second time. If he does not get satisfaction from our European partners with the techniques that he is using, will he take the case of Britain's beef farmers to the European Court?

Mr. Brown: I am content to continue to conduct negotiations in the way that I am currently conducting them and I believe that my approach will be justified by the outcome. I have carefully considered the opposite approach, which is to threaten people. I believe that, at one stage, the previous Conservative Government started to use the mechanisms of the European Court and got thrown out, so I am not overwhelmingly attracted to the approach adopted by the previous Government. I am willing to learn, and what I have learnt is not to do it their way, but to make steady progress using my own approach.

Let me try to draw this consensus together. I welcome the part of the Conservative party's motion that and add my applause. I regard it as wholly unnecessary and destructive to try to set one sector of the economy against another, or to isolate rural Britain from the rest of the country. We are one country and it is not necessary to set up artificial divisions. I, too, want there to be "a thriving rural economy" and "a viable agricultural industry". I agree that British farmers should compete in an open market "on equal terms" with others.

"applauds the achievements of British farmers",

That brings me to the Opposition's fair deal for farmers. One of its key points is to take a stand against unfair competition. I hope that the Opposition and the whole House will welcome the agreement that I reached yesterday with the British Retail Consortium that supermarkets will not sell imported meat processed in the UK under a British label. A major source of grievance for livestock sectors, particularly the pig industry, has been that meats can be imported, packaged and described as British. The major retailers have assured me that they will not do that. They have assured me also that, from 1 January 1999, all pigmeat sold in their outlets will be from animals raised to high welfare standards, with no stalls and tethers and no meat and bonemeal feedstuffs. Those who follow these matters know what I am describing. That will help to achieve the recognition that I want for the high welfare standards that British producers apply.

I want the European Commission to investigate in full today's press reports of new state aids elsewhere in the EU and to take the appropriate action if those prove to be contrary to EU law.

I am asked to cut the burden of regulation. I tell the House bluntly that I am not willing to compromise on food safety: food safety comes first, and it is in the interests of British producers that it does. I am willing to discuss with the farming industry the information that we collect from farmers and the form in which we request it and to consider whether there is a better way of doing so. The Government have, of course, considered those issues before. I intend to have the whole issue re-examined by specialist advisers. However, regulations are there for a purpose, and undermining public confidence in the regulatory regime by seeking short-term gain is not the right way forward for the industry.

On public purchasing policy, I am pleased with the outcome of my meeting yesterday with the British Retail Consortium and the outcome of the negotiations that we have been having with the Ministry of Defence.

[Mr. Brown]

We can be proud of animal welfare standards in this country. British consumers should be able to identify meat products that have been reared to the highest British animal welfare standards.

Allegations are often made that the supermarkets are taking advantage of low producer prices, but not passing them on to the consumer or, indeed, the farmer. The Office of Fair Trading is rigorously examining supermarket pricing. In the meantime, I am working to draw the whole food chain into co-operative working arrangements. The key point is that each part of the industry needs the others. The debate should not be characterised by villains and victims.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): The Minister is making an excellent speech, which has defused the situation and will be welcomed by the farming industry. However, I am sure that he is aware that, last month, the National Westminster bank published a report revealing that, if the current crisis continues, 25,000 farmers—15 per cent. of the total—will be driven out of agriculture. That is a serious prospect. Who will maintain the land? Does the Minister believe that his announcements today will do anything to stop the haemorrhaging from the land of those who produce our food?

Mr. Brown: I accept that the situation is serious, which is why I am trying to flag up the need for a further announcement, which I will make soon. The purpose of today's announcement is not to lift the whole burden of the present difficulties from the industry's shoulders. I cannot do that; no one in my position could. I can intervene proportionately so that the industry can survive the present difficulties. I acknowledge that there is a crisis in the pig industry. I cannot arrange for everyone to survive. I can work constructively with all the parties and point to alternative ways forward. I can encourage, explain and provide support, but I cannot stand against the broad tide of events, and it would not be sensible to do so.

The industry is experiencing a period of change and restructuring. I do not want the present difficulties to accelerate that process so that we are not the masters of our own destiny. I am determined that British agriculture not only survives but has a good, sustainable future. The shape of that future is the subject of a different debate, and I cannot say that in 10 years absolutely everything will be as it is now. All I can do is set the parameters for the marketplace and let people make their own judgments. I can also ensure that change is driven not by short-term difficult circumstances but by the long-term passage of events, including the liberalisation of markets.

The Opposition motion criticises the Government's approach to the countryside. Agriculture is only one part of the rural community, but it remains crucial and the whole appearance of the countryside is dependent on it. The Government recognise the special needs of those who live and work in rural areas. We have provided an extra £50 million for rural transport, new rate relief for village shops, extra protection for rural schools and financial support for remote dispensing pharmacists. That sits alongside our commitment to viable United Kingdom agriculture.

Under the previous Government, the Rural Development Commission recorded the following facts: 83 per cent. of rural parishes were without a general practitioner; 73 per cent. had no daily bus service; 49 per cent. were without a school; 43 per cent. were without a post office; and 42 per cent. did not have a permanent shop.

The Opposition urge me to extend the calf processing aid scheme.

Mr. Yeo: If the Minister is concerned about the deprivation described by the Rural Development Commission, will he tell us whether he has asked the Deputy Prime Minister to reverse last year's cut in the revenue support grant—the cash given to councils in rural areas?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman will remember from his time in office that government is seamless, and he should address his question to the appropriate Minister, but I shall pass on his comments to my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and urge him to treat them appropriately.

I turn now to a policy for which I am responsible—the calf processing aid scheme, which is scheduled to end at the end of the month. The scheme distorts the calf market, forcing prices up at a time when beef finishers' margins are low. Its continuation could result in a shortage of home-produced beef on the UK market in the medium term. After 30 November, most EU member states will be making no contribution to the reduction of EU beef surpluses. However, farmers—mainly dairy farmers—have pressed for the continuation of the scheme until we have more normal market conditions. I am carefully considering that request, but the animal welfare lobby and the abattoir operators—I acknowledge that they make an unlikely combination—have welcomed the decision to close the scheme.

It is not fair to suggest, as the Opposition motion does, that the Government are not committed to farming in the hills. More than £600 million has been distributed to hill farmers this year alone. The Government have always provided support for hill farmers. I intend to do so, as well as considering what further help we may offer. In the short term, I shall do what I can. I intend also to ensure that hill areas receive continuing support as part of the Agenda 2000 package and beyond.

The autumn review is well under way. It is important to remember that hill support is a structured measure, not a measure to top up shortfalls in income. The Opposition motion is misleading on hill support. It refers to returning hill livestock compensatory allowances to 1993 levels. The Conservative Government dramatically cut them in 1994. The severely disadvantaged area payment for cows was £63.31 in 1993, and the Conservatives reduced it to £47.50 in 1994.

Let me correct another misunderstanding. It was said at our last parliamentary Question Time, or perhaps in the Liberal Democrat Opposition day debate, that an additional amount was paid in 1997. That is true, but it was a supplement, from a separate one-off European Union scheme, counteracting the market effects of BSE. It was available throughout the European Union.

The motion urges me to take up agrimonetary compensation. I make it clear to absolutely everyone that aid is not just there for the taking. The agricultural monetary structures are permissive. Operation of the United Kingdom's budget abatement means that the UK Exchequer bears about 71 per cent. of the cost of EU-refunded aid. If anyone thinks that those arrangements are unfair, I remind them that the arrangements are a direct result of the Fontainebleau agreement, negotiated by the Conservative Government.

The possibility of agrimonetary compensation for United Kingdom farmers was first approved by the European Union Agriculture Ministers in March 1997. Whatever the Opposition say now, the Conservative Government made no commitment at the time to pay such compensation. The only tranche that has ever been paid was paid by my predecessor.

I have the matter under consideration. The hon. Member for South Suffolk is right to ask me about that point. I am considering it, but, as he knows, I have to discuss with others in the Government.

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brown: I should draw my remarks to a close, if only to let others in to the debate. Although I have been generous in giving way, it is not really fair to the House to extend my speech and thus keep other hon. Members out of the debate. However, I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Paice: On the subject of the previous Government not taking up any agrimonetary compensation, does the Minister agree that not a single agricultural product for which a common agricultural policy regime exists is making anything like the price that it made under the previous Government, and that that is why it was unnecessary for the previous Government to take up that compensation?

Mr. Brown: That is not the only purpose of the agrimonetary regime, although the present Government accept that, in some circumstances, there is a case for drawing down within the permissive regime. That is why my predecessor did it, and that is why I have the matter under active consideration. My only point—a narrow political one—is that the regime was in place under the previous Government and they did not take advantage of it. There may be a range of reasons for that, but for the Opposition to urge it on us and not to have done it themselves sits them in a less happy position than they might think they find themselves in.

Mr. Gill: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Brown: No. I have an enormous respect for the hon. Gentleman and I again acknowledge the part that he plays in these matters, but I have given way to him twice. I understand that the House wants to question me and explore matters with me, which is why I have given way as freely as I have, but, in fairness to others who want to take part in the debate, I should now draw my remarks to a close and let others in.

The part of the Opposition motion that I wish to address is the reference to "underspends on the agriculture budget".

Believe me, if I could get my hands on an underspend and I was free to make an announcement now, I would do so. There is no pot of money waiting to be redistributed. The motion refers to annually managed expenditure and the difference between forecast expenditure and outturn as a demand-led budget.

I note that the hon. Member for South Suffolk is calling for more money to be spent under that heading, and I know that he must have cleared that with the shadow Chancellor. I must clear any money that I want to spend with the real Chancellor, and I wonder how the hon. Gentleman can square the demand that much more money be spent in the agriculture sector with the more general approach of the shadow Chancellor, which is that the Government are spending too much money already and should cut expenditure.

I hope that I have dealt with the Opposition's arguments. I have explained my approach. The Government amendment provides a more rational way forward for United Kingdom agriculture, a way that will allow a viable UK agriculture—a broader rural economy—to play its proper, dynamic role in the United Kingdom economy. I commend the amendment to the House.

Several hon. Members rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Before I call the next hon. Member, I remind the House that Madam Speaker has ruled that there will be a 10-minute limit on speeches.

8.34 pm

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): It is a great privilege and pleasure to follow the Minister after his ministerial debut in a debate in the House as Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. It was, by any standards, a fine speech, and we are grateful for it. Obviously, from the Minister's viewpoint, the policy of killing with kindness now applies, not just to animal welfare campaigners and abattoirs, but to the House of Commons. He has shown the House the courtesy that he showed to the Select Committee on Agriculture last week when he appeared before it, and we should all be grateful to him for that.

The Minister's analysis is entirely sound. I hope that the judgment of the agriculture community will be the same for him as it will be for me—not at all bad for a townie. We both have that in common. He has shown great understanding of the issues, but he would agree—the thrust of his speech shows that he would certainly agree—that understanding is no substitute for action. The time is coming quite fast when action will be expected of him. Today he showed some areas where welcome action has already been taken.

The Minister has identified the very strange consensus that exists, not only in the House, but outside it, throughout the agricultural community, about the long-term direction that we must take for British farming—liberalised markets and an end to production-linked subsidies. On that we can all agree.

I believe that the Minister understands that, to achieve that objective, the Government cannot simply sail into the wind—like a supertanker—toward that utopian and very desirable goal, but will have to behave rather like a clipper, tacking with the wind in seeking to achieve that objective. That means that there is no inconsistency in providing short-term help to farming now, to help it to arrive at that long-term goal. The Minister will have to behave rather less like the Exxon Valdez and rather more like the Cutty Sark, but I think he understands that. He has certainly proved pretty good at pouring oil on to troubled waters today.

However, there is a real recession out there—a real crisis facing agriculture. As the whole House now understands, that crisis is unique in that it now extends to every sector of farming. When Farmers Weekly regularly publishes the telephone number of the Samaritans, obviously something is seriously wrong. I know from farmers in my constituency, in Worcestershire, about the extent of the problems that they are facing. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) sent me a letter from one of his arable farmers. It says:

"According to my costing of last year's harvest, it cost us £68 per ton to grow wheat which we are now selling at £68 per ton, last year it was selling at £85 per ton. Our peas, last year, were selling at £102 per ton, this year at £68 per ton".

Obviously, the situation is exceptionally serious. Farm prices after inflation are lower than they were in the 1970s. I hope that the decision of the Select Committee on Agriculture to launch an investigation of the problems facing the pig industry will help by highlighting some of the problems, perhaps enabling us to learn lessons for other sectors.

The Government must face up to four categories of problem in dealing with the crisis confronting British agriculture. Obviously, the first is the international dimension—the broader economic questions. Yes, there are very big international problems out there, and they have affected some sectors of farming especially acutely. The Russian crisis has imposed an especially severe problem on pig farmers. The far eastern crisis has been a particularly severe problem for chicken farmers. The problems are real.

In most farmers' minds, the overriding factor must be the strength of sterling. Although there have recently been some weakening of sterling and green pound revaluations, which are welcome, sterling is still strong.

I sincerely hope that the Minister will be able to persuade the Chancellor to draw down the agrimonetary compensation—£48 million for beef farmers, and £89 million for arable farmers. Although nothing is available for sheep farmers, I hope that the Minister will be able to get the compensation that is available, as it will provide a very important symbol of the Government's determination to help farmers.

The second category of problem comprises the self-imposed wounds that have nothing to do with broader economic issues. Although some might say that, because of the Chancellor's decisions, the strength of sterling is partly a self-imposed wound, as Committee Chairman, I must be careful not to be too partisan in my remarks. Nevertheless, there are other self-imposed wounds.

I think that the beef-on-the-bone ban was a self-imposed wound, making it more difficult for the Minister to make the progress that he has made in having the ban lifted. At one stage, it seemed as if the price of lifting the beef export ban would be a permanent, Brussels-imposed beef-on-the-bone ban. Although the Minister seems to have escaped paying that price, his task was made more difficult.

Mr. Nick Brown: I did not escape it alone, as much hard work was put in by British officials—Foreign Office officials and my Department's officials—in persuading the Commission to separate the date-based export scheme from another proposal on specified risk material that might have been included in the scheme. It is a very important point for the domestic industry, as the hon. Gentleman is right to mention.

Mr. Luff: I am happy to pay tribute to officials in the Minister's Department, who sometimes get a raw deal in contending with difficult situations. I am grateful to them.

The progress that we are making is part of a continuum. I cannot help but notice that the veterinarians who voted today against lifting the ban included some of the Government's most socialist friends in Europe—Germany, France and Spain, who all cast their votes against lifting the ban. In the constructive dialogue, perhaps the traditional friends of the Conservative party down the years, such as Denmark, have been more sympathetic to our case. Although I wonder how much the programme of constructive engagement has shifted the balance, I think that our argument is beginning to get through, which essentially demonstrates the continuum from the previous Government to the current one.

The problems of the beef industry will not be solved simply because the beef export ban is lifted. I worry that the public at large believe that ending the ban will be a cure-all. It will not be a complete cure, as huge problems will remain. I also hope that the Minister will be able to find some money to help beef farmers regain their lost export markets, both inside Europe and, as many hon. Members have often said, outside Europe—in South Africa, for example. I am delighted to hear the Minister's very strong hints—his dance of the seven veils—on the calf processing aid scheme. It seems fairly clear that there will some type of successor scheme, which will be welcome. A successor scheme will be welcomed not least on welfare grounds.

There are many "level playing field" issues that lie within the Minister's control. He mentioned Government buying policies. I cannot imagine any other European Union member state that would be quite as transparent and open as we have been. I hope that he will continue putting pressure on the Ministry of Defence. Although he has been successful on beef, more progress on lamb is necessary. I hope that he will put pressure on local education authorities, too—consistent, of course, with local decision making—to try to encourage them to take a more enlightened view.

I hope that the Minister will reconsider his Department's thoughts on imposing charges on farmers. Although I understood his comments on the safety and security of the food chain—one must respect that concern—I hope that he will not impose charges, as his Department's expenditure plans currently forecast, for use of the British cattle movement service, for example, unless he is convinced that other EU member states levy equivalent charges. We must not unnecessarily handicap our farmers.

I was encouraged by the Minister's comments on welfare standards, on which he has made some good progress. Nevertheless, battery egg producers are concerned about the implications of some Government statements. Producers are worried and are in a difficult position. The consequence of an immediate ban on battery cages would almost certainly be massive imports of American eggs that are produced in conditions that are much worse than those in the UK. We must be very careful when addressing such "level playing field" issues.

We must be particularly careful about new and unnecessary burdens, such as a pesticide tax. I am concerned about suggestions coming from one Department, to the effect that farmers randomly pour pesticides on their fields. That is nonsense. Pesticides are a very expensive input, which farmers certainly do not want to use unnecessarily. Moreover, imposing a tax will not control pesticide use but will only be another burden on British farmers.

The third issue is the problem with the food chain. I was encouraged again to hear the Minister's comments on his discussions with supermarkets. I should say that I have been unconvinced by supermarkets' claims and did not find Tesco's London Economics report particularly convincing. There is no doubt that meat sales are contributing substantially to those supermarkets' overheads.

I noted that, between August 1996 and August 1998, according to the National Farmers Union, farmers' share of retail prices for bread has declined from 18 to 13 per cent.; for pork from 57 to 33 per cent.; for milk from 42 to 34 per cent.; and for poultry from 46 to 30 per cent. Farmers are receiving less from the proceeds of lower prices, which must be a matter of great concern. I hope that the Minister will consider convening a summit of all those in the food chain—including farmers, hauliers, abattoirs, processors, manufacturers, retailers and even consumers—to discover whether the problem cannot be dealt with once and for all, as it has been a running sore for all of us.

The fourth and final category are the "mood music" issues, in which the Government seem to demonstrate a failure to understand the countryside. The Minister claimed credit for rate relief for shops. I have to inform him that the previous Government took that policy decision and passed that Act of Parliament. Credit for that rests entirely with the Conservative party. I lobbied for it intensely, spoke on the Bill, and we got the measure through. I am glad that the Government did not abandon it, but it is our policy.

Attempts to ban hunting, sabre rattling over the right to roam, penalising rural motorists, closing facilities in market towns—I have lost my benefits office, and my magistrates court and county court have been threatened; my income tax office is threatened, which some may say is a good thing, but we still appreciate the service—these are all bad measures. New house building in the countryside cannot easily be dismissed. My constituency faces a new town of 5,000 homes as a result of the Government's failure to translate their targets for brown-field land into local county structure plans. The standard spending assessment will be an important test when those decisions are announced next month.

The Minister has lent a sympathetic ear to farmers and they are grateful to him. As he did at our Select Committee last week, he has offered warm words. The time has now come when he must also lend a helping hand.

Mrs. Diana Organ (Forest of Dean): On Monday evening as I was leaving my constituency to come to London I passed Westbury village hall and saw a notice that said "NFU Crisis Meeting". I know that the National Farmers Union has internal difficulties, but it was fairly obvious that the meeting was about the crisis facing farmers in the Forest of Dean. All sectors face unprecedented difficulties, as the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) has just explained.

On 6 October, I met a group of local farmers who told me about farmers who were either selling up or having to get out of farming. One said that in the past five years he had made a major investment to improve his herd stores and welfare standards, but that he could not even consider carrying out the second necessary stage of investment in his milking parlour and storage. Another farmer came to my surgery on Friday. He was desperate and said that he was now on family credit and did not know how he could continue through the winter.

The shadow Minister referred to the Farmers Weekly article about suicides among farmers. I am concerned for farmers' well-being. Suicide rates among farmers are high and we do not want them to get worse. The businesses that face difficulties are a vital part of our rural economy as they support village shops and other local businesses. Farmers in the Forest of Dean welcome my right hon. Friend's determination and commitment to listen and talk to farmers, and I thank him for taking time out in his busy schedule next week to visit the south-west to hear more at first hand about the problem.

I welcome the Government's recognition of the seriousness of the problem and the great efforts that my right hon. Friend and his predecessor have made to lift the export ban on British beef. That is good news for farmers and the whole country. They will welcome today's decision by the European Union Standing Veterinary Committee. A simple majority was in favour of allowing the date-based export scheme to go ahead. We hope that the vote will be similar in the Agriculture Council.

In response to the grave difficulties that face the agricultural sector, will the Minister consider a short-term package of relief? That is suggested not by me but by local farmers who are under duress. It is not only for the farmers themselves, but for the wider rural economy in the Forest of Dean. Although in rural constituencies such as mine agriculture is a small part of the total economy, it underpins many other activities in the area.

The calf processing scheme is due to end on 30 November. Will the Minister look seriously at that, not only because it provides short-term assistance but because farmers have raised with me their concerns about animal welfare, should the scheme cease?

I welcome the Government's recent announcement of an additional £1 million investment to boost the countryside stewardship scheme, which delivers environmentally friendly farming. The scheme is very popular and oversubscribed. The extra funding will be concentrated on the upland areas of England. My local farmers, who are from low grassland areas, want an extension for lowland areas as well.

Will my right hon. Friend look again at agrimonetary compensation, particularly for the livestock sector? We have done it once and should do it again. I recognise that there are substantial public expenditure implications, but I am sure that the British taxpayer would be prepared to take the burden of that cost to help rural communities. The £85 million that was paid to suckler cow and sheep producers in January 1998 was much needed and welcomed by farmers. I hope that the Government are examining the case for further assistance this year.

As part of the support that the Government give to agriculture, may we ask for more assistance in helping the beef sector back into European markets when the ban is lifted? It is not going to be easy to get back into those markets. Will my right hon. Friend also look at a programme of wider guidance and training, with other marketing initiatives, to help farmers to set up as a co-operative, so that they can have greater strength when they negotiate with retailers and can be price setters, not price getters?

Lastly, a much voiced grudge of local farmers in my area is the uneven burden of regulation that they face, which does not have to be borne by import producers. The standard that the Government set is understood by farmers. They know that it produces good quality, wholesome and safe products for consumers and gives us good welfare standards, but surely we must ensure fairness; supermarkets must make it clear to consumers that the goods that they buy are of an equal standard.

In the long term, the real solution is reform of the common agricultural policy and Agenda 2000, with its emphasis on an integrated rural development policy, but at present we face a real crisis in the Forest of Dean and throughout the country. The crisis is being dealt with by the Government because they will not treat farming communities of the 1990s in the despicable way in which the previous Government treated mining and shipbuilding communities of the 1980s.

This Government are concerned about urban and rural communities. They are concerned about farmers—primary producers—as well as high-tech businesses. I thank the Minister for his support and efforts so far for the farmers of the Forest of Dean.

8.51 pm

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Skye and Inverness, West): In contributing briefly to this Conservative-moved debate, may I also welcome and congratulate the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on his debut full-speech performance, as it were. As we know, over the past few months, with characteristic patience, he has taken time to do a lot of listening. Tonight, we got an extended chance to listen to him. Hon. Members on both sides of the House could find much positive encouragement both in his approach and in his general political attitude to his ministerial responsibilities.

When I come back with one or two points later, perhaps the Minister will accept that I do so not simply for the sake of being critical in the parliamentary party political sense, but to try to be constructive, as he is still considering and arguing for a package of relief.

It was perhaps a bit of bad luck for the Conservatives that, on the day the motion came up, we had such a significant breakthrough at Brussels. They share the pleasure in that, but they would scarcely be politically human if they did not think that it was just a bit inconvenient. If it had happened tomorrow, they could have claimed that it was their motion that had put things over the edge from the Government's point of view, but there we are; no such luck.

However, it is important that all parties express their pleasure at the degree of progress that was achieved today. Without any shadow of doubt, it is a significant breakthrough; for once, the Government were giving a slightly underspun line in today's news bulletins. It marks an important step forward. Let us hope that, in due course, it leads to both the loosening and, ultimately, the complete lifting of the ban.

We are dealing with a Conservative motion. We had the chance to move ours only 10 days ago, so our amendment to the motion is just a complete restatement of what we were saying 10 days ago—unlike the Conservatives these days, our policy can remain consistent for 10 days. I notice that, in the earlier debate this afternoon, we got at least three different Conservative policies on some of the issues.

There is a difficulty in this debate. Clearly, in moving the motion, the Conservatives, after such a long continuous period in office, want the rest of us to suffer from collective amnesia. At the same time, they are having to fight old political battles themselves: battles which ended in such decisive defeat 18 months ago and will again end in decisive defeat if they go to the vote in the Division Lobby tonight.

It is breathtaking, given the importance of Europe to UK agriculture, that unlike the other two motions, that tabled by the Conservatives—who have considerable difficulties on the issues—does not mention the common agricultural policy, its reform and Agenda 2000. We cannot have a realistic debate about the future of British agriculture without referring to the common agricultural policy, its reform and the implications of that reform for domestic agriculture.

Given that there will be a move away from production subsidy towards rural development, with further diversification, conservation and environmental aspects being built in to countryside support as a whole, particularly farming support, it is vital that any British Government trying to help to shape the direction of policy should bring some credibility to the European negotiating table.

No Government can have that credibility unless they are committed to the European project and have something positive to say about its most important aspect, which is the single European currency, as the farming industry well understands. It is essential that we should make it clear in the signals that we send to Brussels and to the Commission, where the long-term decisions will be taken, that two UK political parties have that conviction of the long-term efficacy of the single market and the single currency—although we would like the Government to go further and faster than they are—and that one party is way out of step. It is little wonder that there is no reference to matters European in the Conservative motion, because the Conservatives have lost all internal conviction and all external credibility on those matters.

Mr. Paterson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kennedy: No, I will not.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): This is silly.

Mr. Kennedy: We are debating a Conservative motion and it is right to look at the position of the Conservative party on the countryside and agriculture. I find it unbelievable that the Conservatives get so upset about the slightest scrutiny of their policies. That speaks volumes about the mess that they are in. If they want to come to the Floor of the House with proposals, they should expect them to be scrutinised. That is what we are doing.

Mr. Paterson rose—

Mr. Hayes rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman has said that he is not giving way.

Mr. Kennedy: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I should like to make some suggestions about where the Government should go from here on the domestic matters that are within their control. First, there is the hill livestock compensatory allowance, which is under review. There has been a breathtaking call for a restoration to the levels paid shortly before they were cut by the previous Government. It was clear from last week's debate, when senior Labour Back-Bench voices were raised on the matter, that there is an all-party consensus on the issue. The Minister would do well to heed that fact, politically in the House and practically outside. There has been a disastrous collapse in incomes not just in the hill areas but in the lowlands. I hope that the Minister will respond positively and use the rapid administrative and financial injection that the HLCAs can provide.

Secondly, it is important that the Minister should do everything possible within the European rules to encourage beef marketing and promotion abroad. It is clear from the experience of Northern Ireland that it will be a slow process, even from the date when the ban is eventually gone completely. Although the Minister is correct to say that farmers must work together and co-operate, equally, he must give a co-operative boost to their efforts. If they deliver their side of the bargain, the Government should deliver theirs.

What the Minister said about his discussions yesterday with the British Retail Consortium was extremely encouraging. Product labelling and the behaviour of supermarkets must obviously be kept under the closest scrutiny. It is important that we do not let up on the supermarkets—not least while the jury is out on that all-important Office of Fair Trading report.

I do not want to break the 10-minute rule, so I shall leave the Minister with two specific recommendations. He spoke about bureaucracy and red tape, saying that he would not in any way surrender standards—and we agree. There is much bureaucracy and red tape in agriculture. Farmers all too often tell their Member of Parliament that they have faithfully tried to fill out the form but have not done so correctly. They are not trying to be corrupt or to abuse the system. They have often been given misleading or inaccurate advice locally over the telephone.

In too many such instances, the case cannot be referred to the ombudsman because it is not one of malpractice. Will the Minister consider the practice adopted for the Child Support Agency? As a result of the huge problems that have accumulated with the agency, about which we all, as constituency Members, know, a degree of independent trouble-shooting has been built into the system for cases not of political maladministration but, as common sense suggests, of clear individual injustice. The Government could do much to try to advance the matter in agriculture.

I refer the Minister to the days of the Lib-Lab pact, all those years ago. One of the concessions that the Liberals were able to influence the Labour Administration to make during a bad time for agricultural income was the introduction of a period of roll-over tax relief. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) has been in correspondence with the Minister about the matter. Given the horrendous difficulties, will the Minister contact his old chum at the Treasury to see whether it might be responsive to the idea of roll-over tax relief—for, perhaps, three or five years—for UK agriculture? For many who are presently badly hit, such a device could even out the problems of their present trough, and, hopefully, maintain viability for the future. I see that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is present; he will have heard that point.

I hope that the Minister and his Cabinet colleagues will accept our approach in the constructive spirit in which it is offered. I hope that we can continue to put so much of the past behind us, get through this undoubted crisis and begin in a more united and sensible way to build a better profile for British farming.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South): I represent many farmers who are in dire trouble. It is no coincidence that the first demonstrations against the import of Irish beef were in north Wales. I am very pleased, however, that that line of action is no longer the policy of the National Farmers Union and the Farmers Union of Wales—I do not suppose that it was actual policy—and that, with some good effect, farmers are trying to put their case through proper democratic procedures. I have had many meetings with farmers in my constituency, at which they have explained their difficulties.

One reason why farmers resorted to demonstration was that they were, to a certain extent, misled by the idea that there is a huge pool of agrimonetary compensation waiting to be dipped into. As has been made clear, certainly in debates in the House, the compensation is in tranches. The previous Minister for Agriculture, my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), gave as much as he could to the beef sector. I stand to be corrected, but I think that he gave 95 per cent. of available compensation to the beef sector, and 75 per cent. to the sheep sector.

We have heard the usual rubbish from the Opposition—although it is gratifying to hear about their conversion to state intervention in industry. I have not heard much about that from them in steel and coal debates, but things move on. We have not heard many apologies from them for the BSE problem, either.

I do not think that anyone in the debate so far has mentioned the fact that the price of milk has fallen drastically, partly because of the winding up of the Milk Marketing Board. Had it still been in existence, I do not think that there would have been such a problem.

We have not heard much about the strength of the pound, either, because it is now weaker than it was when we took power in May 1997. Milk, beef and lamb prices have been steadily dropping over the past two years; the graph is clear, and something has to be done.

The Welsh Affairs Select Committee looked into the crisis in the livestock industry. It took a slightly different tack from that taken by the Agriculture Select Committee, in that one of our evidence sessions, with the farming unions, suggested that there was a problem with supermarket pricing. It is strange, to say the least, that the price that the consumer pays in the supermarket does not seem to be dropping commensurately with prices in the cattle market.

All kinds of factors have to be taken into account, but from the evidence from the supermarkets, the meat processors and the catering sector, it was difficult to find out precisely what was happening with prices. We therefore recommended that the Office of Fair Trading investigate supermarket pricing, and I am delighted to say that it is doing so.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnorshire): As Chairman of the Welsh Affairs Select Committee, will the hon. Gentleman, like the rest of us on the Committee, urge the Government to ask the OFT to produce its report as soon as possible?

Mr. Jones: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that that is essential. It is interesting to note that the supermarkets are now attempting to help. It might be churlish to suggest that they might not have helped if the Office of Fair Trading had not been breathing down their necks. However, I am a little cynical, and I suspect that that is a possible reason.

Another factor on which the Select Committee focused was immediate help. We are finding a consensus in the Chamber that some immediate help is needed. I believe that it should be targeted, and hill livestock compensatory allowances are a good way of reaching those who are most affected. That is the nature of the game. We need to help those people, because there is not a bottomless pit of money.

I wish my right hon. Friend the Minister well in his meeting with the Agriculture Ministers, and I hope that we achieve success there.

9.7 pm

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I am sorry that the Minister of Agriculture has left his place, because I wanted to tell him that I found his speech reassuring. He has, however, given some hostages to fortune, and I hope that those are not called upon, because I hope that his speech has given some encouragement to the beleaguered farming industry.

To the Minister of State, who has remained on the Treasury Bench, I have to say that, in all my years in the House, I have never known a time when farming faced such severe challenges. Not only in Macclesfield but throughout the United Kingdom, as we have heard tonight, agriculture is in crisis.

The Minister admitted that, and he also said that the distinctive feature of the present difficulties is that virtually every branch of agriculture is affected at the same time. The public are aware of the problems in the beef industry, but on other fronts there is little consolation for our hard-pressed farmers. Cereal prices are down, pig producers are making losses, and dairy farmers are being driven out of business.

The hon. Member for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) was, I think, the first speaker in the debate to mention the reduction in the milk price. We have talked about the problems of hill farmers, and to my mind those are so severe that the very fabric of our cherished countryside is at risk.

According to a National Farmers Union survey, next year the average income on hill farms will fall below £8,000, compared with £12,000 last year. I do not need to tell hon. Members what that will mean to families on small farms across the land. The prospect is indeed dire.

A report from Deloitte and Touche in October predicted a 48 per cent. drop in farm incomes in the current financial year. Last year, United Kingdom farmers' incomes dropped by 56 per cent. That is a huge drop, whatever it is compared with. I am deeply worried. My instinct is to favour the small to medium-sized farm. Big is certainly not beautiful in my view, and it is therefore those farms to which support should be directed.

On top of that grim short-term outlook, there is uncertainty over the reform of the common agricultural policy with Agenda 2000; environmental pressures are growing; there is increasingly monopolistic buying power in the hands of the supermarkets, to which virtually every speaker so far has rightly referred; and there has been an explosion of public interest in food production and how that should be regulated. The latter matter could impose further financial burdens on farmers as well.

I do not suggest that all those difficulties have been caused by Governments—some have not—but what is certain is that the present Government appear to have shown a cavalier disregard for the concern of farmers, and a lack of understanding of their problems and the fears of the wider rural community. I say to the Minister that I hope that some of those fears, and what people perceive as that cavalier disregard, may now die away because of the sensitive way in which the Minister of Agriculture has tonight addressed the serious problems facing agriculture.

As the hon. Member for Clwyd, South said, 10 months ago, the traditional image of farming was shattered, when, a couple of weeks before Christmas, a group of north Wales farmers decided to take matters into their own hands and blockaded the port of Holyhead, throwing a consignment of Irish beef burgers into the sea. Such direct action was caused by frustration; the message was, "Enough is enough."

The United Kingdom beef industry has done everything that has been asked of it, and the United Kingdom has, I believe, met all the requirements of the Florence agreement. It is time for politicians across Europe to recognise that, and the efforts that have been made, and to lift the ban on beef exports, including—dare I say?—beef on the bone.

Let me make it clear: devastation was brought upon our beef industry not as a result of the previous Government, and not even as a result of the 18 months that this Government have been in power; it was entirely down to Euro-politics. It has paid our competitors in the European Union to have British beef banned, and the longer it is banned the better, for many of them.

Once highly profitable markets for our beef in European countries have been exploited by other nations. Those markets have now been lost to the United Kingdom, I believe for ever. Political interference by member state Governments to satisfy their own agendas must not be allowed to delay a decision for the complete lifting of the beef ban.

The hills and uplands play an important role in United Kingdom beef production, because almost 70 per cent. of the beef herd is in less-favoured areas. Hill livestock compensatory allowances are designed, as the Minister knows, to ensure the continuation of livestock farming in those areas, which is absolutely essential if they are to continue to be productive and to be farmed. What would happen to them if they were not farmed?

At this year's review of HLCAs, it is essential that full account be taken of the critical incomes situation. If the European Commission maintains its objection to the use of HLCAs to offset adverse income trends, the Government—as one of their supporters, the hon. Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ) has urged the Minister—should again use agrimonetary compensation to assist the less-favoured areas and the lowland beef areas.

As the Minister knows, the continuing strength of sterling is having a major impact on the beef sector. If the exchange rate of the pound against European currencies remains at current levels once the ban on beef exports is lifted, United Kingdom traders may still face severe difficulties in re-establishing a market that, at its peak, took about 28 per cent. of our beef.

I congratulate the Minister on facilitating the export of whole carcases of sheep over 12 months old to designated French abattoirs. That is a good move, and it has been warmly welcomed. It is also important that the number of designated French abattoirs is increased, because the inability to export whole sheep carcases has had a disastrous impact on sheep prices. Clearly, the implementation of bilateral agreements with France on sheep exports is necessary.

What is certain is that the Government's policy of deliberately maintaining a strong pound—for whatever reason—is crippling farmers as surely as it is destroying some of our manufacturers. The loss of a family farm that has provided a living for two or three people for generations may not make the headlines in many of the newspapers, as the closure of a large factory would, but for the men and women involved and the work they do, it is no less traumatic.

The cumulative effect on rural communities will be devastating unless there are some policy changes, with action and not merely words. Therefore, I call on the Government to fight the corner for the British farmer, not only in this country but in Europe. Sadly, the British farmer appears to be appreciated only in times of war or crisis. Farming is facing a crisis. Let the Government and the people give the industry the support it deserves.

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree): I welcome the opportunity to speak in this debate, and to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture on a speech that in many ways almost united the House, for a while at least. Even the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy) almost went along with the tripartisan feeling of unity that followed, which is to be welcomed.

Farmers, whatever their constituency, are not particularly interested in who did what, when and where, or in saying that that Government did this but another Government are doing something else. Farmers have jolly long memories—going back centuries—so they can certainly remember what has happened in the past 20 years in politics. However, that is not the issue.

The issue is that there are grave difficulties—I hesitate to say "a crisis", as we have been told that its use might be inadvisable—in British agriculture in the short term, and it faces grave risks in the long term. There is general agreement about the measures that my right hon. Friend the Minister has introduced or is hinting at, but they will not mean an end to the problems of British agriculture: I endorse the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Forest of Dean (Mrs. Organ) and her pleas.

I must cast some doubt on the wonders of the golden calf of the free market. I do not want to get into trouble by saying too much against it, or by not being seen to worship it fully, but we must understand that the sweeping of the free market through some parts of the world is one of the many factors that are harming British agriculture. Since economies are now globalised—a dreadful word—the collapse of economies in other parts of the world has an effect here, which permeates down to the farm at the bottom of the road. Unless we get reform of the common agricultural policy right as soon as we can, the free market will blow through our farms and create greater havoc than many of the diseases that have cursed our agriculture through the decades.

We must get the system of supports right, and I was grateful to hear Opposition Members saying so. Farmers will not care too much whether their incomes come from being the custodians of the land that they and their families have farmed for generations, or from raising crops or livestock.

Farmers want to be part of and contribute to the community in which they have lived for many years. If they are preserving our heritage, they should jolly well be paid for doing so. That would not be a subsidy; the rest of us would be paying farmers properly for doing what we want them to do for us. The sooner we move to such a system of support and away from the endless incentives to over-produce, the sooner we will get things right.

Time is not on our side, however, and it is certainly not on the side of the family farmer. We hear the word "restructuring" bandied about—hon. Members have spoken about it in the context of other industries—but restructuring can take a number of forms. I fear that it will take the form of the destruction of small farms and farms in poorer and remoter areas, with vast tracts of land being taken over by combines of organisations whose primary interest is land value, not land use.

[Mr. Alan Hurst]

We must search urgently for medium and long-term solutions to the problems that our farmers face. In agreeing on the immediate measures that need to be taken, we must not overlook the urgent need to act to retain the structure of rural Britain as we have known it for so long.

9.20 pm

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), whom I am delighted to follow, was cautious about using the word "crisis". I shall be less so: agriculture is in crisis. The Minister is right to be careful about the use of language—exaggeration is not good for the industry—but it is inappropriate to understate the case. It is important that farmers understand that we appreciate the extent of their difficulties, so I am not hesitant about using the word "crisis", but I am not suffering under the same discipline as the hon. Member for Braintree.

Measured in any terms, agriculture is in crisis. The 56 per cent. fall in incomes over the past year, the level and cost of borrowing, and the fall in the price of products across the sectors all show that it is so.

I notice that the Liberal Democrat spokesman, the hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), and the hon. Member for North Cornwall (Mr. Tyler) have not had the courtesy to stay to hear the debate. Their suggestion that what has been happening is part of a continuum or general trend is wholly untrue. There was a downturn in almost every sector in 1996, but, compared to what has happened in the past year to 18 months, that downturn was very small indeed. In the arable and livestock sectors, the real problems and the significant decline in incomes have been in the past 18 months.

It would be nonsense to pretend that this Government caused all that, but the scale of the crisis requires emergency action. It is inappropriate to point the finger at Conservative Members and the previous Government, because the current problems are of different proportions from those of two years ago, when it might have been legitimate to blame the Conservative Administration.

I was delighted by the tone of the Minister's remarks, which was in stark contrast to that of his predecessor. I am reminded of the maxim that, to get on, one must be very clever or very nice—the Minister has clearly opted for the latter course. I would say that perhaps the former course was not available to him, but that would be ungracious. The tone, however, is only part of the story. It is important that the Government are listening, but their listening must be backed by action that is, in the Minister's word, proportionate.

There is no question but that the Conservative party legitimately speaks for rural Britain; in psephological terms, it is the principal party of rural Britain. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) may wave his head about, but, if rurality is measured by a combination of agricultural employment and sparsity of population, the Labour party is the third party of rural Britain. It holds less than 20 of the 100 most rural seats. In England, it holds fewer than five of the 50 most rural seats. The Conservative party is the legitimate spokesman of the rural community, with the Liberals trailing some way behind.

It is also true that the Conservative party speaks up for rural Britain. We hope that the new Minister will be seen a little more diligent in attending conferences, visiting shows and mixing with farmers. His predecessor was not famed for that—he was notably absent from some major events in the farming calendar—and we hope for a change of emphasis as well as tone.

The Government must take some positive steps. It is important to emphasise that agriculture is different, and should be treated differently, from other industries. Rural Britain and agriculture are not synonymous—probably the majority of employment in my constituency is related to agriculture, although that is not true throughout the whole of rural Britain—but agriculture holds a special place, not only because of its custodianship of the land, as the hon. Member for Braintree said, but because of family connections, the long-standing nature of the businesses, and the contribution they make to the wider community. Rural and urban Britain should not be separated, but they require different solutions.

I agree that we should consider whether article 36 of the treaty of Rome could help us to create a "level playing field" in trade. We need to consider fresh marketing support, not only for the beef sector but for the whole industry. We should try to improve the advice and research available to farmers. Someone spoke in an earlier debate about farming our way out of the crisis. That cannot be the whole solution, but it can be a part of it. It is a source of shame that the Government have cut the agricultural research budget.

We need a package of aid. The Minister talked about keeping that in proportion. The proportions are there for him to see: I have already mentioned the fall in incomes and the scaling down of the industry. In response, we surely need a proportionate multi-million pound aid package.

Members of all parties on the Select Committee highlighted the fact that the Government seem to lack a strategic vision for agriculture. We need that long-term vision, as well as the short-term aid, if Britain's farmers are to be reassured that they have the support of the House in competing with other nations in feeding the world, as Britain has done in the past and will do again in the future.

Mr. Mark Todd (South Derbyshire): I want to do something that, I regret to have to say, for the Whips' benefit, is slightly unusual for me, and compliment my right hon. Friend the Minister on a thoughtful speech that drew out many of the consensual elements that exist in the House on the subject. He made this a much more positive and interesting debate than it would otherwise have been, and I warmly commend him for that. The farmers whom I represent have already told me how much they welcome his role and his listening function, and I am sure that hon. Members of all parties agree with that. The strategy remains much the same, but there was a need to listen and to learn, and I think that he has done that.

We should also welcome the progress that has been made on the beef ban. A critical further step in lifting it was taken today, but there is far, far more to do: we must get the ban lifted on beef off the bone, then beef on the bone, and then livestock. Beyond that, we need to win back the markets that we have lost. One of the critical issues, on which I would welcome a ministerial opinion, is whether we can assist our agricultural sector to win back those markets in the future. We have started to hear encouraging noises and a recognition of the problems that the industry faces. Now is the time to turn that into firm policy.

We should compliment the Government on persuading the retailers to adopt a clearer position on defending the strengths of British agriculture and being more honest with their consumers. That has required substantial work by the Government and a recognition by retailers of the strong public consensus on the matter. Both sides of the House should commend that.

Any steps that we take to put together a short-term package must be consistent with a long-term strategy. In dealing with the crises—I use the plural—that we have faced in farming, we have tended to look for short-term fixes and ways of supporting farmers into the next crisis that they will face in due course, instead of looking at the medium to long-term future of farming in Britain.

Hon. Members have implied that, for the first time ever, small farmers are winding up their businesses or transferring them to larger farmers, but that has been going on for decades, and will continue. I should be sorry if any steps that we took impeded the normal process of the market in moving towards more competitive units or more focused—[Interruption.] Hon. Members may disagree, but there is an alternative—more focused attention to niche markets or diversification in the use of farm assets.

We should encourage farmers to explore all those possibilities. We should not give temporary lifelines to businesses that have no honest long-term future. I say that baldly, as I have said it to the farmers whom I represent—10 days ago I spent three hours speaking to a dozen of them in my constituency. I do not have a habit of pulling punches with them, and I would not do so in the House. Some farmers are in unsustainable businesses and we must help them to find alternative uses for their assets or alternative occupations. We cannot fool people that they can maintain their businesses in the future as they have done in the past.

If we are to extend the calf processing scheme, which I believe should be extended, we must carefully balance that against the conditions that those producers will face in a freer—but not free—market, once the ban is lifted. We must recognise that that market is in surplus across Europe, which is a tough marketplace.

I empathise with those who say that we must scrutinise the relative costs of our regulatory regime. I do not question the animal health or food safety aspects of that regulation, but I question the cost burdens that are passed through the industry and whether our officials have learnt enough from the approach taken by other countries in tackling those tasks in an EU regime. I do not believe that we learn enough from other countries that have the same tasks as we have, but undertake them with greater efficiency and sensitivity.

Our longer-term strategy needs far more work. That strategy is the business of Government because we spend £4 billion a year supporting the sector, and we should be concerned about whether that money is well spent.

We have no obvious grasp of a rural development strategy. If by a miracle of miracles an agreement was struck tomorrow on Agenda 2000, and a large amount of money was transferred to rural development, we would have little idea of what to do with it. We have developed little thinking in that area. We were slow to take up the opportunity of objective 5b funding in rural areas. We will be similarly slow to take our opportunities on rural development.

We cannot hold off on development of a long-term strategy simply by saying that it is a matter of common agricultural policy reform. We have to serve our farming community and our citizens, and that obligation overrides others. We should be quite clear about our responsibilities. A long-term strategy is also the best way to persuade our European partners to reform their practices. If we have a clear vision of our own, we will be more persuasive.

We should also recognise fully that the strategy in Agenda 2000 will not succeed in the World Trade Organisation negotiations. We should own to our responsibility to look beyond those limited proposals towards what the marketplace for farming will be like in 10 years time. We have not yet done that thoroughly. The Government need to think carefully about how short-term measures, which are of course welcome, can be balanced with a long-term strategy that will be tough, but to which many positive, market-oriented farmers look forward with enthusiasm.

Mr. William Thompson (West Tyrone): It is right that we should debate the tremendous crisis in the farming industry, highlighting the difficulties that farmers are going through. After the general election, I was surprised by the attitude of the Government. They seemed to be much against farmers. We were told that the Government had poured between £3 billion and £4 billion into the BSE crisis, that farmers had had enough money and that the Exchequer would not give them any more. The then Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food was fairly combative, and he seemed not to be very sympathetic to farmers.

The power of the Ministry seems to have reduced greatly. We seem to be under the control of Europe, which decides our agricultural policy. We can do little without the consent and approval of Europe. Unfortunately, the only power we seem to have is the power of persuasion. We seem unable to threaten, but merely to persuade. However, it would be churlish of me not to recognise the work done by the previous Minister on BSE, which resulted in the lifting of the export ban in Northern Ireland. Now that the ban has been lifted, though, we are recognising the difficulties of exporting beef. Markets have changed. There is a surplus of meat in Europe. The standards that must be met before beef is exported are high. It will be a long time before Northern Ireland exports the same percentage of beef as it did before BSE. We need a good marketing operation to persuade people that our beef is the best.

The farming crisis has hit Northern Ireland particularly badly because farming is our chief industry. The pig industry has been badly hit by the fire at Lovell and Christmas, where, overnight, the number of pigs that could go to the factory was reduced by 40 per cent. The situation in Northern Ireland is perhaps much worse than that on the mainland.

[Mr. William Thompson]

I welcome the change in the Government's approach. It seems that they have recognised that there is a serious farming crisis. That was noticeable this evening in the message given by the new Minister of Agriculture. I think that we would all agree that since he was appointed to his post he has spoken to farmers and has an appreciation of their needs and the difficulties that they face. We saw that sympathetic approach this evening.

It is always easy to argue against someone who is incompatible. It is more difficult to argue against someone who agrees with us all the time. The problem tonight is that the Government have agreed with everything that the Opposition have said. The Minister seems to agree that the various points that we have been making are true.

I welcome the Minister's speech, which drew a response from both sides of the House. We have promises that a range of proposals will be coming forward and that the calf processing aid scheme will be reconsidered and that various other things will be given careful consideration. We have promises and we have expectations. I am sure that the farming community will look forward to delivery of its expectations, and the sooner it comes, the better.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I had the opportunity last week to listen to Ben Gill, the president of the National Farmers Union, who came to talk to local farmers. The meeting took place in the constituency of the hon. Member for Cotswold (Mr. Clifton-Brown) but there were plenty of representatives from my constituency.

In quite a wide-ranging speech, Ben Gill made two key points and—this shows how things have changed—I almost entirely agreed with him. First, he said that if farmers were to look for reform they had to understand that value added had to start from the bottom up instead of the way in which the food chain now operates, which works downwards from the retailer's margin. Secondly, he said there must be much greater collaboration among farmers. Ben Gill would not attach the word co-operation to those aims although I would. Certainly there is a need for a new way of working.

Ben Gill's third point was particularly valid. Whether speaking on his own behalf or that of the NFU, he was quite worried about pressure from the United States in terms of the agri-chemical business and the changes that this is making to British agriculture. I share his misgivings.

As there is a shortage of time I shall merely add to the points made by Ben Gill and try to find solutions rather than continuing to analyse difficulties, crises and long-term problems. First, we must recognise that although we are much in favour of help in the form of environmental subsidies and aid, farming is still an important part of the rural economy. It must be recognised that there is such a thing as an economically sensitive area and provide support accordingly. That is so important in the context of tenant farmers and other farmers who are not necessarily from the wealthier end of the farming community.

Secondly, we must recognise—this goes back partly to the point made by Ben Gill last week—that farming must be put much more on a business footing. I have nothing but respect for the way in which farmers farm, but, from an outsider's perspective, I see the limited business experience that some farmers have and their genuine need for help in terms of training. In addition, we must look at ways in which markets could be made more easily accessible for farmers.

Thirdly, I am sure that hon. Members would agree that the centralisation of the food supply may have gone too far. Even though there have been advantages in that food standards, hygiene and safety have become paramount, we must recognise that food can be supplied locally. A localised food supply is not only what consumers appear to want, but represents a saving in transport costs and an increase in choice. If we can make progress on that, we might begin to arrive at long-term solutions to an extremely difficult short-term problem.

9.45 pm

Mr. Owen Paterson (North Shropshire): The Secretary of State charmed us all with his speech and his generosity in taking interventions, but I fear that he has underestimated the seriousness of the crisis. An industry whose turnover has dropped from £4 billion to less than £1 billion in two years is, by any definition, in crisis.

Today at the Oswestry auctions, lambs were fetching as little as 61p per kilo on average—about half what they fetched two years ago—and one farmer told me that the sheep industry is "a total disaster". I should like to give the Government a few quick, practical measures that would be of immediate help to the sheep industry.

The farmer I spoke to said that "the Government had panicked about slaughtering costs". There is an abattoir near to my home that employs four meat inspectors, one vet and only four other employees. It sends a cheque every Monday morning for £3,880 to Chester. That is crazy. We must reduce those costs, which are a burden to all farmers. The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs reported on "The Present Crisis in the Welsh Livestock Industry" on 20 May, but we have yet to receive a reply from the Government. We were told that we would receive a reply just after the recess, but have not yet got one.

Finally on the subject of sheep, I acknowledge that the Government are good at spin and controlling publicity and ask them to address themselves to the dangers of maverick, publicity-seeking scientists bursting on to the radio waves and, with one or two sentences, causing severe damage to the livestock industry. That is what happened to the sheep industry in the summer.

Turning to the beef industry, there is a crisis. Good finished bullocks were fetching 75p to 78p per kilo today at Oswestry—way down on the £1.10 to £1.20 per kilo they were fetching a couple of years ago; and stores are making only £120. The future is bleak. In such a climate, it is crazy to consider abandoning the calf scheme. I was pleased by the Minister's equivocation on the point, because, on commercial and animal welfare grounds, some form of the scheme must continue. Before arbitrarily ending it, a way out must be considered, so I suggest that the Minister reads this week's Farmers Guardian, which contains an interesting article about the potential veal market on the continent.

Hon. Members on both sides expressed doubt about our ability to reopen the beef market. One exporter in Inverurie had a substantial business: a third of his turnover—£14 million to £15 million—came from exports to Holland, Italy and France. I stress that the meat was almost entirely beef on the bone. That exporter said today:

"They know that what they are getting from the rest of Europe is rubbish. They want British beef for quality. Australia, New Zealand and southern Ireland do not compare."

Prior to the BSE crisis, he had a £42 million turnover, but that figure is now down to £30 million. He reckons that he could get at least one truck per week back tomorrow if the beef ban could be lifted.

We have heard good news today, but we have yet to see any practical gains. I appeal to the Government to threaten our EU partners with a return to the European Court if they fail to lift the ban, because it is rank hypocrisy to continue it. We in this country have taken the measures needed to make our meat safe and the response has not been good enough. From British cattle exported in the past five years, the Germans should have picked out 285 cases of BSE, but they have picked out only five. We know that there are now no human or animal health grounds for banning British beef.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: It is politics.

Mr. Paterson: It is entirely politics, as my hon. Friend says.

In the dying two minutes of my speech, I turn briefly to milk, where there is also a crisis. Milk prices are down to 18p or 19p a litre. I am delighted that the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has returned to hear that farmers reckon to break even when they are receiving between 14p and 18p. A 4p quota on top of that price means that they cannot make money. The money tied up in quota would far better be invested in ring parlours and modern equipment so that we can compete with countries such as New Zealand and Argentina, where milk production has increased by 28 and 36 per cent. respectively in the same time that European production has marginally dwindled. A large dairy farmer in my constituency said:

"Quotas are holding Europeans back as we are in a supply-controlled economy."

When the Minister replies, will he clarify the Government's view on the end of milk quotas in the Agenda 2000 reforms?

9.50 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Only the shortness of time prevents me from being able to refer to each of the 11 excellent speeches by Members on both sides of the House. It says something about the way in which we conduct our affairs that it is possible to say that.

It is clear that the industry is in crisis. The Country Landowners Association has told us that upland farmers are earning substantially less than £10,000 a year. Letters from the Tenant Farmers Association tell us that hill farmers are making less than £7,000 a year. In the west country, where I come from, The Western Morning News is full of examples—for which I give it full credit—of people living in the most dire circumstances. A report commissioned by that newspaper reveals that the average farming enterprise in the west country is made up of a husband, wife and full-time working son, who will work between them more than 140 hours a week, for which the average return is about 85p an hour—way below any average minimum wage.

Such figures make one realise that the industry is in crisis and given the financial havoc that that wreaks on farming families, it is small wonder that the Farmers Weekly, as several hon. Members have mentioned, last week discussed not money and the prices of food or cereal, but farmers who are driven to the verge of desperation. I have never before seen an editorial in a farming magazine putting out the number for the Samaritans. That is no idle comment because it is obvious to anyone who reads the agricultural press that farming suicides occur about once a week. That is the measure of the crisis in British agriculture.

Conservative Members have never made the case that the crisis started on 1 May last year. The indictment has never been that the Government are to blame; it is that the crisis was manifest and the Government were not acting.

I pay due credit to the way in which the Minister has spoken tonight. Mood music matters, and the right hon. Gentleman's approach is in marked contrast to that of the Secretary of State for Health, who at a rural health forum last week contemptuously dismissed the idea that it was necessary to put any money into a study on rural deprivation.

The Minister has come across as an absolute sweetie tonight, but he has been in control for the past three months and he could in the first three hours have lifted the ban on beef on the bone. Soft music matters, but the Government have presided over the beef ban longer than the previous Conservative Administration. The conditions set down in Florence were met even before the previous election. Developments only last week, when the Commission took action on the BSE crisis in Portugal, will give cover to those in Europe who want to ensure that even now the beef ban is not lifted. The Minister should consider the way in which tallow has been treated recently. We are still waiting for a visit from the Commission to consider our arrangements on that. He will understand why I am not convinced that we are standing on the threshold of an instant lifting of the ban.

On agrimonetary funds, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) made it clear that if circumstances changed he would certainly revisit the debate. It is common ground that the situation has changed.

I commend the Minister of Agriculture. There is no doubt that he has tonight conceded the case that has been constantly made by Conservative Members. Moreover, he has accepted many of the measures that we set out in "Fair Deal for Farmers".

We need to study the detail. I note what the Minister said about arrangements that he has reached with supermarkets, but he said nothing about food produced by means that would be illegal in this country. I therefore tell the Minister that we shall want another debate soon. We shall want a debate in Government time to allow us to examine carefully the measures that he intends to bring before the House.

By standing four square by the country community, the Conservative party has produced this change of heart. I say to the Minister: the jury is out on the Minister of Agriculture. I commend him for having the humility to admit that the jury is out, but we shall return to the subject.

The Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. Jeff Rooker): In the short time available—for which I do not apologise, as in last week's debate I spoke for 40 minutes with a dozen interventions—I praise my right hon. Friend the Minister's tour de force tonight. I thank everyone who has spoken for the way in which they made their case, and I thank my right hon. Friend for the way in which he listened. It is no bad thing to have agriculture debates two weeks running. Those who have listened to the debate and who read the pages of Hansard will see the footprints of the farming community across the pages of Hansard in the speeches that were made tonight.

I say almost as an aside that there has been near tripartisanship in the House tonight. To send the right signals to the farming community in this country and to those abroad, we must win friends and influence people. Therefore, on reflection, the Opposition might not want to press their motion to a vote.

Last week, I told the House the totals of subsidies paid by Government to farming. Those are very substantial sums of money, one of which my right hon. Friend the Minister mentioned tonight—the global sum of £600 million a year paid to the hill farming community. When I was walking a hill farm in Cumbria last Friday morning, having listened to farmers the previous evening, I promised hill farmers that I would give others pause for thought by expressing their point of view tonight.

About £20 million a year in farming subsidy goes into the Lake district. The income generated from tourism there is estimated at £580 million a year. No one would argue that that massive tourism income would be generated if the Lake district and the county of Cumbria were not looked after as they are. Therefore, although we must express the subsidy figure as £600 million because it is taxpayer's money, that figure is not the be-all and end-all. That money comes back to the Exchequer in other ways, which are not generally accepted by the accountants, who look at matters in a cold, clinical way.

I thank my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for coming to the debate tonight to listen to the points that were made in the wind-up. My right hon. Friend is a friend indeed.

The decision taken in Brussels today is important. Today's decision—and, I hope, the decision later this month—to lift the beef ban is very symbolic. However, no one should allow themselves to believe that beef will start to be exported until a long time after that decision, as we know from the case in Northern Ireland. The date-based scheme is slightly different. The industry will need to invest considerably because of the details of the scheme as they relate to cutting plants and abattoirs.

A substantial marketing operation will be needed, especially as there is overproduction of the product and we have lost markets. It will take a long time to win back the market. However, it is highly symbolic that the safety of British food and British beef will be recognised without exception, and that will have a ripple effect on the rest of the food industry.

We cannot deny the voluntary actions taken by supermarkets, which are currently much unloved by the community—both the farming community and the wider community—although they have been managing to take people's money by successfully converting themselves into banks. Nevertheless, supermarkets have been making their own case with rather less panache. Yesterday, they committed themselves—particularly on pigmeat, including Parma ham, the supply of which is very limited—not to import, from 1 January 1999, pigmeat products from countries that do not provide a genuinely and absolutely level playing field.

Question accordingly agreed to.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER forthwith declared the main Question, as amended, to be agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House welcomes the Government's strong commitment to the United Kingdom farming industry and to the wider rural economy; recognises that the lifting of the beef export ban in Northern Ireland represents the first crucial step towards lifting the ban from all parts of the United Kingdom; welcomes the steps which the Government has taken since May 1997 to support the beef and sheep industry via EU agri-monetary compensation and relief from charges; acknowledges the steps taken specifically to help the sheep, pig and cereal sectors with targeted EU measures; and endorses the Government's intention to bring about a secure and viable future for United Kingdom farming by seeking a reformed Common Agricultural Policy, which is more economically rational, which reduces the bureaucratic burden on farmers, which enhances targeted support for the rural economy, which serves the consumer well and which contains fair and common rules to ensure that the United Kingdom's farming and food industries can exploit their competitive advantages in European and world markets.

PETITION

Benefit Integrity Project

Mr. Nigel Waterson (Eastbourne): I beg leave to present a petition from my constituency about the benefit integrity project as it applies to the chronically disabled. The petition says that it refers in particular to women between the ages of 60 and 65, whilst the over-65s are amongst the groups exempt from this project. Sadly, it is not likely that disabled people of this age are going to get better, or need less care.

The petition is signed by nearly 700 of my constituents, in particular Mrs. Diane Roberts, who prepared it. It continues:

The Petitioners therefore request, with respect to the House, that the House amend the minimum exemption age to 60, and allow the elderly Life Award Chronic Disabled to live their difficult, stressful and painful lives without the added worry of benefit cuts, and being under suspicion of fraud. The Petitioners ask, with respect, on behalf of all the disabled and their, at best, poorly paid carers, for the House to look again at the Benefit Integrity Project, not to take away such benefits, but give them some much needed help.

And the Petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Information Warfare

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Clelland.]

10.26 pm

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): I am delighted that I have been able to bring up the subject of information warfare tonight. I had hoped to be able to take part in the recent debate on the strategic defence review, but was unsuccessful. However, I now have half an hour of the Minister's undivided attention, which is infinitely better.

If anybody thinks about information warfare—not many do—they think it the stuff of science fiction. Indeed, I can remember reading a novel that uses information warfare techniques for criminal purposes. Having taken an interest in the subject, the more I think about it, the more I am convinced that this country is not able to defend itself from an attack that could happen at any time.

I read the strategic defence review document to try to find out what is planned to tackle the problem, and found references to it only in paragraph 34, which defined information warfare, and paragraph 35, which merely said:

"While we cannot predict the detailed impact of such changes over twenty years, we have taken a hard look at how we can seek to make the most of emerging trends in all areas of the Review, including how to adapt our requirements and procurement processes so that we are not left behind by the speed of change."

I then wrote to the Minister for Defence Procurement, who is in the other place. He quoted me paragraphs 16 and 17 of supporting essay 3, entitled "The Impact of Technology", which, frankly, was not much more enlightening. It could be described as a blizzard of words.

I am sure that Ministers and officials are concerned about the threat, and undoubtedly are working hard to counter it. My concern is that it must be countered as effectively as humanly possible, and I am not sure that the United Kingdom is doing that.

The neatest and shortest explanation of information warfare that I have found so far is contained in the review. It says:

"information warfare attacks through the computer systems on which both our forces and civil society increasingly depend."

The military no longer has its own specifications for computer equipment. With the demand from civilian life far outstripping that from the military, high-tech equipment such as computers, chips, motherboards and all the paraphernalia that now make our lives so much easier is interchangeable. That could allow some person or group of evil intent, with the necessary expertise—not so difficult to come by nowadays—to attack computer systems and networks both in the military sphere and in crucial areas of civilian life.

For example, the whole of the Ministry of Defence budget, at some time or another, goes through the City of London's banking system; military planes and helicopters cannot move without civilian air traffic control; nothing can be operated without access to electricity, which is produced in the civilian sphere; and military communications use private sector-owned landlines, cables and satellites.

If only one terrorist group, pressure group, foreign intelligence service, foreign power, rogue military or criminal used only one computer buff, any one or all of those systems could be closed down and the country brought to its knees. It does not take a lot of imagination to envisage a good computer hacker getting into the chip that controls a pumping station and instructing the national electricity grid to shut down, and the mind boggles at someone getting into the air traffic control computers. The banking system and the City of London could be bled dry, and every penny sent to an offshore address, or our telecommunication and data systems could be closed down.

Those would be civilian disasters, but every scenario that I have described affects the MOD directly, and the country would lie defenceless at the mercy of whoever wished to defeat it, without a shot being fired or our forces alerted. There is no point in saying, "But it wouldn't happen." It already does. Banks have had money misappropriated by hackers, and I understand that our air traffic control system, which is regarded as robust, has already suffered from "spoofing" as someone tried to get information from it. The new system, which will be Europewide, will be even more open and, hence, much more vulnerable.

Everyone who uses computers—people in utilities, banks, telecommunications and the defence industry—uses commercial systems and commercial software. The software is written all over the world. Everyone uses subcontractors. I understand that there are about 60 microprocessors in Eurofighter alone. Does anyone know exactly where they were made and who has written the software?

Many people use subcontractors for the maintenance of their computer systems. I am told by those who know about these things that "maintenance ports" are often left open. That provides an easy way into the system.

I hope that I have made it clear that any developed country using modern technology is vulnerable to information warfare attack. The real question is, how are we going to defend ourselves? We will need to do so—we cannot escape it.

In the mid-1990s, President Yeltsin said:

"While maintaining our nuclear potential at proper level, we need to devote more attention to developing the entire range and means of information warfare."

The cold war may have ended, but cold war warriors are aware of the potential of this threat.

For information and ideas, I turned to the United States. Given the lack of information in the strategic defence review, I suspected that there was not much available from official sources in the United Kingdom, such as the MOD. How right I was. I searched the internet, appropriately enough. Did I find anything at all from the United Kingdom, in the new age of freedom of information? Not a dicky-bird.

The United States was different, and the entries were enlightening. There were 48, and one site explained what the United States Navy information warfare division at Port Mugu was doing to combat information warfare. Another site, which gave a good description of information warfare, has been visited 5,363 times since 14 July this year, which is an average of more than 300 visits a week. Two of them were mine. That shows that there is quite an interest in the subject.

In November 1996, the American Under-Secretary of Defence for Acquisition and Technology received a report from the Defence Science Board task force on information warfare. It is available in full on the internet and is unclassified. The report recommended a series of actions, the prime one being that the most effective defence against information warfare attack is to ensure that everyone is aware of the issue. The United States has gone public.

I understand that the United States Department of Defence is working with all the industries most closely affected, such as the ones that I have mentioned. The Department has already sanctioned penetration tests of 12,000 supposedly secure sites. It has discovered that 90 per cent. had been penetrated and, of that 90 per cent., 95 per cent. had been undetected. Another check in 1997 showed that those already appalling statistics had become much worse.

In the light of that, what are we doing to defend ourselves in the United Kingdom? Have we made any assessment of our vulnerability? Have we put in place key point protection systems? After all, a guard and a dog at a pumping station cannot protect the chip in the pump from the computer hacker.

Does the Minister agree with the US theory that the best method of defence is wide knowledge and awareness? If he does, what is he doing about it? When will I see his policies and actions on the internet? If he does not, can he tell me and our best allies why he disagrees? It does not cost money to share information between defence and civilian industries, so the Treasury will not object. Has he invited the relevant industries to a meeting to discuss how to protect themselves and develop their awareness and education of the threat?

The resilience of our military and civilian computer systems can be enhanced at only modest cost. Has the hon. Gentleman asked for estimates? Has the Ministry of Defence developed a threat assessment that he could share with us? Has the MOD plans to create an incident report and response system? Is work going on to develop standards for information warfare and monitor their effectiveness? What is being done to ensure that protection against IW attack is a key requirement of all procurement activity? All that is defensive, so is any thought being given to developing our own attack systems? I am sure that the Minister is not complacent and will be able to reassure me that all those questions have answers that will satisfy me.

Finally, I urge the Minister, in the spirit of freedom of information and open government, to share what is happening in information warfare with the rest of the United Kingdom and with the United States—they are, I believe, happy to share their information and technology with us.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): I congratulate the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait) on her success in securing today's Adjournment debate on an issue of such importance not merely to the security of the United Kingdom, but to our ability to secure the economic and industrial benefits that new information technologies bring. I also thank her for informing me previously of the outline of her speech; I hope that our debate will be more productive as a result. I had hoped that my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces would be able to reply, as I understand that he and the hon. Lady were at the same university, but unfortunately he is on Government business elsewhere tonight.

The Government are fully alive to the threats posed by information warfare to information infrastructure in defence and in government more widely and also to the national infrastructure, which the hon. Lady highlighted. However, I must make it clear to the House that some of the wilder speculation in the media is not founded in fact.

The Government are working closely with key players in the private sector and with our allies internationally, in particular the United States, to ensure that protection of the national information infrastructure is as robust as possible.

Everyone recognises how our dependence on available information increases daily and the hon. Lady detailed some examples. That is not a unique Ministry of Defence or Government occurrence, but affects all corners of public and private life. Corporate networks, for instance, are essential to the effective management of all large organisations and, as the hon. Lady mentioned, those networks are increasingly interconnected.

In addition, the internet has emerged as a potent medium which has the potential to give every individual connected to a telephone line anywhere in the world access to information systems. The significance of that has not been overlooked by the Government.

Integrated information capabilities create a broader canvas on which to use and share information. That has tremendous benefits, not least in improving the effectiveness of our decision making. However, that wider interconnectivity also makes computer systems vulnerable to attack, as the hon. Lady rightly pointed out.

Attempts by hackers using the internet to gain access to systems are a popular subject for newspapers; they certainly make good copy and even good dramatic material for films, but we must keep them in perspective. Such attacks can originate from a wide range of adversaries, who may include terrorists and criminals as well as mischievous and malevolent individuals; they are no respecters of international boundaries. Ill-disposed insiders are also a threat to many organisations.

Unless appropriate protective measures are taken, there is a risk that information held in computers may be copied, stolen or deleted. A wide range of techniques can be used—I do not intend to discuss them here. However, it is widely known that they could include the misuse of software to transmit computer viruses or to leave small additions to existing software applications that could be activated later to damage or retransmit the information held by that computer—so-called Trojan horses. I assure the hon. Lady that such vulnerabilities in systems in all areas of government and in our national infrastructure and commerce are taken very seriously.

Hon. Members will understand why the Ministry of Defence is especially concerned with those issues, and I shall give some insight into the sort of security measures that the Government take by describing how the MOD approaches the subject.

Within the MOD, the need to guard against risks to computer systems and communications has long been recognised, and procedures and security mechanisms are in place to protect those vital assets. Those mechanisms protect secrets, they protect against damage and they authenticate recipients of information. That involves a combination of physical, people-based and technical measures.

[Mr. John Spellar]

Physical measures are part of the legacy of the United Kingdom's experience from the cold war and of our response to terrorism. We undertake regular risk and vulnerability assessments of our bases, buildings and personnel security as well as the infrastructure of our information services.

Personnel security involves training and vetting and has always been a keystone in achieving assured security. Technical measures are based on accredited security products deployed within an architecture that prevents unauthorised access to systems or to the information that they hold. We use nationally developed and approved cryptographic protection, firewalls to limit access between interconnected systems and so-called air gaps or one-way information valves around systems that hold sensitive material.

Protective measures are built into systems during their design and are accredited through a central process within the MOD. Audits of systems and procedures are conducted, and penetration testing is routinely undertaken to check for any previously unrecognised vulnerability.

As the hon. Lady said, the MOD, like all Departments and users, needs to use commercial products in many of its systems. The functionality provided by the commercial market cannot be rivalled through bespoke MOD development. The MOD has a policy to use commercial products wherever possible; that brings economy of scale and ensures that the MOD obtains maximum value for money. As she also rightly said, however, that brings its own risks.

Procedures and techniques are in place to minimise the risk associated with a commercial procurement strategy. First, many defence systems stand alone; they are not connected to the outside world because they do not need to be. Secondly, we have a requirement that key commercial applications be approved by independent UK accreditors before they can be used in any sensitive context.

The MOD supports a substantial research programme, which looks ahead and analyses the potential impact of new techniques in information technology, assessing their utility to military operations as well as any risk that they represent to existing and future defence systems.

The MOD takes an active stance, along with industry, in involving itself with the industrial standards bodies to ensure that the security standards set for the next generation of information technology can be applied with minimum further investment by the MOD.

To protect against possible information warfare incidents against the United Kingdom, there is a Government-wide unified incident reporting and alert scheme—UNIRAS—which collates all anomalies that are reported to it by those in the Government. It must be appreciated that UNIRAS attracts real incidents, false alarms and accidents, as well as physical events such as theft and destruction.

On 11 May, I answered a question on incidents involving the MOD from the hon. Member for Truro and St. Austell (Mr. Taylor), saying that, up to that time, there was no evidence of a successful intrusion from an external source to any MOD computer system. I stand by that answer today.

Mrs. Lait: Is there any evidence of key protection points being penetrated, and has that been registered on UNIRAS? The Americans have some very worrying statistics about the penetration of key protection points.

Mr. Spellar: I will seek more information, as I did not have notice of that question, and write to the hon. Lady, subject to the usual constraints.

The United Kingdom is routinely involved in military operations with coalition partners. The strategic defence review reflected the fact that this trend is likely to be accentuated. There are special issues of information protection when our national systems need to work with those of our allies. Again, we exploit the full range of physical, people-based and technical measures to ensure that we are not exposed to new risks. We also endeavour to provide good protection across shared systems and their associated multinational infrastructures.

The MOD places a high priority on maintaining strong working relationships with our allies through forums where security standards and operating procedures are developed, as well as through a network of bilateral arrangements.

A discussion of defence against information warfare cannot be complete without reference to the wider implications to Government and commercial infrastructures. United Kingdom Governments have a good record of protecting our assets against both traditional and unconventional threats. The UK has had to deal over many years with a terrorist threat that has targeted Government, commerce and infrastructure. Information warfare is equivalent in its potential.

The knowledge and lessons learned from our experience of counter-terrorism stand us in good stead for the new threat that information warfare might pose. In particular, our experience makes it easier for the Government to work closely with key private sector players who are also well aware of the possible dangers to their own information systems.

The Government's record of maintaining a high standard of computer security is good, and we have been justifiably cautious about interconnection, but we shall look hard at existing arrangements for protecting information and information systems. We need to ensure that our policies and procedures keep pace with the fast-moving environment of information technology and we hope to announce new initiatives shortly, designed to ensure that the critical national infrastructure is adequately defended.

Protecting against information warfare is not the province of one country alone but, as I hope that I have shown, affects all who want to benefit from the advantages of greater interconnectivity. Threats from attacks on information systems are not bounded by traditional territorial boundaries. It is imperative that international co-operation and co-ordination are actively pursued.

The Government are actively addressing the threat of information warfare and the risks posed by the wider exploitation of new information technologies and greater interconnectivity of computers; we are doing so robustly, in close co-operation with our allies, with the private sector and across government.

The UK is well placed in its understanding of the risks and how those can be controlled in the emerging world where interconnectivity is as vital to defence as it is to national infrastructure, commerce and the "knowledge economy". We cannot be complacent, if only because this is such a fast-moving subject, but I can assure hon. Members that we are taking all possible measures to ensure that our information is secure.

The MOD, and Government more generally, are addressing the risks posed by the greater exploitation of new information technology, and they are doing so from the bedrock of tried and tested security policies and procedures.

The United Kingdom has a history and wealth of experience in dealing with unconventional threats, to which information warfare is a successor. Protection against attack by information warfare is not the sole domain of the MOD. We are active in the national and international, commercial and industrial arena, particularly in regard to the close relationship that the UK enjoys with the United States, in exchanging and discussing current information warfare issues.

In addition, the Government hope to announce shortly a package of measures that will further ensure that key IT systems in government and in the critical national infrastructure are adequately defended against the threat posed by information warfare.

I hope that I have demonstrated that the Government have been concerned to strike the right balance on this relatively new but, as the hon. Lady rightly said, extremely important subject.

There is a good level of defence in place to protect key systems in the MOD and more widely in government. I thank the hon. Lady for introducing the debate. I expect that this is not the last that we have heard of the topic, but she can be assured that we are taking effective action.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at ten minutes to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

TREASURY

The Chancellor of the Exchequer was asked—

Hypothecation

1. Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): What assessment he has made of the advantages of extending the principle of hypothecation in the tax system. [56858]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Byers): In general, the Government determine their expenditure according to need, not according to the sources of their revenue. However, we will continue to look at each case on its merits.

Mr. Gorrie: The answer is encouraging in so far as it goes. The first stage should be to find a more friendly word. "Hypothecation", like subsidiarity, is an excellent concept but not a good word—perhaps we should use the word "earmarking". What will the Government do to encourage the earmarking of national or local taxes or charges for a specific related purpose? For example, office parking charges or road pricing could fund improvements in local public transport or, as Lord Marshall proposed, national taxes on energy could be spent on energy efficiency.

Mr. Byers: We said in our transport White Paper that we would consider carefully any pilot schemes in which revenues were earmarked for particular purposes. Our general view is that we need, as a Government, to identify our own priorities. That is why we have committed £40 billion to hospitals and schools over the period of the comprehensive spending review—spending that Her Majesty's official Opposition have still not supported.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his answer will give great encouragement? He said that he would look at the issue on its merits, which I have never before heard said about this matter; so I am grateful for that. I share the usual Treasury view that hypothecation is a danger. However, there is a case for it in one instance—the national health service. Expenditure on the health service will not fall, which is one of the problems with hypothecation, and an increase in any tax related to health service expenditure could command widespread support.

Mr. Byers: There are always presentational arguments for earmarking taxation, but the Government's fundamental principle is that we need to identify our priorities as a Government and allocate resources accordingly. The health service will, of course, benefit from that approach, as we are committing an extra £21 billion to it over the three years from next April. Moreover, on Tuesday, in his pre-Budget report, the Chancellor committed a further £250 million this year to ensure effective health care across the country.

Mr. David Ruffley (Bury St. Edmunds): On earmarking tax revenues, may I draw the attention of the Chief Secretary to a report in The Independent today, which states that Ministers want to let the married couples allowance "wither on the vine"? Is that report true? If so, would that not represent yet another tax increase on childless married couples?

Mr. Byers: I have not seen that report. One of the reasons that I do not read The Independent is that I do not always believe the stories that it covers. The hon. Gentleman will have to wait and see, but, if I were him, I would not rely on reports in The Independent.

Productivity Seminars

2. Jane Griffiths (Reading, East): If he will make a statement on his recent productivity seminars. [56859]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): With business, we are putting in place a strategy to tackle the long-term economic weakness of a 40 per cent. productivity gap between this country and our most successful competitors. The pre-Budget report sets out what we must do in the coming year to help to equip the British economy for the challenges ahead.

Jane Griffiths: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in constituencies such as mine, where unemployment is almost zero, there is no cause for complacency, and that productivity is a key to achieving all our targets?

Mr. Brown: I agree that productivity is a central issue for the British economy. The director-general of the Confederation of British Industry told its conference that our productivity is 37 per cent. behind that of the United States and that the big picture is clear. The CBI agrees about the action that is necessary. I believe that our discussions with British business will yield results, and I have always said that we will make changes in the Budget, in regulations or in public spending, if necessary—if a case is proven—to help to bridge the productivity gap. The only party that does not seem to be willing to join the debate is the Conservative party.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the Chancellor acknowledge that, in the seminars, business leaders have argued that productivity is predominantly their responsibility and that the Government's responsibility is to create the climate in which they can compete? The 0.5 per cent. reduction in interest rates announced this morning is welcome, but do we not have to go a lot further down that road before we are competitive in Europe and have a sustainable exchange rate? What policies will the Chancellor pursue to help the Bank of England to deliver interest rates that are much closer to the European average?

Mr. Brown: Of course I welcome the Bank's decision. I think that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the most important thing that the Government can do is to create a long-term framework for monetary and fiscal stability. That is exactly what we have done by making the Bank of England independent, tackling the inflationary pressures in the economy and cutting the fiscal deficit by £20 billion. Of course we must work with business to tackle any barrier to productivity that exists in our economy. That is why we are looking at the future of competition policy and at regulation in some areas, and why we have agreed to look at some aspects of the tax system.

The extra £20 billion that we are to spend on education over the next three years will make a huge difference to our ability not only to give an opportunity to every child and student who wants it, but to deliver an efficient economy. It is a pity, again, that the Conservative party cannot support that.

Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory (Wells): Is the Chancellor aware that, according to his own figures, the additional tax and regulatory burden on British industry will amount to £39 billion over this Parliament? The figure comes from published tax revenues and from compliance cost assessments published by Government Departments. Instead of lecturing British industry about productivity, will the Chancellor do something to reduce the daily burden on its ability to compete in international markets? Will he immediately take steps to repeal regulations and remove the additional burdens before they do more damage to employment? Above all, will he stop blaming British industry for Government failings?

Mr. Brown: The first people to draw attention to the productivity gap in British industry were the previous Government, in the competitiveness White Papers that they published every year, saying that we had to do better.

We have cut corporation tax twice, to 30p, and small business tax twice, to 20p; we have introduced a long-term rate of capital gains tax at 10p; and in the first year we have cut regulations by 30 per cent. from what they were under the Conservative Government. The Conservatives want us to abandon our proposals for a national minimum wage and a working families tax credit. If those things work in America, they can work in Britain.

Jobs and Inflation

3. Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): When he next expects to meet the Governor of the Bank of England to discuss jobs and inflation. [56860]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): I meet the Governor of the Bank of England regularly. Today's cut in interest rates, which I welcome, follows the global downturn, which the Bank and I agree will lead to more moderate growth next year. The cut is possible because of the tough long-term decisions that we have taken: making the Bank independent, cutting the deficit by £20 billion and getting inflation back on target. In an uncertain world, Britain is steering a course of stability.

Mr. Skinner: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the political climate in which interest rates had to be cut was created by people in the media and in the House, including a little touch and a steer from him over the past couple of weeks? I am sure that he will not want to be complimented on that, but will he tell the Governor of the Bank of England and the Monetary Policy Committee that they are not dealing with an exact science but making a political judgment, and that we, not they, will have to carry the can? What happened today complements what he said in his pre-Budget statement the other day. To ensure that unemployment does not rear its ugly head in the next few months, will he give the Bank another little steer?

Mr. Brown: My hon. Friend will make his own points. We have made the Bank of England independent, and we will support it in all the difficult decisions that it makes. The Bank of England's notice states that the international environment and the prospects for domestic activity have led the committee to make its decision. It is because we have created a long-term system and tackled the inflationary problem that it has been possible for monetary policy to respond to the downturn in the international environment. In the previous downturn, interest rates had to be above 10 per cent. for four years and at 15 per cent. for one year as a result of the failure to tackle inflationary pressures. The former Chancellor said that he was ready to consider independence for the Bank of England, and we are in a better position to make adjustments now because we have created that long-term framework.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke (Rushcliffe): Will the Chancellor say where the long-term monetary strategy exists? In the press briefings that he was giving until a few months ago, he said that the Bank of England should have raised interest rates further and faster than it was doing, but in the press briefings he has given since Washington, he said that the Bank of England should start to reduce interest rates. Will he acknowledge that, when he welcomes the present reduction in interest rates, he does so in the face of the policy-induced slowdown that his errors and those of the Bank has caused, and will he invite the Monetary Policy Committee to be alert to the consequences of worldwide slowdown, which will come on top of the slowdown that he has already put in place?

Mr. Brown: I have always said, and I think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will accept this, that I will support the Bank of England in all the difficult decisions that it makes. Having set up a new framework for interest rate policy decision making, we will find that all political parties will come to support it over time.

As for the inflationary pressures in the economy over the past year—I know that the former Chancellor is concerned about his record in the matter—for the six months before the general election, the Bank of England warned every month that interest rates would have to go up to deal with inflationary pressures, but action was not taken. We took action immediately and, because we did so, inflation is at its target.

I am pleased that the former Chancellor is now ready to consider independence for the Bank of England. It is a pity that the rest of the Conservative party has not joined him yet on this, as it has not on other issues. I hope that we will have clarification this afternoon from the shadow Chancellor about the Conservatives' position on the Bank of England, because we did not get clarification yesterday and it is about time we did.

Dr. Desmond Turner (Brighton, Kemptown): Will my right hon. Friend join me in welcoming the interest rate reduction as a great step towards helping to ensure that his cautious growth targets are met, and does he agree that any further reductions would be welcome? I invite my right hon. Friend to speculate about the situation that we might have been in had the former Chancellor's policies been pursued.

Mr. Brown: As everybody now knows, when we came into power, inflation was set to rise to twice that of our competitors. If we had not taken action, we would have been back to the old boom-bust that existed in the British economy. The Opposition should not forget that interest rates were above 10 per cent. for four years, and when it was right to lower interest rates because of the international situation in the early 1990s, the Government of the day were unable to do so. It is because we have created a long-term framework for this country that we are able to reduce interest rates. I hope that, in time, the Opposition will see the wisdom of making the Bank of England independent.

Mr. Francis Maude (Horsham): Is it now clear that not even the Bank of England believes the Chancellor's fantasy forecasts? When will he bring his forecasts in line with the majority of independent economists and begin to take serious policy steps to avoid a rising toll of job losses and business closures?

Mr. Brown: This morning, the shadow Chancellor said:

> "I am afraid that the Chancellor has made it less likely that interest rates will be able to be cut by the amount that is needed by the way he has conducted policy."

That is an example of a Conservative party in search of every soundbite.

In the summer, the right hon. Gentleman said that there was a spending gap, but there is none; we have met our spending ceiling. Then he said that there was a borrowing gap, but the figures show that that is not so. Now he tries to suggest that there is a forecast gap, but the Bank of England and I agree that there will be moderate growth next year, which is why the Bank has acted in the light of what is happening in the international environment. The Bank says in its report that its action is about the international environment and its effect on what happens domestically. It is about time the shadow Chancellor woke up to what is happening around the world. The Conservative party is not living in the real world.

Mr. Maude: We will be ready to welcome what is happening when interest rates come down to the figure at which the Chancellor inherited them. Is it not clear that the outlook for Britain's economy is the worst in the western industrial world, and that Britain has gone into the downturn ahead of north America and Europe? There will be a fearsome toll of job losses, and the blame lies at the Chancellor's door.

Mr. Brown: The facts of the matter are that forecasts for the world economy have been downgraded by 2.4 per cent. for this year, and 1.2 per cent. for next year. The idea that Britain is somehow unique in downgrading its forecast by three quarters of 1 per cent. is ridiculous. It is another example of how out of touch the shadow Chancellor is. I note that he has not corrected his remarks this morning that the Bank of England would have been unable to take the action that was necessary. It is about time that, instead of making comment after comment—later proven to be untrue or incorrect—the shadow Chancellor woke up to the fact that there is a global downturn and that the Government are dealing with it by steering a course of stability. It is also about time that the shadow Chancellor gave us a straight answer on the first issue of economic policy—whether his monetary policy is that the Bank of England remains independent. Until we get a straight answer on his support or otherwise for Bank independence, he will have absolutely no credibility. The real deficit in the United Kingdom is the deficit in Conservative thinking.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): Is my right hon. Friend aware that he is being rather generous to the Conservative party in his account of history? He said that interest rates were above 10 per cent. for only four of the years in which the Conservatives were in office. In fact, there were interest rates of more than 10 per cent. for more like three quarters of that time. This morning, I attended a meeting sponsored by the chamber of commerce in Slough, a town in which new industries and businesses are part of the engine of our economy. Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in towns such as Slough, the main anger is not with what he is doing but with the feeling that people are talking business down and making it more difficult for successful companies to export and to do their business well?

Mr. Brown: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is about time that the Conservative party started to support the potential in our country. Welfare to work helps thousands of people, but the Conservatives oppose it.

Working families tax credit will help 1.5 million people, but the Conservatives oppose it. Bank of England independence gives us economic stability, but the Conservatives oppose it. It is time they woke up to the fact that in the modern world we must make the changes that the Labour party is making. We will take no lectures from a shadow Chancellor who was at the Treasury between 1990 and 1992 when interest rates were at 15 per cent., when a million manufacturing jobs were lost, when manufacturing output fell by 7 per cent., when manufacturing investment fell by 15 per cent. and when the borrowing requirement went up to £50 billion. We have taken action. The Conservatives failed.

Mr. Edward Davey (Kingston and Surbiton): When the Chancellor next meets the Governor of the Bank of England will the Chancellor ask him to prepare and publish a report for the House on how he would like to see the Bank of England's independence strengthened? Will the Chancellor ask him for his views on the model of central bank independence contained in the Maastricht treaty—a treaty agreed to and signed on behalf of this country by the shadow Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman is indeed right. The person who signed the Maastricht treaty on behalf of the British people was none other than the shadow Chancellor when he was Financial Secretary to the Treasury. There should be a welcome from the whole House for his action. As I said yesterday to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce), we are prepared to listen to views about the structure and accountability of the Bank of England. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the reform announced only a few weeks ago, that the Bank of England would publish its minutes within two weeks of its meeting, is a welcome step forward. This comes back to the central question: unless hon. Members make up their mind, on macro-economic policy and monetary policy in particular, and decide whether or not they support the independence of the Bank of England, they have no credibility in terms of their economic policy. The former Chancellor of the Exchequer is facing up to that fact. The Conservative party and the shadow Chancellor must face up to that now.

Savings Income

4. Mr. Shaun Woodward (Witney): What measures he is taking to protect the UK financial services industry from the proposed provisions of the EU directive on the taxation of savings income. [56861]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): The Government are taking an active part in discussions on the draft directive. We have made it clear on a number of occasions that we will not agree to any course of action that would seriously damage the United Kingdom and other European financial markets.

Mr. Woodward: Given that the Government are in such a decisive frame of mind this afternoon and that the Chancellor has spent the entire week lecturing the House about the importance of stability, the opportunity occurs now for the Government to tell the House their proposals on withholding tax. Given the experience of the withholding tax in Germany, the United States and Japan, where serious damage was done to domestic bond markets, and given the report produced for the Corporation of London by Professor Dale, which concludes that the European capital market would suffer a serious capital disadvantage if the tax were imposed, will the Financial Secretary take this opportunity to reassure the City on exactly what the Prime Minister promised he would do, namely, use the veto when that was possible, and tell the House in a moment of decisiveness—yes or no—whether in three weeks' time that veto will be used?

Dawn Primarolo: The report by Professor Richard Dale of Southampton university was reported yesterday in the press. It is a rather limited report. We have now received a copy, and of course we are interested in studying the conclusions. We have made it clear that we would not accept a solution that obliged the United Kingdom to withhold tax, although we would be attracted to action based on the principle of exchange of information—as were the Conservative Government when, in May, June and December 1989, they agreed the conclusions of the Economic and Financial Council, that the way forward was an exchange of information.

Ms Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): The Financial Secretary will know that Labour Members are confident that the Government will do everything in their power to protect the financial services industry. She will also be aware that the pensions and salaries scandals of the 1980s revealed many structural problems in the financial services industry, including dependence on bonus-driven sales, the lack of transparency and the lack of training. Does she agree that it would be very wrong to divest swathes of pension and sickness provision to the private pensions industry without doing something about financial services regulation to address the structural problems that the pensions mis-selling revealed?

Dawn Primarolo: The Government are addressing the issues that my hon. Friend has identified through the Financial Services Bill, which my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will help to steer through the House. The Government are in favour of taking effective international action against tax evasion, which I hope Conservative Members will support. Discussions on the directive are about addressing that issue.

Mr. Nick Gibb (Bognor Regis and Littlehampton): In a written answer last week, the Financial Secretary was robust in rejecting any European Union proposal to harmonise income tax rates. She made it absolutely clear that income tax was firmly a matter for national Governments, and we welcome that. Why was she not prepared to give the same firm undertaking about EU proposals to harmonise corporation tax rates? Will the Government veto any such proposal on corporation tax—yes or no?

Dawn Primarolo: I welcome the hon. Gentleman to the Dispatch Box. The directive on taxation of savings is not about corporation tax rates but about effective ways to prevent avoidance of taxation. He knows that any change requires a unanimous vote. The Government have made it absolutely clear that we intend to maintain for this House decisions on taxation.

Football Clubs

5. Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): If he will introduce a tax redistribution arrangement based on turnover for professional football clubs. [56862]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): The football authorities, which are independent of Government, are best placed to make decisions on the development of football, including the distribution of income within the game. The tax system is not an appropriate mechanism for redistributing funds between football clubs.

Mr. Russell: If Ministers are unaware of the financial apartheid in professional football, they should have a word with the Deputy Prime Minister, who may be able to tell them about the plight of Hull City. The gap between rich and poor football clubs grows by the day. Contrary to what the Minister said, the football authorities have failed to act. Will she give an assurance that the Government will consider measures for a fair redistribution of the huge amount of money in football?

Dawn Primarolo: I understand that the hon. Gentleman supports Colchester, who are currently 20th in the second division, so I suppose that he well knows what it is like to be in the second division. It is not the job of the tax system to redistribute income between clubs; it is the responsibility of the Football Association and the football authorities. The hon. Gentleman should press them to make the changes that he wants.

Mr. Ian Davidson (Glasgow, Pollok): As we are on the subject of taxation and football clubs, will the Government do what they can to ensure that football clubs are not taken over by multinational, tax-avoiding media moguls?

Dawn Primarolo: I know that some people think that the Treasury is all-powerful and commands everything in the country, but my hon. Friend must direct his point to another Department.

Low-income Families

6. Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): What plans he has to help working families on low incomes. [56863]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): From April, as a result of abolishing the entry fee to national insurance, all employees will receive a tax cut of more than £1 a week. The working families tax credit will be introduced, guaranteeing a minimum income of at least £190 a week for working families. That will back up the national minimum wage, which will be introduced next April, helping 1.9 million employees.

Mr. Savidge: My right hon. Friend's reply will be widely welcomed, not least in Scotland where 1 million people—one in five of the population—receive less than half the national average income. Does he agree that those people will find new hope in the measures that he outlined and be disgusted that the Tories, who created so much misery and inequality, still oppose those policies, including the working families tax credit?

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for reminding us of the challenge of tackling in-work poverty. The national minimum wage will help to do that. It is unfortunate that a policy that was supported by the Sir Winston Churchill and many Conservatives right up to the 1980s cannot be supported by the existing Conservative—[Interruption.] It is strange; the Conservatives are now attacking Sir Winston Churchill. I know that they have lost touch with the country. It is hardly surprising that Lady Thatcher has written an article in Saga Magazine saying that they have not got a chance of winning the next general election.

Our policies are the minimum wage and the working families tax credit, which cuts the numbers of people who are affected by the marginal tax rate at above 70 per cent. In addition, we are raising child benefit for the first child by the biggest-ever amount. That is another measure that is dealing with the problems of poverty. It is a pity that we cannot have all-party support in those matters.

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Beckenham): Will the right hon. Gentleman assure me that no individual in a family receiving working families tax credit will pay tax on child benefit?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Lady knows perfectly well that we announced in the Budget a review of that matter. We shall report by the time of the next Budget. As for child benefit, we have made our position clear. Child benefit is paid to every mother. Yesterday, we had some problems with the Conservative party over the policy on pensions. I hope that the Conservatives will be able to say that they support our measures to raise child benefit.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Is it not a fact that the package that my right hon. Friend just referred to, with the national minimum wage and all the other things taken together, is the fairest and best policy initiative that any Government have given to low-paid people this century? The package is welcomed in areas such as mine, where many people have been in poverty and on low pay for many years.

Mr. Brown: I applaud my hon. Friend for being a champion of action on those matters over the many years that he has been in the House of Commons representing his constituents. He is right to say that people will ask the Conservative party whether it would take away from 2 million people a national minimum wage and whether it intends to oppose the working families tax credit. If so, more than 1 million people would have a tax rise under a future Conservative Government. What do the Conservatives intend to do about child benefit, which we support raising? We still have not had answers from the Conservative party.

Economic Cycle

7. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): If he will make a statement about the UK's position in the economic cycle relative to that of the rest of the EU. [56864]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): At present, the United Kingdom's business cycle is clearly not convergent with that of the rest of our European partners. However, the United Kingdom's divergence is not a new factor and is in part a legacy of our past susceptibility to boom and bust—the damaging boom of the late 1980s and the recession of the early 1990s, when the shadow Chancellor was a Treasury Minister, when manufacturing output fell by 7 per cent. and when half a million manufacturing jobs were lost—and the failure to raise interest rates in the run-up to the last general election.

Mr. Swayne: I have always wondered what caused the business cycle. Will the hon. Lady comment on the fact that The Economist has pointed out that, since June, forecasts for the British economy have shown that the growth rate is set to fall by 56 per cent., but that, for the corresponding period, growth rates for France will fall by only 14 per cent. and for Germany will fall by 21 per cent? Why is it so much worse here? Has it anything to do with the Chancellor of the Exchequer's policies?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman may not understand the basics of the business cycle, but presumably he understands that forecasts for world growth have been slashed as a result of what is going on in the world economy; that this country—[Interruption.] Just listen a minute and give the hon. Gentleman a chance to learn. This country is not immune from what is happening in the rest of the world. We have a larger exposure to trade with the rest of the world than most of the continental countries, but if the hon. Gentleman looks at the three-year period starting last year, he will see that, even with our revised growth forecasts for next year, growth in France, Germany and the United Kingdom will be about the same. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will also recall that unemployment in this country is well below the level in France and Germany.

Dr. George Turner (North-West Norfolk): Does my hon. Friend agree that what matters is not only where we are in the business cycle, but how big the peaks and troughs in that cycle are; and that today's welcome news shows that the peak in interest rates required to control that is at least half of what we had last time? Does she also agree that the next move in interest rates is more likely to be downward, because the world knows that it was a technical, non-party political decision that was taken today?

Ms Hewitt: I am delighted that my hon. Friend welcomes both today's decision and the steps that we have taken to create economic stability. It is the Conservative party that is the party of boom and bust; we are the party of economic stability.

Sir Peter Tapsell (Louth and Horncastle): Do Treasury Ministers agree that, for the British people sensibly to decide whether sustainable economic convergence between the United Kingdom and continental Europe can be achieved and whether economic benefits to this country of a "clear and unambiguous" nature—I am quoting the two criteria mentioned by the Prime Minister yesterday—would flow from joining economic and monetary union, it is extremely important that, as almost all independent economists agree, two complete economic cycles be concluded before any judgment based on those criteria is reached? Do Treasury Ministers agree with that assessment?

Ms Hewitt: I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving us the benefit of a speech that I am sure that he made during the Conservative party's referendum on that issue. We have set out the five economic tests that will enable the Government and the country to decide whether sustainable convergence has been demonstrated. Unlike the Conservative party, we have a policy for monetary and fiscal stability that will enable those tests to be met in future.

Productivity

8. Ms Sally Keeble (Northampton, North): If he will make a statement on his policy to promote improvements in the productivity of UK firms. [56865]

12. Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): If he will make a statement about his policy to promote productivity increases in UK firms. [56870]

The Paymaster General (Mr. Geoffrey Robinson): It has been clearly established by the Conservative party that there is a major and fundamental productivity gap between this country and others—our major competitors. It is a gap that we intend to close, in partnership with businesses and companies.

Ms Keeble: My hon. Friend rightly acknowledges the productivity gap between ourselves and our competitors. I am sure that, like me, he understands the fears of some workers, such as those at Barclaycard in Northampton, that the productivity gains needed to maintain a competitive edge might have an impact on job numbers. What can the Government do to mitigate those fears, and what would my hon. Friend say to the Barclaycard employees, most of whom are women?

Mr. Robinson: My hon. Friend will be aware that we have engendered 400,000 jobs since the election and that, in her constituency, unemployment has dropped by 583, which represents a 23 per cent. drop. She will also be aware of the tremendous strides being taken by the welfare-to-work programme: despite the Opposition's position on that programme and their commitment to getting rid of it, we can now say that, through that programme, 30,000 people have gone into jobs. Throughout the country, 150,000 people are in the gateway, and we have partnership agreements with 29,000 companies. Those are the things that I would tell my hon. Friend's constituents, as I am pleased to tell the House today.

Mr. Burden: When we talk about the need for productivity improvements in the motor industry and elsewhere, contrary to what is said in some sections of the media, we are not making any allegations about so-called lazy workers. What we are talking about is essentially four things: first, the need for real partnership between management and work force to achieve productivity improvements; secondly, the need for the companies concerned—Rover and others—to put in the investment necessary for the companies to prosper; thirdly, the need for that process to be given Government backing; and, fourthly, the need for the banks to provide the right financial climate, one that is sensitive to the needs of manufacturing. Does my hon. Friend accept that we in the west midlands welcome today's cut in interest rates, we welcome the announcements on more help for business made by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor in the pre-Budget statement earlier this week, and we look forward to further action being taken at Rover and elsewhere?

Mr. Robinson: I very much agree with my hon. Friend, and the Government are conscious of the position of Rover, which is in his constituency. We have spoken of the Government bridging the productivity gap in partnership with business, but equally, management, together with the unions and the work force, must make a determined effort to do so. That effort is being made, but a good deal still has to be achieved before we can say that we are reaching the levels of productivity that we see in other countries. We shall do that together, it will need a determined effort, and I am sure that I can count on my hon. Friend to play his important role in that.

Mr. Tim Boswell (Daventry): In spite of the Government's somewhat idiosyncratic interpretation of socialism in one country as the unilateral abolition of boom and bust, does the Minister agree that the experience of his hon. Friends the Members for Northampton, North (Ms Keeble) and for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden), speaking about Barclaycard and Rover, shows the sad fact that economic downturns tend to mean that productivity increases are interpreted as a loss of jobs? Therefore, will he re-emphasise the message that is coming from Conservative Members to his right hon. and hon. Friend—that they should eschew all the additional tax and regulatory burdens on business, to the tune of £1,500 per worker, that are being imposed? Will he argue with his right hon. and hon. Friends that they must seriously sharpen up their act first?

Mr. Robinson: The only act that really needs sharpening up is the performance of the Opposition's economic team, and, my word, that does need sharpening up.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome the 22 per cent. drop in unemployment in his constituency and the 400,000 new jobs that we have created. I agree that we must cut the regulatory burden, and we are intent on doing that. Lord Haskins has embarked on a task force aimed at doing that by looking at building regulations and other matters. The simple fact is that the best contribution that we can make to British business is sustained stability—something that we are well on the way to achieving—and a cut in taxes, which are already the lowest in Europe at 30 per cent., with corporation tax at 20 per cent. That is a significant cut.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): Is it not a fact that agriculture, above all British industries, has shown the most outstanding productivity increases during the past 50 years, yet finds itself in the most dire financial straits today? Given that the Government now intend to do all that they can to help employees on low incomes, what will be done for that industry?

Mr. Robinson: I am aware of last night's debate on that subject, in which the hon. Gentleman spoke. All who know anything about the farming industry know of its fine productivity record, particularly under the proficiency payments systems introduced by the first Labour Government after the war. We are considering those matters and my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will make a statement to the House in the near future.

Mr. Dale Campbell-Savours (Workington): My hon. Friend will be aware that we are repeatedly being told that productivity levels in Germany are far higher than they are here in the United Kingdom. Why is that? What is so special about the German system that enables Germany to score far higher ratings than we do?

Mr. Robinson: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is puzzling that, in the past century, Germany has continued to outstrip Britain in productivity. Two important points that we can learn from the Germans emerged clearly from the series of seminars that we initiated. The first is that capital investment is much higher in Germany. There is no question about that. The second is that skill levels throughout the work force, from the management at the top right down to the technicians and the shop floor workers, are much higher in Germany, and its education system is geared to provide that. If we learn both those lessons and pool them, we can start closing the gap, and it is Government policy to do so.

Growth Forecasts

9. Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): If he will list the assumptions on which his new growth forecasts have been based. [56866]

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Stephen Byers): Full details of the Treasury's new forecasts were published in the pre-Budget report on 3 November. They were based on a number of realistic assumptions.

Mr. Syms: Given the scepticism of the Chancellor's growth forecasts shown by many economic forecasters, is the Chancellor happy for the achievement or not of those forecasts to be the judge and jury of his chancellorship?

Mr. Byers: It is worth examining the average of the independent forecasts for next year, which is 1.1 per cent. The European Union is forecasting growth at 1.3 per cent. We are able to forecast that growth figure because the economy is well placed as a result of the tough decisions that the Government took last year. We have given independence to the Bank of England—we have not heard the shadow Chancellor confirm whether the Conservatives would continue that arrangement—reduced the deficit by £20 billion and ensured that we have strong and robust public finances. That is what we have done, and I think that it is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman has not acknowledged that, since his election to the House in May last year, unemployment in his constituency has dropped by 32 per cent.

Mr. Jim Cousins (Newcastle upon Tyne, Central): Can the Minister assure me that, built into every one of the Government's forecasts, will be a firm commitment to maintaining social support for pensioners and children—an approach that distinguishes us from the Conservatives?

Mr. Byers: We shall certainly do that. I am sure that my hon. Friend welcomes the news today of the creation of 500 jobs on Tyneside in the ship repair industry. That is good news for both our constituencies.

I can assure my hon. Friend about the Government's commitment to benefits and to social infrastructure, but the Conservative party cannot do the same. Yesterday, the Opposition announced no clear policy on pensions and their uprating and, today, they refused to confirm whether child benefit would be safe in their hands. The Opposition are prepared to talk down our economy, ignoring its underlying strengths. There are 400,000 more people in work compared with May last year and we are tackling the budget deficit and ensuring that inflation is at its target. The Opposition are prepared to talk down our economy but will not give clear answers to simple questions. They are not a credible Opposition, but a shambles of an Opposition.

Mr. John Whittingdale (Maldon and East Chelmsford): On Tuesday, the Chancellor described his growth forecasts as "prudent" and "cautious". Today, the Chief Secretary has said that they are "realistic". Why, then, is it almost impossible today to find a single independent forecaster who agrees with them? Will the Minister explain why the Chancellor is almost alone in upgrading his growth forecasts for the year after next? Will he give an assurance that the Chancellor will not be forced to return to the House in a few months to admit that, once again, he got it wrong?

Mr. Byers: Most independent forecasters—out of the 45 consulted—anticipate growth next year to average 1.1 per cent. The most effective forecast for two years' time from the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, which was published last week, is in line with the figures produced in the pre-Budget report. They are the facts; they are not fantasy. Another fact is that, when the shadow Chancellor was a Treasury Minister, inflation was at 10 per cent. and interest rates were at 15 per cent. They are not fantasy figures. They are real figures and, as a result, more than 1 million people lost their jobs.

Pensions Mis-selling

10. Mr. Laurence Robertson (Tewkesbury): What discussions he has had with representatives of independent financial advisers regarding the investigations into the selling of pensions during the 1980s. [56868]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): As the hon. Gentleman will recall from the debate earlier this week, I am well aware of the concerns of the Independent Financial Advisers Association about phase 2 of the pensions review. The hon. Gentleman and many other hon. Members have registered those concerns with me. I shall be meeting representatives of the IFA Association later this month.

Mr. Robertson: Is the Minister also aware of the Personal Investment Authority ombudsman's practice of charging IFAs £500 every time a complaint regarding pensions or other financial services products is made against them? Even if the complaint is not upheld—if it is found to be frivolous and thrown out—the company cannot claim back that £500: That is surely not natural justice.

Ms Hewitt: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman shares my belief that we need a high-quality IFA sector that customers can trust. An effective regulatory regime, including an ombudsman system to which consumers can take their complaints, is part of that sector. Of course it is right that the industry as a whole should cover the costs of that regime, because it stands to benefit from it.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Might it not be helpful if the pensions industry examined its own codes of practice? A constituent recently complained to me that, before his endowment policy was due to be paid, independent financial advisers seemed to know that he was due for some money. Is that not yet another instance of pension companies selling on the names of people who are beneficiaries?

Ms Hewitt: I share my hon. Friend's concern about such a practice. Despite the welcome progress that has been made, particularly by the large firms, in putting right the scandal of personal pensions mis-selling, the financial services industry still has some way to go before we reach the standards that all of us have a right to expect.

Dr. Vincent Cable (Twickenham): What steps is the Minister taking to ensure that the burden of the mis-selling scandal is borne by the shareholders of insurance and pension companies, rather than by other policyholders in those companies?

Ms Hewitt: As the hon. Gentleman knows, from the beginning of our action on the personal pensions mis-selling scandal, we have taken the view that the costs of putting matters right should be shared by all those who stood to benefit from it. Therefore, where with-profits policyholders have shared in the growth in their fund, the costs should be shared in the normal proportion—90:10. We are keeping a close eye on the allocation of the costs of the pensions review, and of course we shall intervene, if necessary, to protect policyholders' reasonable expectations.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): Given the Minister's statement earlier this week that compensation under phase 2 should be calculated on present market conditions, does she agree that, in order to take account of market conditions, the Financial Services Authority should raise the compensation cap, which has not been raised for 10 years, in cases where the IFA is not able to make the compensation?

Ms Hewitt: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point. As I stressed in the debate on Tuesday, we have put in place a system for calculating any loss that may arise from mis-selling at the time, on the basis that has been advised by senior actuaries, and that would be applied in the courts. I shall write to the hon. Gentleman in more detail on the specific point that he raises.

Monetary Policy

11. Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of his reforms to the monetary policy framework on meeting the inflation target. [56869]

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Ms Patricia Hewitt): The new framework has been successful in reducing inflation and inflation expectations close to the target level, and has led to long-term interest rates falling to their lowest levels for 35 years.

Mr. Caplin: My hon. Friend may be aware that, last night, the shadow Chief Secretary to the Treasury refused to debate with me in interventions those important points about the framework. Is it not a fact that, in the 12 months leading up to the general election, the Conservative Government managed to meet the inflation target just once, and that the long-term stability and framework that we have put in place will take Britain forward?

Ms Hewitt: My hon. Friend is right. As we saw over and over again last night, the Conservatives cannot or will not tell us what they would do about the Bank of England and about the monetary framework that we have put in place, which has brought interest rates to their lowest level for 35 years.

Mr. Ian Bruce (South Dorset): I am sure that, even before she became a Member of Parliament, the hon. Lady will have followed the debate about the independence of the Bank of England. We were all told that the one plus that would result was that real interest rates—the difference between the rate of inflation and the interest being paid—would go down. Since the independence of the Bank of England, people have been paying three times the rate of inflation. Why? Can the hon. Lady explain that to the House?

Ms Hewitt: As I just said, long-term interest rates are at their lowest level for 35 years. It was the Government whom the hon. Gentleman supported who, for short-term party political reasons before the last general election, failed to take the necessary action to stem inflationary pressures. This Government will take no lectures on interest rates from a Government who were responsible for interest rates of 10 per cent. for four consecutive years, and of 15 per cent. for 12 months. I remember, as do my constituents, what that did to our mortgage rates. We will not take lessons from the Conservatives.

Small and Medium Enterprises

13. Mrs. Louise Ellman (Liverpool, Riverside): What plans he has to introduce tax and fiscal measures to encourage investment in small and medium enterprises in the regions. [56871]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Dawn Primarolo): The Government are examining how best to develop an environment which encourages investment and growth in enterprising small and medium businesses.

Mrs. Ellman: Will my hon. Friend back the channelling of support for small and medium enterprises through the regional development agencies so that regions such as the north-west, and particularly Merseyside within the north-west, can improve their rates of small and medium business formation and success?

Dawn Primarolo: I can confirm that the regional development agencies, starting from next April, will have to draw up regional and economic strategies, which will cover encouraging investment and innovation. They will, of course, address themselves to small and medium businesses.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): If the Financial Secretary wants to encourage investment in small and medium enterprises in the regions of the United Kingdom, why is it that she is not prepared flatly to condemn the £40 billion additional tax and regulatory cost put upon those enterprises in the lifetime of this Parliament, a policy that the Confederation of British Industry, the Institute of Directors, the Federation of Small Businesses and the Forum of Private Business are united in condemning?

Dawn Primarolo: We just need to remind the hon. Gentleman that it is this Government who have cut the small business rate for corporation tax; abolished advance corporation tax, giving small and medium companies £1 billion in cash-flow benefits; enhanced venture capital reliefs; and increased the taper on business assets to help entrepreneurs. As a result, unemployment in the hon. Gentleman's constituency has been reduced by 28 per cent., but he does not have the good grace to say that.

Children's Safeguards Review

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Frank Dobson): In November last year the Government published the Utting report, which reviewed the safeguards for children in care. In my statement to the House, I made clear that the report painted a woeful picture of failure. Many children who had been "taken into care" to protect and help them had received neither protection nor help. Instead they had been abused and molested. Many more had been let down, never given the attention that they needed, shifted from place to place, school to school, and often simply turned out to fend for themselves when they turned 16.

That catalogue of events was not just a failure by the care staff directly concerned. It was a failure by social services managers, by councils, councillors, the police, the court system, schools, voluntary organisations, neighbours, the news media, the Government's social services inspectorate, Government Departments, Ministers and Parliament. Some people from all those institutions and in all those categories had worked hard to do a good job for those children, but too many had not and the whole system had failed.

Last November, I reported to the House that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had asked me to lead a ministerial task force to draw up the Government's response to the report. The task force involved Ministers from 10 Government Departments, together with outside representatives from social services, education, the police and the voluntary sector. It also included a young women who had recently been through the care system. She made some most valuable contributions to our deliberations and provided salutary reminders of the real world in which some children are being expected to grow up. I am grateful to her and all the other members of the task force for their positive contributions to the work of developing a comprehensive and practical set of measures.

In July this year, the Select Committee on Health strongly endorsed the need for action. Its report covered some aspects that were not the subject of the Utting report. The Government will make a full response to the Select Committee after the publication of our White Paper on social services.

Today I am publishing the task force's report, which sets out the practical measures that we have proposed and which the Government have accepted. We want to ensure that in future, children in care are looked after properly and get a decent start in life. We started by recognising that, if the whole system had failed those children, the whole system had to be put right. Tinkering with a few aspects was not enough.

Throughout our deliberations I asked everybody involved to look at the matter from the point of view of the children and to ask whether the care provided would have been good enough for them when they were children, and whether it would be good enough for their own children. That is what the task force has tried to do. As a result, our proposals are intended to ensure that those responsible, at any level, for children in care behave towards them as any good parent tries to behave towards his or her children.

With that in mind, the Government are implementing the task force's recommendations. We have already launched a three-year programme in the document entitled, "Quality Protects". Its job is to transform the care system for children by setting clear objectives and targets, putting action plans in place, and measuring whether those targets have been met. It also provides new guidance to strengthen the hand of conscientious elected local councillors. That will call for joined-up government—all Government Departments, local authorities, the court system, schools, the police and voluntary organisations working together towards a common goal, with clear targets and a demanding timetable. There can be no more excuses.

All those measures cannot be undertaken for nothing, so I can announce today that we are establishing a new children's services grant, which will provide an extra £375 million over the next three years to help fund the necessary improvements.

To stop potential child abusers working with children, we are establishing a new criminal records agency to improve and widen access to police checks on people wishing to work with children. It is a first step towards a "one-stop shop" that can give employers access to police records and the separate lists kept by the Department for Education and Employment and the Department of Health. The present system is a confusing mess that denies the children concerned elementary protection.

The present law provides that councils have a duty to children while they are in care up to the age of 16 and a discretionary power to help them up to the age of 18 when they leave care. As a result, some unfortunate children are turned out at the age of 16 with little or no help afterwards. That cannot be right.

In order that the task force could consider the question of when young people should leave care, and how they should be helped when they do, I insisted that my officials produce a paper spelling out what parents usually provide for members of an ordinary family between the ages of 16 and 18 or 21. May I ask hon. Members to think for a minute about when they were between 16 and 21, or what they did or are doing for their children in that age group? Now may I ask them to think about having to do without any of that: no home to live in or return to; no shoulder to cry on; no encouragement to do school or college work; no morale-boosting chat before an interview, nor anyone to console us if it went wrong; nobody to give us a lift, make us a meal or, if we are a bit older, take us out for a drink; nowhere to get our washing done for nothing; no mother or father to touch for a tenner when we are skint. The list is endless, and it is a disgrace. It is simply wrong and the Government are going to change it.

We will change the law to extend the duty of care for those young people from 16 to 18, and ensure that councils' responsibilities for children up to the age of 18 and beyond correspond more closely with those accepted by any good parent. That includes trying to keep in touch with children once they have left home.

We are taking steps to ensure better school attendance by children in care and setting targets so that they achieve more at school than they do at present. We are taking steps and setting targets to reduce the number of children exposed to a succession of placements every year and to ensure that those placements are more suitable. We are taking action to increase the number of foster parents through new recruitment campaigns. We shall also increase the skills of foster parents by providing new funds for training and establishing a code of practice and national standards for foster care. We propose to bring all children's homes—whatever their size—and residential schools and independent fostering agencies within a new and more effective regulatory system, with simpler and faster action against schools and children's homes with unacceptable standards.

We are taking steps to monitor and safeguard better the welfare of children in hospitals, nursing homes and hospices and improve the health of children in care, including their mental health. We are changing local government law and practice to bring about across-the-board improvements in services for children in care or with special needs. In future, the whole local authority will have to accept its responsibilities for supporting the children.

The voice of the children involved has been ignored for too long. We will improve the arrangements for whistleblowing and fund a new group to provide a national voice for children in care and those formerly in care. We are taking steps to ensure that children in court as witnesses get better protection, and children who are detained are kept separate from adults.

These are just some of the major measures that the Government are starting to put in place. Many others are set out in the detailed report. It will take time to thrash out the detail of some, and others will depend on the availability of parliamentary time. However, action is under way.

The task force report covers England and Wales, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales shares my commitment to its implementation. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland is today publishing a separate response to the Kent report, which covered the same issues in Scotland.

Finally, I should like to make it clear that many dedicated people are doing a good job looking after vulnerable people living away from home. It is never an easy task and we owe them our thanks. However, that is not all we owe them. We owe it to them and to all the children in care to root out and punish the wrongdoers and to put in place a system which really cares for children in care.

Vulnerable children are the responsibility of us all. In the past, the whole system has failed. We intend to make sure that, in future, the whole system delivers.

Mr. Philip Hammond (Runnymede and Weybridge): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement and for his courtesy in supplying me with an advance copy of it. However, I was disappointed—as you will be, Madam Speaker—to have read the details of the Secretary of State's statement in the Evening Standard this lunchtime. That shows, once again, the contempt in which the Government hold the House of Commons.

Anyone who has read the Utting report, or reports of other inquiries into child abuse, will have shared a sense of horror at the nature and extent of the abuse which has undoubtedly taken place. It is for this reason that the previous Government set up the review under Sir William Utting into safeguards for children living away from home, the excellent work of which forms the basis of the Government's proposals.

At the time of the publication of the Utting report, my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples)—the then shadow Secretary of State for Health—confirmed the Opposition's support for the Government in carrying forward the process of implementation of the report's recommendations. We shall continue to support the Government in their efforts to ensure the safety of children living away from home.

However, there are a number of issues that arise from the Secretary of State's statement, and I would be grateful if he could clarify the following points. Is the £375 million of children's services grant that he announced really extra money, over and above the existing funding for social services? Can he confirm that there will be no corresponding reduction in social services standard spending assessments in the revenue support grant settlement?

If the money is not to be funded by a reduction in revenue support grant, can he confirm that this is genuinely new money, or is it simply an allocation of money that has been announced in the comprehensive spending review? While the Opposition support the need for national standards to protect the safety of children living away from home, can the Secretary of State confirm that local authorities will retain the autonomy to develop service provision in accordance with local needs?

Local councillors are to be held responsible for the quality of services delivered—rightly, in my view. However, with that responsibility must go the right—within a framework of national standards to ensure the safety of children—to exercise discretion over service delivery in meeting the targets set by the Secretary of State.

Can the Secretary of State confirm that the Government have now abandoned the Utting recommendation for a legislative definition of parental rights and responsibilities? The report stated that the issue was to be reviewed by the Home Secretary, but the recent Green Paper on the family makes no mention of any such proposal.

Will the Secretary of State's "new and more effective regulatory system" be dedicated to children's services, or will it be broader and more all-encompassing, as suggested by the leaks of the social services White Paper? Can the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the inspection system will be nationally based? In view of the right hon. Gentleman's statement that "the whole local authority" will have to accept responsibility for failures in children's services, will he use his influence and authority to persuade the responsible Labour councillors in the London borough of Ealing and in Coventry, where there have recently been serious failures in children's services, to do the decent thing?

Let me again emphasise our support for the Government's objectives in implementing most of the recommendations of the Utting report. The vast majority of people who work with children living away from home are dedicated, loyal and trustworthy, but every Member of Parliament will support measures attempting to weed out the tiny minority who represent a threat to the safety of those vulnerable children.

Mr. Dobson: I thank the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond) for his thoughtful response to, and welcome for, our proposals.

The £375 million to be provided over the next three years is extra money. Of course it was included in the sums that we announced after the comprehensive spending review. [HON. MEMBERS: "Ah"] Do not start mocking. The money is available because, when we were conducting the comprehensive spending review, we recognised that extra funds would be necessary, and, as far as I know, they are being welcomed by all concerned apart from the Conservative party.

I am a strong supporter of local government and local autonomy. That is one of the reasons why, as I said, we have already issued new guidance to help conscientious councillors to do their job better in relation to children in care. In view of the general performance of councils over the years, however, we need to take a fairly leery look at anyone who says, "We want to do things this way, or that way" on grounds of local autonomy. There will be national standards, and people will be expected to meet them.

As for the definition of parental rights and responsibilities, what the task force has tried to do—partly because of my psychological predilection in that direction—is come up with practical measures, rather than exceedingly theoretical considerations. I suspect that we could devote two or three years to those, without necessarily getting much further.

The regulatory system will be national, although it may be delivered on a regional basis.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the "whole authority". He descended into bathos by singling out Labour local authorities where things have been going wrong in regard to children in care. I shall not descend to his level by coming up with a list of Tory authorities where things have gone wrong. The burden of the Utting report, of the task force's consideration and of my statement is that everyone has been at fault, including Members of Parliament. It is not just the fault of local authorities; it is the fault of people in management, of the police, of people running the courts, of neighbours who did not bother to report what they saw going on, of councils, of councillors, of Ministers and Government officials. We have all let these children down, whatever our political persuasion. We should be ashamed of our record and we should start doing something about it and not try to use this opportunity to make stupid party political points.

Mrs. Llin Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): If it was in order to cheer, I would cheer this report very loudly. At long last something will be done to protect these vulnerable children and I thank my right hon. Friend very much for the work that he is to do. He said that abuse is continuing and that it is a problem that we all have to work towards preventing. Will my right hon. Friend look again at the appointment of a children's commissioner to lead this long-awaited campaign?

Mr. Dobson: I thank my hon. Friend for her welcome for what we have done. I pay tribute to her because, whatever the shortcomings of the rest of us, she has devoted a great deal of her parliamentary time and effort to trying to draw to the attention of the rest of us the circumstances in which so many children were being mistreated and let down by the care system. I will agree to look further at her suggestion for a children's commissioner as long as she does not interpret that as a promise to definitely agree to it. I will look at it again because, when someone has campaigned so consistently and effectively, and for as long as my hon. Friend, she is entitled to be listened to.

Mr. Paul Burstow (Sutton and Cheam): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement and for granting me the opportunity to look at it in advance. Liberal Democrats support the proposals outlined in the statement and those we have managed to study in the detailed document that accompanied it. We would like to acknowledge the way in which the Secretary of State recognises that the failures that have undoubtedly occurred in the system are not the sole responsibility of any one institution or individual, but are systemic and need to be recognised as such.

One of the issues I did not hear mentioned in the statement was how the Government propose to reduce the number of children aged 15 or under who are currently held in prison establishments. It is a national scandal that more than 200 children are currently being held in such institutions. The Utting report made it clear that that was a serious failure of public policy. I wonder how the Secretary of State's proposals will help them.

Can the Secretary of State confirm that the £180 million earmarked for the year 2001-02 will become core funding to sustain the improvements that we all hope that funding will produce? Can the Secretary of State tell us whether the statement or the detailed document go on to develop the issue of training for staff? There were welcome comments about training for foster carers, but can he make it clear whether we will see additional resources being used to raise standards of training for residential care workers? In addition, in order to retain those residential care workers, there needs to be recognition of the fact that we will need to look at pay and conditions. Can the Secretary of State tell us whether he has plans to give legal protection to staff who choose and need to blow the whistle about abuse of which they become aware? Does the Secretary of State accept that there is a developing crisis in the recruitment and retention of foster carers, which could undermine many of the laudable proposals contained in his statement today?

We welcome the statement and the additional resources, whether they are contained in the comprehensive spending review or are new money, but we want to be assured that those resources will produce the results that the Secretary of State has described.

Mr. Dobson: I welcome the welcome that the Liberal Democrat representative has given to our proposals. When he has had an opportunity to read the report in detail, he will see that it is our intention to address the number of children and young people who are imprisoned to try to ensure that they are not mixed with adults, which is a veritable invitation to the interests of child molesters. Children in care amount to less than less than half of 1 per cent. of the population, but make up 22 per cent. of the prison population and nearly 40 per cent. of the number of young people in prison, which is a measure of how unsuccessful the care system has been.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned funding. The £375 million is additional funding and will be spent on the specific task of looking after children better. There are proposals to improve staff training, but I have always been disappointed when reports on terrible incidents in the social services make more training for the staff their first recommendation. A bit of decent management and the exercising of common sense should probably be item one, but I accept that more training is needed and, as we spelt out in "Quality Protects", we intend to provide it. We also intend to make life easier for anyone who blows the whistle on anything that is going wrong, whether that person is a member of staff, the child concerned or another child in the institution.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's deep personal commitment to this subject and his announcement today, and I thank him and those in other Departments for the steps that have already been taken. As he knows, during both the previous Parliament and this Parliament, the Health Committee has considered in detail the issue of looked-after children. Members of the Committee have been particularly struck by the fact that children in care lack a voice—someone to speak out for them or to whom they can turn. The abuse that has, sadly, taken place is a result of that lack of a voice.

The Committee strongly recommended establishing a system for a local voice; my right hon. Friend referred to that, but I should like to hear more about it. I strongly endorse the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) about the need for a children's rights commissioner, which was, until recently, Labour party policy—I know that because I wrote the policy document.

I warmly welcome the children's services grant, but will my right hon. Friend look at the one failure of the Children Act 1989? We have not been able to make the Act's preventive measures work, but if we prevent the problems that the care system has to deal with, children will not need to be in care. How will the new grant system enable local authorities to carry out the preventive work that is, at the moment, so lacking?

Mr. Dobson: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind comments. We intend to establish a national unit to provide a voice for children in care and for children formerly in care. We are considering various ways in which to assist the whistleblowing process in each locality, as a national voice will not be of much help if children cannot make it speak for them. We would welcome the Select Committee's views on how best to proceed—I note my hon. Friend's support for a children's rights commissioner.

We want the children's services grant to be used to prevent children from coming into care in the first place. Many of the actions that have to be taken are not necessarily the responsibility of the social services department; they may be the responsibility of other parts of the council's organisation. That is one reason why we will legislate to ensure that responsibilities fall across the board in local authorities, not only to individual departments.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): Long-term admirers of Bill Utting's work will recognise that the problem is serious and intractable. I welcome the effort to restore the equivalent of the National Association for Young People in Care. Does the Secretary of State intend to use a telephone service, such as Childline, to assist in encouraging young people to get their voice heard?

Many of the children are troubled and troublesome, and in great need of child mental health services. Does the Secretary of State plan to provide any encouragement for the availability and development of child mental health services? The young people are often costly to care for, and some cost shunting goes on, with referrals between special education, children's homes and prison institutions. I am pleased that he gathered together Ministers from different Departments on his group; are there to be any financial mechanisms to discourage perverse recommendations being made on the basis of the Departments' financial interest rather than the children's needs?

Mr. Dobson: I thank the right hon. Lady for her comments. Certainly, Childline fulfils a function, and we will want to continue to promote that, but it has been in existence for some time and it clearly does not work for all the children. It is a valuable service, but its provision needs to be augmented, as otherwise we would not have all the current problems.

We will shortly make a statement on mental health services. I am not a person who leaks anything to anyone at any time, but I can safely predict—

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Who is leaking, then?

Mr. Dobson: If the hon. Gentleman can help me to track down the person who is leaking from the Department of Health, I will get that person sacked.

We are talking about the serious matter of children's mental health. I can safely predict that we will make a substantial effort to ensure that the mental health of all children gets more attention than it does under the present system, and especially that we concentrate on children in care, because recent estimates suggest that about two thirds of all such children suffer from some degree of mental health problems, compared with 4 per cent. of all other children of the same age.

The right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) mentioned the problem of various Departments shuttling children from one budget head to another, because the people making the decisions do not give a damn about the body of the child that goes with the budget head that they are concerned about. I am determined to put a stop to that, and I think that our proposals will achieve that. If people still want to behave in that way, I suggest that they seek employment that does not involve any responsibility for children.

Mr. Hilton Dawson (Lancaster and Wyre): I commend my right hon. Friend for providing the extra cash and making a commitment to the reform of the whole care system. How will the extra money help to address the central absurdity of the care system: the fact that a large proportion of staff working in residential care are completely unqualified for such a vital and complex task? How much of the money will go to help the funding of foster care, to ensure that foster carers receive money commensurate with abilities and training and are adequately supported?

May I be the third person today to say that children's rights are fundamental to the whole process and that we absolutely need a children's rights commissioner to ensure that the scandals of the past are put well behind us? My right hon. Friend rightly celebrates the achievements of one young person in care who has made a major contribution to that work, and he makes the commitment that local authorities should act as good parents to all children. Does my right hon. Friend look forward to the day when we can celebrate the achievements of all children in care?

Mr. Dobson: Again, I thank my hon. Friend for his points and I know that he draws on considerable professional knowledge and experience of the subject. He is right to say that many people who look after children in care have no qualifications. One of the problems is a by-product of the constant assertion that care in the community is superior to care in an institution, however large or small, which has meant that the prospect of working in a residential setting has become less professionally attractive. As we said when we launched "Quality Protects", we want to increase the number of foster carers, provide better training for them, and give them whatever encouragements are necessary to improve the service they provide. Most of them do a very good job already.

Mr. Andrew Lansley (South Cambridgeshire): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement and commend to him the report of the Health Committee. Like Sir William Utting in his report, the Committee considered the safeguards for children looked after by local authorities and the need for them to give children the same support as a parent would. On that theme, I have two points to put to the Secretary of State. First, he will know that many problems stem from the impermanency of the arrangements for many children. Even when placements are sustained, there can be rapid changes in staffing caused by the relative professional unattractiveness of residential social work. Will he consider a residential child care initiative for training and the need to adapt training for residential social workers so that it becomes an explicit professional expertise with its own recognised and specific training? Having rooted out abuse, we must recognise and value those who continue to work successfully in the system.

Secondly, the Secretary of State will know that adoption can be the most appropriate mechanism for providing children with a home like that enjoyed by most children. Will he introduce adoption legislation to remove many of the impediments to successful adoption?

Mr. Dobson: The hon. Gentleman has referred to the Health Committee's report and I contemplated whether the task force should consider it as well as the Utting report. The Committee's report covered a wider range of issues than Utting and I felt it was better to deal with those aspects separately. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be satisfied with our proposals when we respond to the Select Committee's report and produce the social services White Paper. He is right to draw attention to the problem of unsatisfactory short-term placements for children, which are disturbing and damaging to the children's mental and physical health and their prospects. As we said in "Quality Protects", we intend to improve training and to set more demanding targets for local authorities so that they pay more attention to the standard and appropriateness of placements and to reducing their number.

Adoption, where it works, works very well indeed in providing a wonderful family life for the children concerned. One reason why it succeeds is that there is, rightly, a severe vetting process to ensure that the child is suitable for the adoptive parents, and that the parents are suitable for the children. The law does need sorting out, but we must be careful about that. Some people—not, I am sure the hon. Gentleman—seem to think that some of the restraints on adoption should be dispensed with entirely. Those constraints exist for the protection of children, and that is right.

Mr. Joe Ashton (Bassetlaw): My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on the immense steps that he has taken in acting on the Utting report. However, he has not mentioned the fact that the number of prosecutions for child abuse is dropping. In the past two or three years the figures have fallen by probably 50 per cent. The Utting report said that schools feared prosecutions because of the shame, the headlines and the bad publicity that result. Councils also fear prosecuting abusers because of legal costs and insurance payments. There is often a tacit agreement that abusers should simply be dismissed—they can then move on elsewhere. Despite list 99 and the other safeguards, the BBC 2 education programme, "Just One Chance", claims that 1,000 abuse suspects are probably still teaching.

Would it not be a good idea to have a children's commissioner who could take decisions on whether to prosecute, as my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) has said? If decisions on whether to prosecute are left with schools or councils, prosecutions will dwindle to nothing. In addition, lawyers drag cases out, and our court procedures need to be examined. The decision on whether to prosecute must be taken from local councils and schools or the problem will simply be swept under the carpet.

Mr. Dobson: As ever, my hon. Friend makes an important point. The number of prosecutions has gone down, and successful prosecutions have fallen even faster. That seems strange at a time when more and more attention is paid to and public horror expressed at the idea that some pervert may be molesting children. However, when cases come to court, the courts are less likely than they were a few years ago to find the people charged guilty. We clearly need to examine the system to find out what is going wrong.

As my hon. Friend has said, one problem is that for the sake of not damaging the reputation of their school, institution or council, and to avoid all the bother and expense of prosecuting, employers frequently let the abusers move on. That stops them molesting local children, but it leaves them to molest children elsewhere. We have to put a stop to that, and we are considering what we can do. I am prepared to consider the concept of a children's commissioner and the possibility of a prosecuting role for such an office.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): I welcome the compassion that the Secretary of State showed as he presented the report. I also welcome his tribute to Sir William Utting. We all recognise our debt to Sir William, although some of us are still waiting for implementation of an earlier recommendation for a council for social work. In implementing the report, will the Secretary of State bear in mind that some conscientious and hard-working social workers may have extra pressures placed on them, which their middle management will do nothing about? The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland was not mentioned in the Secretary of State's statement, but may I take it that the statement also applies to Northern Ireland where abuse is as prevalent as it is here? Finally, will the Secretary of State join me in welcoming Tuesday's launch by his erstwhile colleague, now the Minister of State for the Home Department, the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), of the remand foster care experiment in Reading? I hope that that experiment, pioneered by the care movement, will spread throughout the nation.

Mr. Dobson: At the risk of being accused of leaking from a document that I shall eventually produce, let me say that the hon. Gentleman can rest assured that the proposals for a council for social work will ultimately be forthcoming. As far as I know, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will seek to extend the principles behind what we have been talking about today to Northern Ireland although, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman would be the first to say, certain aspects may need adjustment to meet the particular circumstances there. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's kind words about my former ministerial colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), which give me an opportunity to pay tribute to him for the enormous amount of work he has done in this sphere generally and as a member of the task force towards the production of our report. I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he said about my hon. Friend and I have tried to trump him.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): I remember a child who had been in care talking to the Select Committee on Health. He realised that he fitted into the category of a child looked after by a local authority but said that "looked after" was the last thing he felt he had experienced. I am sure that he, like me, would welcome the Secretary of State's comments today and the great moves forward that have been announced. In particular, I welcome the extension of care to children over the age of 16 and the funds for local authorities to improve the services for looked-after children.

The Select Committee picked up on the lack of streamlined checks available for social services and other employers to look at, so I welcome too the change on that to ensure that those who are working with children are not potential abusers. Do the Government accept that local authorities need to have surplus places if children who are to be looked after are to have real choices? Sometimes it is uncomfortable for a Government to say that their target is to have surplus places, but that must be recognised if there is to be real choice. Will my right hon. Friend continue to encourage independent visiting schemes for children looked after by local authorities, who for one reason or another cannot relate to their social worker? It is important for them to have somebody who will befriend and stand up for them and be an independent voice to represent them as they move through their life and make choices.

Mr. Dobson: I thank my hon. Friend for her kind welcome for our proposals. I welcome the continuation and, indeed, development of independent visiting schemes. I accept on behalf of the Government her good point about surplus places. A problem that faces councils when placing children, possibly with particular difficulties or who may not be particularly appealing to a possible foster parent or even people running a small home, is that if they have no choice because there are no surplus places, they end up knowingly placing a child somewhere that is less than suitable. Therefore, there must be a surplus of places; otherwise, there is no choice and even the best-intentioned, best-informed social work staff cannot implement their professional judgment, but have to send children somewhere unsatisfactory.

Dr. Peter Brand (Isle of Wight): May I congratulate the Government on a comprehensive response to Utting and in particular welcome the establishment of a central register that can be consulted by people concerned about the welfare of children? For some time I have been concerned about the welfare of young foreign visitors to this country. I note with interest that the paper suggests setting up a code of practice. A code of practice is no use if it does not require those organisations to consult the very register that the Government are setting up. Will the code be voluntary or will it have some teeth?

Mr. Dobson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his general welcome for what we are doing. Our ultimate intention is that consulting the register should be mandatory for employers, but it will take some time before we can get to that position. There are all sorts of quite difficult ethical and other considerations to bear in mind before we can fully put in place the system that we all want.

Mr. John Gunnell (Morley and Rothwell): Like other members of the Health Select Committee, I very much welcome the Secretary of State's report. He has noted that the educational standards reached by children in care, as the Committee said, are appallingly low. What discussions has he had with the Secretary of State for Education and Employment about the mechanisms used to raise standards? Will joint advice be given to local authorities so that they can act in a corporate way in making relevant decisions? The Committee found that stigma was attached in school to children in care. Will he and the Secretary of State for Education and Employment consider ways of making contact with children more sensitive while in school so that such stigma is not attached?

Mr. Dobson: As a member of the Select Committee, my hon. Friend has been heavily involved in these matters. He knows that the system does not get some children to first base. Roughly speaking, on any given day, one in four of the children in care who should be in school are not. There is not much hope of them doing well if they are not attending. It must be one of the first, basic requirements of the system that education departments, social services departments and the people responsible for where the children live work together to get the children to school in the first place. I have had discussions with members of the team of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, and we are ensuring that councils are given joint advice. We want to them to act jointly; there is no excuse for the education and social services departments of a local authority not acting in concert. The Department for Education and Employment has today launched a new initiative on children with special needs. Children in care are, of course, children with special needs.

It is difficult to deal with things such as stigma, partly because other children can be perfectly horrid. We have to bear that in mind. If we can get a system that works better, so that children in care are, generally speaking, better looked after and more closely resemble, in every sense, the other children in the school, differentiation and stigma should decline.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Given his welcome insistence that the money for the new children's services grant is additional to existing funding, will the right hon. Gentleman give an absolute, unbreakable assurance that social services SSAs will at no stage be adjusted downwards to reflect its introduction?

Mr. Dobson: As a result of the comprehensive spending review, we have identified a substantial increase in the funding for social services. Part of that increase was to provide the £375 million over the next three years. That is additional money to what it was previously the intention to spend on those services. The assurance that I promise that I can make, which is probably more important even than the one that the hon. Gentleman seeks, is that the money will be spent on children's services. It will not be spent on anything else.

Madam Speaker: Thank you. We now move on.

Business of the House

4.24 pm

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the business for next week.

MONDAY 9 NOVEMBER—Debate on the fifth report of the Committee on standards in public life on the funding of political parties in the United Kingdom on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Proceedings on the Statute Law Repeals Bill [LORDS], which is a consolidation measure

TUESDAY 10 NOVEMBER—Opposition Day

Until 7 o'clock, there will be a debate on factory closures on an Opposition Motion.

Consideration of Lords Amendments to the European Parliamentary Elections Bill.

Motion relating to the Personal Equity Plan (Amendment) Regulations, the Individual Savings Account (Regulations) and the Individual Savings Account (Insurance Companies) Regulations.

WEDNESDAY 11 NOVEMBER—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Progress of consideration of any Lords Amendments which may be received to the Scotland Bill.

THURSDAY 12 NOVEMBER—Debate on the Royal Navy on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 13 NOVEMBER—The House will not be sitting.

MONDAY 16 NOVEMBER—Until about 7 o'clock, conclusion of consideration of any Lords Amendments which may be received to the Scotland Bill.

Consideration of any Lords Amendments which may be received to the Regional Development Agencies Bill.

The House will also wish to know that on Wednesday 11 November there will be a debate on Agenda 2000: Financial Aspects in European Standing Committee B.

The House will also wish to know that it is proposed that on Wednesday 18 November there will be a debate on agrimonetary arrangements and the introduction of the Euro in European Standing Committee A and a debate on EC development aid to South Africa (1986–96) in European Standing Committee B.

Details of the relevant documents will be given in the Official Report.

[Wednesday 11 November: European Standing Committee B: European Community Documents: (a) 7046/98, Agenda 2000, The Financial Perspective (2000–2006); (b) 7221/98, Agenda 2000: The interinstitutional agreement of 29 October 1993; (c) 9302/98: Own resources based on VAT and GNP; (d) 11666/98, Financing the European Union. Relevant European Legislation Committee Reports: (a) HC 155-xxvi and HC 155-xxxvii (1997-98) (b) HC 155-xxvi (1997–98) (c) HC 155-xxxvii (1997–98) (d) HC 155-xxxviii (1997–98).]

[Wednesday 18 November 1998: European Standing Committee A—Relevant European Community Document: 9597/98, Agrimonetary arrangements following the introduction of the euro; Relevant European Legislation

Committee Reports: HC 155-xxxiii and HC 155-xxxviii (1997–98). European Standing Committee B—Relevant European Community Document: 9690/98, EC development aid to South Africa (1986–1996). Relevant European Legislation Committee Report: HC 155-xxxvi (1997–98).]

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): I am grateful to the right hon. Lady for giving us next week's business. Can she shed any light on the date of Prorogation? What are the Government's plans for the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, which is due to be considered on Tuesday, following the Government's defeat yesterday at the hands of peers from all parties who are anxious to allow people to vote for individual candidates rather than centralised lists? How do the Government plan to get themselves out of this hole?

Once again, there is no planned debate in Government time on the economy. Thanks to Opposition parties, we have recently been able to debate a matter that the Government are clearly anxious to avoid, but if the House is to perform its job properly and hold the Government to account, provision must be made in Government time for an economic debate. Will the right hon. Lady reflect on the reply that she gave me last week—that the Queen's Speech will provide an adequate opportunity? That is not a substitute for the traditional economic debate in the autumn.

Yesterday, the Government launched an important document on the family which generated both support and controversy, described in today's The Guardian as "nannyism without the smacking". There was no statement on that report, but can the Leader of the House find time for a debate on this most important subject?

In the Army debate last week, the Minister for the Armed Forces said that he hoped to make an announcement shortly on the Territorial Army. In the light of the critical and threatening letter from the Select Committee on Defence to the Secretary of State published today, and against the background of the leaked letter from the Secretary of State for Scotland, can the Leader of the House assure the House that any announcement on the TA will be made by way of oral statement?

Can she assure us that the Public Accounts Committee debate has not been overlooked, and that, once the Pinochet case is resolved and no longer sub judice, there will be a statement in the House on how the matter has been handled?

Although I am disappointed that the right hon. Lady has not found time for a foreign affairs debate, will she undertake to keep the House in the picture, if events in Kosovo or Iraq take an unexpected turn for the worse?

Mrs. Beckett: I note that, on this occasion, the right hon. Gentleman has managed to ask for nine separate subjects to be debated. Last week, I recall, the total was only seven, so the number clearly rises as we go along.

The right hon. Gentleman first asked me about the date of Prorogation. I fear that I cannot add anything to what I told him last week, which is that—[AN HON. MEMBER: "You do not know."] The right hon. Gentleman is quite right—I do not know. The principal reason for my not knowing brings me to item No. 2 on the shopping list—the behaviour of the parliamentary friends of the Opposition in another place. If the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) is concerned about the date of Prorogation, I suggest that he has a word with his noble Friends. Despite his attempt—laudable, from his point of view—at a cover-up, may I point out that, whatever he says about votes on that issue coming from both sides of that House, it remains the case that, had it not been for the participation of hereditary peers, the Government would have won that Division by 29 votes? The issue of timing in this respect is in their hands.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about two issues relating to the economy. He asked me to reflect on the answer I gave him last week, that those matters would come up in the debate on the Humble Address. That remains the case. I am confident that he will not have forgotten that this week, we have had two full statements on the economy. However, I accept that that is somewhat different from the traditional autumn debates and the general forum for discussion of economic affairs, so I anticipate the matter being discussed through the usual channels.

The right hon. Gentleman asked for a debate on issues relating to attitudes to families; I shall certainly bear his request in mind. He also asked me to give an assurance that the arrangements for the Territorial Army are likely to come back to the House in the form of a statement. I certainly hope and anticipate that that will be the case. He also sought a debate on Public Accounts Committee issues; again, the matter is being discussed with a view to finding an early and convenient date for such a debate.

Although I cannot give an undertaking on how issues relating to General Pinochet will be handled, I note the right hon. Gentleman's request. When the matter ceases to be sub judice, it might be raised again in the House—indeed, I suspect that it will be, in one way or another. As for foreign affairs, he will know that the subject of debates on the Humble Address is a matter for the Opposition, and that it is the custom to have a debate on foreign affairs. In any event, I can give him an assurance that, as we did this week with the statement on Iraq, the Government will continue to keep the House informed about developments.

Charlotte Atkins (Staffordshire, Moorlands): As yesterday's vote in another place shows, it takes only 36 per cent. of Tory peers to defeat Labour every time. More than 100 of the Tories who voted are hereditary peers. Does not that demonstrate the urgent need for reform of the House of Lords?

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Quite right—abolish the Opposition.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Mid-Sussex): Jolly good question.

Charlotte Atkins: Will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House find time for a debate on that matter?

Mrs. Beckett: I shall certainly give favourable consideration to my hon. Friend's suggestion that the matter is one we should debate. I noticed a certain amount of barracking from Conservative Members about getting rid of the Opposition.

May I draw to the attention of the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) the fact that, as matters stand, there are some 750 individuals who are entitled to sit in another place and play a part in our legislature, not by virtue of any contribution they have made to the running of our country, but by virtue of the contribution made, for good or ill, by their predecessors? It is 87 years since the Conservative party officially agreed that it was time to get rid of the hereditary element, so I do not think that anyone can accuse us of being in a rush.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the issue of social security computing to be debated? As you are probably aware, Madam Speaker, the answer to a written question tabled today was apparently leaked to The Times yesterday. I am sure that you will agree that that is not a satisfactory way for matters to be dealt with in the House.

Will the Leader of the House also arrange for a debate on SI 2618 and early-day motion 1718?

[That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Disability Discrimination (Exemption for Small Employers) Order 1998 (S.I., 1998, No. 2618), dated 19th October 1998, a copy of which was laid before this House of 22nd October, be annulled.]

Many hon. Members have been shocked to find that the Government propose, via that statutory instrument, to do a U-turn on the ability of disabled people to seek employment with small employers, as a result of which their hopes of jobs have been dashed. It is urgent that we discuss that matter.

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot say that the Government will be able to find time for a debate on social security matters in the near future. I am aware, of course, as is the House, of the concerns that have been expressed as a result of some computer problems in the Department of Social Security, and I understand that the matter is under urgent consideration. I have not seen the other report to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but I shall certainly draw his remarks to my right hon. Friend's attention.

Ms Hazel Blears (Salford): I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to some fairly sensational reporting in the Manchester Evening News this week, putting my constituency at the top of the league for people leaving the city, and highlighting the huge problems of social deprivation and exclusion that we face. Nevertheless, the Government have instituted a number of initiatives to help Salford. We have an education action zone, a health action zone and a regeneration project. Can my right hon. Friend make time for a debate on the Government's measures to tackle the real problems of deprivation and social exclusion in our inner cities?

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend, whose constituency I know well. I share her concern for those who have, for so many years, suffered from social exclusion in the area. She is right to identify the fact that that is one of the Government's key priorities, to which we have already given a great deal of attention and to which we shall give more in future. I suspect, Madam Speaker, that, if my hon. Friend is lucky enough to catch your eye during debates on the Humble Address, that is exactly the kind of issue that may arise in the Government's programme.

Sir Sydney Chapman (Chipping Barnet): I congratulate the right hon. Lady on the choice of her recently appointed Parliamentary Private Secretary.

Since the House seems to be marking time waiting for amendments to two Bills in particular to come from the other place, and since the right hon. Lady does not seem to want controversial issues to be debated on the Floor of the House, will she look sympathetically at perhaps a three-hour debate between now and Prorogation on the importance of tree planting, as this year marks the 25th anniversary of National Tree Year, which I had the modest honour of instigating, and as National Tree Week, carrying on the initiative of 25 years ago, is impending? Whether tree planting is important to the ecosystem or to improving our towns and countryside, will she look favourably on this request?

Mrs. Beckett: That is an unusual but worthy request, to which I undertake to give careful consideration. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks. As for the suggestion that we are not keen to bring controversial matters before the House, I suspect that the matter that we shall be discussing later today will give the lie to that.

Mr. John Cryer (Hornchurch): My right hon. Friend will know that, a few years ago, when that lot on the Conservative Benches were in government, specific EU questions were abolished on the Floor of the House and pushed upstairs. Will the Government consider a return to a Question Time dedicated to the EU? I ask that after this morning's report that duty-free goods will be abolished for the entire population of western Europe, apart from European Commissioners, who will continue to enjoy them. If we had specific EU questions on the Floor of the House, we could put the spotlight on the huge gravy train that is the EU.

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend will know that it has been a goal of this Government to ensure that any exploitation of the public of Europe is severely curtailed, which is why we have been such staunch advocates of tackling fraud. I did see the stories on duty-free goods to which my hon. Friend refers. To be fair to the European Commissioners, it is not solely they, but they and other diplomats, who will continue to enjoy such a concession.

With regard to the handling of European matters, my hon. Friend will know, I think, that proposals for the better scrutiny of EU matters have been under discussion, and we hope to make a statement on the matter in the near future. Whether we should return to a dedicated Question Time on the matter has not previously been raised with me, but I undertake to consider that.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): We shall debate proportional representation this afternoon. However, in terms of the right hon. Lady's area of responsibility, does she agree that we could arguably reduce the democratic deficit and improve the scrutiny of Bills in this place by ensuring that parliamentary Select and Standing Committees reflect more accurately the proportion of votes cast in the country rather than merely the composition of the House? That would enable Committees to scrutinise the Government and allow the Government to overturn decisions using their solid majority, thus ensuring the best of both worlds.

Mrs. Beckett: I note with interest the hon. Gentleman's unusual suggestion, but the Government have no plans at present to change the composition of Select Committees. I take it that the hon. Gentleman's observations mean that he does not entirely share the views expressed by some of his hon. Friends in these matters.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): On the subject of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill—having no regard to the merits of the matter—can the Leader of the House confirm that, as the Parliament Act 1911 will not be at the disposal of the House, if the Lords insist upon the amendments that they have made already, elections will have to take place in May under the old system? Am I correct in supposing that that is the constitutional position?

Mrs. Beckett: My right hon. Friend raises a very important matter, which the Government have under review at present. I have little doubt that the relevant Minister will make a statement about the matter when the legislation returns to the House.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): May I lend support to the comments by my right hon. Friend the Member for North West Hampshire (Sir G. Young) about having a debate on the family? Given recent newspaper reports about prominent Members of Parliament and their colourful private lives, and given the BBC's selective way of approaching the issue, surely such a debate has great merit, because such behaviour flies in the face of the document that was launched yesterday.

Mrs. Beckett: How the BBC handles such issues is a matter for the BBC—and I am thankful that I am not responsible for it. All I can say is that it is always wise for any hon. Member to be cautious when referring to anybody else's private life—colourful or otherwise.

Angela Smith (Basildon): Is the Leader of the House aware of the great problems associated with the enactment of the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976, which does not apply to Northern Ireland? That not only means that it is difficult to enforce the Act's import and export provisions for the whole of the United Kingdom, but raises questions about animal welfare and the housing of wild animals in Northern Ireland. I understand that the police, welfare groups and local authorities would welcome legislation in this area. Will the right hon. Lady consider this matter and respond to the House?

Mrs. Beckett: I have recently become aware of the problem whereby legislation governing such matters in Northern Ireland—particularly regarding the treatment of wild animals and the conduct of zoos—differs from that in force elsewhere. A consultation paper seeking comments on such matters is likely to be issued shortly, and I hope that it will ease some of her concerns.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): Following the publication of the letter from the Secretary of State for Scotland to the Secretary of State for Defence, there is concern in Scotland about the ability of the military to aid the civil power in the event of an emergency. Will the Leader of the House assure hon. Members that the statement that she has promised about the future of the Territorial Army will address that specific point?

Mrs. Beckett: The contents of any potential statement are a matter for the announcing Department, and the issues that hon. Members choose to raise in response to such statements are a matter for them and for you, Madam Speaker. However, I have little doubt that, were there to be concern that the issue needed to be addressed further, the statement will provide an opportunity to do so.

Mr. Andrew Love (Edmonton): Unlike the Conservative party, which presided over increasing class sizes and the failure by 40 per cent. of 11-year-olds to reach the expected standards in both maths and English, is it not a fact that the Government have not only cut class sizes in the past 18 months but will invest £23 billion in our education system in the coming years? Will my right hon. Friend find time not only to expose the appalling record of the past 19 years of Conservative government, but to show what the Government are doing to put it right?

Mrs. Beckett: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He is entirely correct: the Government have made it plain from the outset that education is our top priority in terms of making the transformation that we believe needs to be wrought in Britain for the sake of our society and our of competitiveness as an economy. My hon. Friend is also right in outlining the steps that the Government have taken already.

This week sees the 18-month anniversary of our election to office, and the steps that the Government have taken in that comparatively short time have done a great deal to reduce class sizes. I believe that 100,000 fewer pupils are now in large classes than when we came to power. I assure my hon. Friend that the Government will continue measures in this area, and I am confident that the matter will be debated in the House from time to time.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): As I raised the question of the Dangerous Wild Animals Act 1976 in the House a long time ago, I trust that "shortly" does not mean after the next general election. Is it possible to have a statement before prorogation about the role of Grand Committees for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland, bearing in mind that it would be helpful if they met occasionally in the areas with which they are concerned? That would tie together the House and different areas of the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Beckett: I assure the hon. Gentleman that, when I say that a document will be issued shortly, I certainly do not mean after the next general election. The practice after previous general elections has been outside our control for quite some time.

The Government are considering the future of Grand Committees, along with other issues that flow from the passage of devolution legislation. We hope to be able to address the concerns of hon. Members regarding such matters.

Mr. Mike Gapes (Ilford, South): Can my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on Britain's relations with Germany, historically and currently? That would provide an opportunity to consider what happened in 1982, when the German Liberals changed sides and put Chancellor Kohl in power without an election, when the party received only a small percentage of the vote. Such a debate would provide an opportunity to draw attention to the ambitions of the leader of the Liberal Democrat party to become the Hans-Dietrich Genscher of British politics.

Mrs. Beckett: Most unusually, I am able to grant a request at once, as I believe that my hon. Friend will be able to raise those matters very shortly.

Mr. Soames: Now that the Chancellor has been miraculously transmogrified from a child of the manse into a reckless gambler, does the right hon. Lady agree that those who do not ascribe bad faith to the Chancellor believe that he must have been fed some very dodgy Government statistics? As it is well known that the statistics supplied by the Government are notoriously unreliable, will it be possible to debate in the next Session—if not in this—how we might improve the quality of Government statistics?

Mrs. Beckett: I believe that my right hon. Friend took account of about 45 different forecasts—not merely the Government's own forecasts—in making the judgments to which he referred in the House.

I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern regarding the quality of Government statistics. We all share that concern, and we noticed, particularly during the past 18 years, how the statistical service was repeatedly put under pressure and had its work distorted. That is certainly not a course that we propose to follow, and we intend to ensure that Government statistics improve.

Voting Systems

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

Madam Speaker: Let me tell the House that I have had to limit speeches from Back Benchers to eight minutes. I know that about 50 Back-Bench Members wish to speak in the debate. It would be counter-productive for hon. Members to approach the Chair to ask whether they will be called and when they are likely to be called. Two hon. Members have already approached the Chair. I caution hon. Members not to do so for the rest of the debate. Let us get on with it.

4.49 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Jack Straw): I am glad to open the debate on a question at the heart of our constitutional arrangements. The choice of 5 November—Guy Fawkes day—for this debate is entirely fortuitous. However, it serves to remind us how long Parliament has been central to the life of this nation, and how, over time, this institution has carefully adapted itself to reflect the will of the British people.

Discussion of electoral reform is not quite as old as Parliament itself, but there were those who argued for elections by a system other than first past the post even before the franchise was extended in the last century.

The Spectator last Friday contained a fascinating article about Winthrop Mackworth Praed, a Romantic poet and Conservative Member of Parliament who, in 1830, bought a rotten borough, which contained seven voters, for £1,000. The following year, he proposed amendments to the Reform Bill to give more seats to the less successful parties.

For hon. Members who are not versed in the verse of Winthrop Mackworth Praed, I refer them to the site on the internet where his poetry can be found: www.geocities.com.athens.acropolis.poems.praed. His poetry includes the immortal lines:

"When Freedom sheds her holy beam
On Negroes, and the Press;
When there is any fear of Rome,
Or any hope of Spain;
When Ireland is a happy home,
I may be yours again!"—

not yours, Madam Speaker. I was quoting the poet.

In this century, the debate about the voting system has continued. It was your predecessor but 10, Madam Speaker—Mr. Speaker Lowther—who convened a Speaker's Conference towards the end of the first world war to consider the most appropriate voting system. That Speaker's Conference recommended a town and country solution—the single transferable vote for the big towns and cities, and the alternative vote for the rest of the country. Ironically, given recent debates, that was rejected by a House of Commons dominated by Lloyd George's Liberals.

In 1931, this House voted for the adoption of the alternative vote as the means of electing Members of Parliament. The Bill was supported by almost every Labour and Liberal Member, and opposed by virtually every Conservative Member, but wrecking amendments from the other place assured its delay and eventual demise.

The domination of British politics by the two major parties, Conservative and Labour, in the first 25 years after the second world war, to the near-exclusion of the Liberals, ensured that the debate over electoral reform then subsided. Over recent years, however, that has changed. As the Liberals, and their successors—the Alliance and then the Liberal Democrats—increased their share of the vote at general elections, so did the call grow to introduce some form of proportional representation. The idea also found favour with some in my party in the late 1980s.

That pressure led directly to the establishment of the Plant committee to consider the issue. That committee's recommendations prompted our late leader, John Smith, to propose a referendum on electoral reform. The proposal for a commission to recommend an appropriate alternative to first past the post sprang from the joint consultative committee between the Liberal and Labour parties, which reported in February 1997.

In all the debates about the appropriate electoral system for Westminster, I have personally taken one side of the argument—in favour of first past the post. That will come as no great surprise to hon. Members on either side. I therefore remain unpersuaded of the case for change, although I am always open to higher argument.

I have also long believed there should be a proper, informed debate on the issue. Indeed, at my party's conference in 1995, I spoke on behalf of the national executive committee to urge my party to back a referendum on the voting system for the House of Commons. For it was, and is, my belief that this is an issue that should ultimately be decided by those who matter most in our democracy—the British people.

Following that vote at the 1995 party conference, our election manifesto duly pledged us to create an independent commission to identify the best possible electoral system as an alternative to first past the post. We honoured that pledge within the first few months of taking office. The commission was appointed on 1 December last year, and began its work early this year.

As we discussed in the debate on 2 June, members of the commission were chosen because of their knowledge and expertise, because they were broadly sympathetic to electoral reform, and because they represented a broad spectrum of political views.

Sir Nicholas Lyell (North-East Bedfordshire) rose—

Mr. Straw: I will, of course, give way to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but given your injunction, Madam Speaker, I ask right hon. and hon. Members to bear in mind that there are 50 hon. Members waiting to speak, and if I give way to everyone, only about 10 of those will be able to speak.

Sir Nicholas Lyell: I am grateful to the Home Secretary. On the so-called independent commission—the Jenkins commission had the brass neck, and the Government were misguided enough, to describe it as such—the Home Secretary is on record as describing it as a "relatively independent" commission. Can he think of any commission set up by a Government since the war that was less independent?

Mr. Straw: I can think of plenty—a long list from the Conservative years—but I shall not go down that track. We discussed the matter at great length on 2 June this year. There was never any pretence that the people appointed to the commission were not in favour of electoral reform. Indeed, as I pointed out in the debate on 2 June, even if I had been available for the post, as many former Home Secretaries are, I would be disqualified from serving on the commission. Of course the commission is relatively independent, because in life almost everything is relative, apart from death.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I know the right hon. Gentleman's position on the matter. I ask him not to make an assumption by referring to electoral reform. Reform means that things get better. Many of us on both sides of the House believe that we are discussing electoral change, not electoral reform. It is important to make that distinction.

Mr. Straw: I shall bear that in mind, but everyone knows what we are talking about.

Three of the five commissioners are members of another place—one was drawn from each of the main political parties. The terms of reference are set out in the first pages of the report. The report was published last Thursday. The Government and I are extremely grateful to members of the commission and its staff for their considerable work in bringing together the report in a relatively short time.

As hon. Members know, the commission recommends a two-vote, mixed electoral system. It proposes that between 80 per cent. and 85 per cent. of the members of this House be elected by individual constituencies using the alternative vote system. The remaining number of Members of Parliament—between 15 and 20 per cent.—would be elected by 80 or so areas on a top-up basis, in order, the commission argues, to mitigate the perceived disproportionality in the constituency results.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): I am grateful to the Home Secretary. It might be helpful to the House if he could tell us roughly how many democracies in the world have a system like ours—first past the post—and how many have the precise system recommended in the report?

Mr. Straw: Sixty-two countries use first-past-the-post systems, which account for 1.85 billion of the world's electorate. That is about 45 per cent. of those who have a vote. If one includes majoritarian systems of the kind that operate in France and French colonies, a majority of the world's population who have elections use first past the post. Various countries, mainly Spanish colonies and others in Europe, use a variety of systems of proportional representation. I am happy to place in the Library of the House the full list in all its glory.

No country uses the precise system that is proposed, but that is not an argument against change. This country and this House have often been in the vanguard, doing what other countries have not done.

[Mr. Straw]

I draw attention to the table on page 46 of the report, which provides the projection that the commission produced on the likely results of the 1997 election—the one with which we are all most familiar—had the proposed system been in place, and using the median—17.5 per cent.—of the range proposed. That shows that, on this system, Conservative representation would have increased from 165 seats to 168, an increase of three seats. Labour representation would have decreased from 419 seats to 368, a loss of 51 seats, or a reduction. Liberal Democrat representation would have increased by 43 seats from 46 seats to 89. It is estimated that the Scottish nationalists and Plaid Cymru would have increased their representation from 10 seats to 15. There are other exemplifications and other assumptions in the appendices to the report.

It is important to understand how the top-up element will be elected. In each top-up area, the commission proposes that each party will be able to put forward a list of names of up to three people to allow for "spares" in the event of deaths or resignations. [HON. MEMBERS: "Spares?"] This is rather like European elections. It is not really possible to have by-elections. The areas would either have one or two vacancies. They would have to have more people who were actually elected on this system than there were vacancies. [Interruption.] If the House could pay attention—

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): Will my right hon. Friend say that again? I could not quite take it in when he said it.

Mr. Straw: I ask my right hon. Friend to listen carefully. As they say in management-consultant-speak, I would like him to park that point before I come on to— [Interruption.] I would like to describe the whole of this top-up arrangement before he asks me further questions, if that is all right.

Voters will then be able to cast their second vote either for those on the list as a whole or for one particular individual on it. Those hon. Members who have carefully followed the proceedings of the European Parliamentary Elections Bill may be reminded of the Belgian system; indeed, it is similar, but not the same. There is one key difference.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): It is double Dutch.

Mr. Straw: We shall come on to the Flemish-speaking Victor d'Hondt in a moment, because he features in the system.

Although all the votes, whether cast for individuals or the list as a whole, will be used to determine how many top-up seats a party wins—using the now favourite d'Hondt divisor—it appears, although the report is not entirely explicit on this point—

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): What else?

Mr. Straw: We could have Sante Lague simple or Sante Lague modified. As hon. Members will remember, the Sant Lague modified system starts with the divisor 1.4, which is the square root of two. For reasons of simplicity the commission has chosen the d'Hondt divisor, where the divisors go seriatim one, two, three, four, five. That is simple.

This is the important point—[Interruption.] I am seeking to explain what the commission says. As I have explained—

Mr. Martin Linton (Battersea): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the system that he describes as the d'Hondt system is the name of an inventor of a system that simply involves taking the average vote, and that the system invented by somebody called Sant Lague is simply one of rounding up or down?

Mr. Straw: Both systems are about rounding up or down when we do not have exact proportions of votes cast to the seats available. That is why a system of divisors is needed.

Given the number of hon. Members who wish to speak in the debate, I shall regard the intervention of my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) as the last one in my speech.

I wanted to point out the difference between the system that was proposed and is used in Belgium, and the system that appears to be proposed in the commission's recommendation. It appears, although the report is not explicit on this point, that only those votes cast for individuals will determine which particular individuals on a list are elected. Votes cast for the list as a whole do not appear to enter into the equation as to who gets elected, as opposed to which party has those seats. In other words, it appears that those who cast a vote for the list as a whole will be abdicating responsibility for determining which of the candidates on a list should be elected, and leaving the decision to those who happen to vote for an individual on the list.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and I took the view, which I hope had the approval of the House, that having a ministerial statement only a few hours after publication of the commission's report would not have given hon. Members sufficient time to read and digest it. We felt that a full day's debate on the issue was a better way to allow the House to consider it.

The commission's report is one of the best written official reports that I have read for many years, and our gratitude for that must go to its chairman, Lord Jenkins. The Government would now like to see a widespread debate about the merits of the report within political parties, in Parliament and among the public at large. Today's debate is an important contribution to that.

As to timing, we have always envisaged that the referendum would be before the next election, and that remains an option. However, plainly, in the light of Lord Jenkins's specific recommendations, this is less certain, because the new system cannot be introduced until the election after next. Nor, in our judgment, is there a need for the Government to come to an early view about the commission's recommendation.

There are a number of important points of detail in his recommended system which Lord Jenkins has left to be resolved. We have always believed that the referendum, whenever it is held, should be a choice of equals—a choice between first past the post and an explicit alternative. Parliament may take the view that, in order that the British people know exactly what they are being asked to consider, the exact proportion of top-up seats, the way in which the constituency and top-up area boundaries will be determined and the exact method of allocating votes for top-up seats should be determined in advance. It is a matter for Parliament, but if we were to do that, these things would plainly take time.

As I have already explained, the simple truth is that, with the best will in the world, the Jenkins system could not be in place by the next general election. That is because the system that is envisaged would require the number of constituencies to be reduced from the present 659 to about 530 to 560. Every constituency boundary throughout the United Kingdom would need to be redrawn, a process that would take the Boundary Commission some years. That is because the average number of eligible voters per constituency at present is about 72,000. If that number were increased by between 15 and 20 per cent., the average would increase to between 85,000 and 90,000. There are no constituencies of that size except the one that happens to be at Milton Keynes.

In opting for the system it did, the commission acknowledged that "we cannot realistically expect our recommendations to be in operation at a general election in much less than eight years."

I am not sure that it would necessarily take quite as long as that, but the process certainly could not be completed before the next election.

When we last debated this issue—it was in June, on a Supply Day, when the right hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) spoke first—I told the House:

"The plan is that the referendum should take place well before the next election."—[Official Report, 2 June 1998; Vol. 313, c. 190.]

I said that in good faith. It was open to the commission to recommend one or other of the well-known options to first past the post—the alternative vote, regional lists of the sort that we intend or propose to have for the European Parliament, and the single transferable vote in multi-Member constituencies.

For each of those, it would have been perfectly possible to legislate for the referendum, to hold the referendum and, if there had been a vote in favour of change, to implement it well before the next election. However, as I told the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) in response to an intervention, the system that Lord Jenkins has recommended, though ingenious, has no parallel anywhere in the world, so one may be forgiven for not fully anticipating its prospect.

There are two other important reasons why the Government will not rush into holding a referendum. The first is that the Jenkins commission is not the only independent committee headed by an eminent member of another place to have reported recently. The Committee on Standards in Public Life—the Neill committee—recently delivered its report on party funding. The Government have strongly welcomed that report, and, as the House knows, a full day's debate on it will be held next Monday.

The Neill committee made a number of detailed recommendations about referendums, the detail of which we shall want to study carefully before we take steps to provide for a referendum on the voting system for elections to the House of Commons. Obviously, we shall take full account of the feelings of the House next Monday in reaching our conclusions.

The second reason for not jumping to an instant conclusion on the Jenkins report is that the recommendations need to be seen in the context of the Government's wider, far-reaching programme of constitutional reform. We need to see how the new election systems settle down in Scotland, Wales, London and the European Parliament. It is particularly important that we look at the commission's proposals alongside reforms to the House of Lords, which will follow the removal of the right of hereditary peers to sit and vote in the other place. It would not be wise to embark on reform to the House of Commons electoral system until we are more certain of the changes that will take place in the other place.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): In 20 years.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman says, in 20 years. We are advancing the programme for the second stage of that reform by establishing a royal commission.

Thus, a great deal of constitutional change is under way, and the British people would not thank us for moving too quickly without thinking carefully about how any changes fit into the whole. We shall want to see how the various changes bed down and how well the new electoral systems for the Scottish Parliament, the Welsh Assembly and the European Parliament work.

My main purpose today is to listen to the debate, but in so doing I wish to make the following points about the context of the debate and how it should be conducted, both here and in the country. First, in this debate, there can and should be no moral or constitutional absolutes. Each of the main British parties has, at various times in its history, or for various purposes, supported both first past the post and proportional representation systems. The Labour party was in favour of proportional representation for the first 23 years of this century, while the Liberals were against. Labour and the Liberals then changed places as the main opposition to the Conservatives, and in doing so changed opinions on PR.

Although the Labour party has not so far advocated a PR system for Westminster since 1923, apart from the alternative vote in 1930, it initiated and approved the introduction in this Parliament of PR for the Welsh Assembly, the Scottish Parliament and the European Parliament. In the 1970s, many Conservatives supported PR for this House. I have a long list of those, including the noble Lord Hurd, Christopher Patten, Lord Lawson, Malcolm Rifkind, Lord Younger and many other luminaries. Indeed, Lord Carr of Hadley, a predecessor of mine as Home Secretary, told his colleagues in the Conservative party in October 1977 that, with a PR system of elections for Westminster,

"the tide of socialism could be halted".

I remind the Conservative party that it supported the introduction of PR in Northern Ireland, including the introduction of a closed list system with d'Hondt divisors for elections to the Northern Ireland forum.

The common thread through all that is that no electoral system can be best for all circumstances. We must seek a system that is most appropriate for the purpose and functions of the bodies in question. My second point flows from that. I am sure that the House will wish to consider the outcome of any change to the electoral system, not some of the more exaggerated claims about fairness and wasted votes. I believe that all sides in this argument seek fairness, but it is important not to disguise self-interest in the outcome of any electoral system by claiming that one side of the argument has a monopoly on morality.

Lord Jenkins was on strong ground when he said in his report:

"fairness in representation is a complex concept".

Indeed it is. For all the claims of "wasted votes" made by the opponents of PR, and their equally vociferous claims that PR leads not to wasted votes but to wasted elections, there is a simple truth about elections by any system: some people win and some lose—[Interruption.] As I spent 18 years rather than 18 months on the Opposition Benches, I had a long time to spot that consequence.

Those who win form a Government who have power over those who lose. Almost certainly, the Government will then do things to which those who lose take great exception. Those who have lost may well feel that, in the event, their vote has had no effect, and was therefore wasted. In one sense they are right, but that is inescapable so long as we determine elections by the weight of votes, however the elections are conducted or the votes counted.

We must ensure that our voting system is as fair as possible, but mathematically there can never be an identity between the proportion of votes cast and seats gained for a party, and the proportion of power that is then obtained. Proportionality must be measured not only between parties at any one point in time, but over time—over many elections. As a result, what is fair or unfair, and what is proportional or not proportional, can lead to many different answers.

At the beginning of my speech, I referred to the changes that the House has experienced over hundreds of years. It is a testament to the strength of this institution that its members have accepted the need to consider reform when and where necessary. In the 100 years or so after the first Reform Act, successive extensions to the franchise changed the character and position of this place. Many of the reforms to our procedures and rules that have taken place more recently—the introduction of departmental Select Committees and of Wednesday morning sittings, to name just two—have also affected how we operate. It is therefore entirely appropriate for the House to have a full and proper debate on this issue.

There are scores of different electoral systems, and, I suspect, just as many different views on the subject of electoral reform among hon. Members. The Government look forward to hearing some of those views expressed today. We are also keen to see a much wider debate in the country at large. As I have explained, there is no need to rush to a verdict on this issue; nor would it be desirable to do so. The Government want to hear what others have to say about the commission's proposals. The commission has performed a valuable service in setting an agenda for debate. Now let the debate begin.

5.16 pm

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): As the Home Secretary knows, there are not many pleasures in opposition, but one of the pleasures is listening to an intelligent and articulate politician trying to square the circle between what he instinctively believes and what may ultimately be the Government's position. The Home Secretary did himself great credit today by not trying to pretend that he was entirely without a side in this argument. I noted that, at the outset, the right hon. Gentleman said that he was willing to listen to higher argument as opposed to better argument. That says a great deal about the functioning of the Government. Anyone who believed that the Home Secretary was open to persuasion on this particular matter would believe that a child welfare scheme put forward by King Herod carried political credibility.

There is always a moment in these debates when a word or phrase is uttered which shows the Government's real intention. When the Home Secretary uttered the word "spares"—genetically modified Members waiting to take the place of those who have popped off—it gave away the intentions behind his speech.

We must take exception at the outset to the title of the debate, which refers to the report of an "independent" commission. It could not have been less independent. It was a rigged commission—a sham process—which might as well have begun with its conclusions and worked backwards towards its remit. That is effectively what it did. It was a plan for an arranged marriage between a minority party and a section of the governing party—a relationship in of which neither side knows the outcome. What we can say is that the matchmaker was a self-confessed political colossus who was uniquely placed to judge the relationship between the two, having played a pivotal role in the near destruction of both. We saw today a bravura performance by the Home Secretary—a kicking into the long grass of Olympic standard, on which we congratulate him.

However, there were many things that the Home Secretary said today with which we agree, not least in what I thought was an honest defence of the British first-past-the-post system. As the right hon. Gentleman said, 62 countries use our system—almost half the world's population. Only 0.5 per cent. of the world's population use AV, and only 0.1 per cent. use STV.

We do not claim that our current system is perfect. We know that it is rough justice, and hon. Members on both sides of the House have experience of that. However, it is bizarre that we are accused of defending the current system because it suits us when we were slaughtered in the 1997 election by that system, and that Labour Back Benchers are accused of defending a system that works against them when they have a majority of 179 in the House. That is the sort of defeat that we could happily take. We could swallow a system that worked against us to that extent.

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I was interested to hear the hon. Gentleman's numerical analysis of how many countries use the first-past-the-post system. Could he name one post-war emerging democracy which, on reflection, chose the first-past-the-post system?

Dr. Fox: I know that the Prime Minister recently described Germany as his model democracy. Perhaps we should look at the most stable, economically active and prosperous nation in the world—namely, the United States—which has chosen to use the first-past-the-post system. Why do all those who want electoral reform focus only on mainland Europe, rather than looking more widely?

There are four reasons why we believe that we should stick to our current system. The first is accountability. The advantage of our current system is that all constituents have Members of Parliament, but, more important, all Members of Parliament have constituents. We all know that what we do and say will be scrutinised by constituents who all have a vote to put us out at the next election. That would not happen under any form of top-up.

I hope that it is accepted on both sides of the House that we do our very best between elections to represent all our constituents and not just those who voted for us. I know that many hon. Members resent the suggestion that they represent only the people who voted for them at the ballot box on polling day. That is a gross misrepresentation of how most hon. Members see their jobs. Above all, our system—sadly, on some occasions—gives voters an easy way to send the removal vans to No. 10, as they did last year. We cannot resent that. One of the strengths of our system is the easy way of removing a Government whom the people do not want.

Our system also gives us stability. Our current Prime Minister is the 12th since the war. Italy has had 56. At the opening of Parliament, we know that the Government can be expected to last out a full term. Most systems with coalitions mean that people do not know whether the Government will last six months, one year, 18 months or whatever. That is not a good basis on which to plan for a stable democracy.

The Home Secretary referred, at the end of his speech, to another important issue. Proportionality is a much-distorted argument, and he was correct to look at the proportionality of power. If we define that as the ratio between votes gained and time spent in power, our system is better than many others. It is not a good measure of proportionality that the Free Democratic party in Germany, on 5 per cent. of the vote, should have spent almost 100 per cent. of the post-war period in power; or that the National Religious party in Israel, on 1 per cent. to 1.5 per cent. of the vote, should spend such a long time in power. That is not a measure of proportionality that I wish to see here.

One of the arguments used on 2 June was that our system is not responsive. Several Labour Back Benchers said, "How can we accept our current system when a Government could bring in something like the poll tax?" As the Home Secretary said, Governments will do things on which they will be judged at a subsequent election. I should point out that, because of the responsiveness of our current system, the Government of the day had to jettison the poll tax mid-Parliament, without having to wait for an election.

Mr. Kaufman: With regard to the poll tax, is it not a fact that, in the end, the Conservative Government abolished the poll tax after losing a safe seat in a by-election, whereas under the proposed system, there would be no by-elections for top-up seats?

Dr. Fox: The right hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct and makes the point for me. I must say that if we had had to ditch a policy after every by-election disaster in 18 years, we would not have had any policies left.

Mr. Leigh: Although we should oppose proportional representation for the reasons given by my hon. Friend, will he—on behalf of the Opposition—say that we should not be complacent about the relative power of the Executive and Parliament; that Parliament needs to reform itself; that we must give increased powers to Select and Standing Committees; and that the Opposition will look at that problem?

Dr. Fox: There are many arguments as to why we need to check the power of the Executive and how we need to look at our practices in both Houses of Parliament. However, that gets to the nub of the argument. Changing the system will not change how the Executive are brought to account. That is one of the great red herrings put forward by those who believe in electoral reform.

Let me turn to the specific proposals by the Jenkins commission—I refuse to call it the independent commission. First, the AV-plus system with the top-up is a dog's breakfast. Hon. Members may be aware of the simple guide which has been produced, providing a simple explanation for voters of AV-plus.

"Mark your candidates in order of preference. Remember that your third preference for the candidate who comes third could be more important than your first preference for the candidate who comes first. The candidate who comes third could be eliminated and if their first and second preferences are for candidates who come fourth and fifth, then their third preference could transfer to the candidate coming second, defeating the candidate who came first but only as your fourth preference. If you want to vote tactically it may make sense to vote first for the candidate who you think might come third in order that they beat the candidate who comes second but who you believe your first choice would find it easier to beat. There will be some extra candidates who didn't win any preferences who are then elected because some other candidates from their Party did not get the right preference. There will be 17 per cent. of these candidates elected to make sure that things are proportional but not so proportional that they cancel completely the preferences of the other 83 per cent."

Simple, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Will the hon. Gentleman do two things? First, will he acknowledge that he is not reading from the Jenkins report? Secondly, will he give a simple explanation—perhaps in one sentence—of the system by which the Conservative leader is elected by his fellow Members of Parliament?

Dr. Fox: I might as well have been reading from the Jenkins report—which was just about as clear as some of that paragraph. It is entirely up to the right hon. Gentleman to make his own case, and spurious points, later. No doubt he will, because he himself has said some interesting things recently. First, he has said that, under the AV-plus proposal, all votes would be equal. They will not be equal. A vote for the most fringe candidate—the most way-out or wacky candidate—will count more often than those votes for the first or second preferences. Vote wacky, vote often—get your vote counted as often as possible.

It is said that the winning candidate will always have to have 50 per cent. to win, and will be "less despised" by more than 50 per cent. of the electorate than successful candidates under the current system—some mandate! However, all candidates will not reach 50 per cent. Unless the voters are forced by law to rate all the candidates all the way down, the returning officer could run short of votes before he gets to 50 per cent. What do we say to voters—"Unless you rate all the candidates, your preferences do not count?" It is not clear in the report.

Mr. Linton rose—

Dr. Fox: If the hon. Gentleman can tell me where it explains that point in the report, I will happily take his intervention.

Mr. Linton: Would the hon. Gentleman concede that the recommended wording in the Jenkins report for the second ballot paper is "Either put an X against the party of your choice OR put an X against the candidate of your choice"?

Dr. Fox: It would help if people had read the report. We are talking about the AV part—not the top-up part. The AV part will cause all the confusion with voters, and the matter is not at all clear in the Jenkins report.

The House should consider where the AV part might cause an even greater distortion than the current system. I wish to refer to the Scottish National party—I see a couple of SNP Members in their places.

As the Scottish National party has no policies at which anyone could take offence—and as the party is merely the political embodiment of the "Braveheart" video—people in Scotland might find it an easy second choice. What if everyone—Labour, Conservative and Liberal Democrats—made the SNP their second preference? It might start to win a disproportionate number of seats, and the Labour party might have to use the top-up system to regain some of the seats that it had voluntarily given away.

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): Is not the problem that too many people may make the SNP their first preference in the near future?

Dr. Fox: Yes, that is a danger, not just for Scotland but for the United Kingdom as a whole. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has drawn attention to it.

The second item in the report that causes difficulties is the top-up system. One of the most disturbing aspects for Members of Parliament is the notion of two classes of Members. Our current system makes us all equal: we are all responsive and answerable to our electors. Under a top-up system, a new class of Members would be created—Members who would be answerable not to their electors, but to their party bosses. We should take that very seriously.

I was a Government Whip, and I know the pressures that Whips can put on Members of Parliament to persuade them to vote in a certain way; but what if the pressure exerted by a Whip consisted not of persuasion, but of the ability to remove a Member from a list and deprive him of his living because he does not vote as his party wishes at any one time? That is a real danger. Our democratic tradition, from Magna Carta onwards, has been about how power can be transferred from the unaccountable to the accountable. This proposal seeks to reverse that trend in our democratic process, and to give political power in the House to a group of people who are answerable to political parties rather than the electorate—to the party bosses rather than the voters. At present, every Member of Parliament is accountable to the voters; under a top-up system, they would be accountable to the party bosses who rank them and allow them to stand for their parties on a list.

There is also the problem of weak government by coalitions. Notwithstanding what some may consider to be the consensual benefit of government by coalitions, they tend to be more short-lived and less able to make decisions. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) has said, decision making in government is a first-past-the-post activity. I think that Ministers are increasingly understanding that.

Under the Jenkins system, there would have been nine coalition Governments since 1950. There would have been two Labour and three Conservative Governments. That has many implications for the way in which our country is governed. A coalition Government will necessarily mean disproportionate minority power—as it does in many countries.

In a television programme in which I took part the other day, a representative of the Greens said, "This system does not help us. We wanted proportional representation, but this system makes it too hard for us to reach the threshold. It will not help those of us who wanted PR." The proposed system is designed specifically to help small parties, but only big small parties: in fact, only one big small party. There is only one winner in this electoral lottery, and the winner is—the Liberal Democrats! What a sham, what a fraud, what a con trick it has all been.

We do not know when we will be given a referendum, although we were promised one. I accept the Home Secretary's arguments about the deeply confusing nature of the proposals that have been made, their unworkability in regard to the time scale required by an electoral commission, and so forth—all of which I welcome. But no doubt when the Prime Minister says, "It is an option in this Parliament", he is saying to the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), "Just concede on this sell-out and this principle. Vote with us on that. Get rid of the single transferable vote. Prefer closed to open lists", and who knows what else, while at the same time saying to those who prefer the current system, "Trust me. Keep quiet on this, bear with me for now. I will promise them anything, and dump them at the right time."

That is simply not good enough. We need clarity: we need to know where we are on this subject which is so important to the standing of our democracy. It is not a game. Strong views are held on both sides of the House, but we must do what we do not do often enough. We must hold true to what works, and has been developed in our country's interests; and, above all, we must put the people before the politicians.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): My right hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) is a brilliant Home Secretary, but a lousy literary critic. He praised the style of the Jenkins report, which is, in fact, glutinously euphuistic as well as being intellectually shoddy.

As we have just heard, we have a system that is utterly clear and comprehensible. In exchange, the report offers us the following. First, it offers us a system that is hopelessly complicated. I suggest that hon. Members try to read points i to iii in paragraph 110, which explain the arrangements for allocating top-up members. Secondly, it offers a complex ballot paper with three confusing choices. Thirdly, it involves the alternative vote, which the report itself admits to be unfair, while also claiming that it enhances choice. The report is self-contradictory in the space of only three lines.

Fourthly, the numerical top-up allocation system is entirely arbitrary. The commission could have chosen any number; it chose any number, and it could have chosen any other number. An electoral system that is arbitrary in regard to selection by Government or anyone else is an unacceptable electoral system. Moreover, the top-up allocation system is not only arbitrary, but without any intellectual justification.

Fifthly, the report itself admits that the top-up system is unfair, because it requires—not "makes possible"—disparately sized and disparately elected top-up constituencies. It builds in unfairness, while claiming to get rid of unfairness. Sixthly, the report admits the existence of the potentially insoluble problem of filling vacant top-up seats, to the extent that it actually recommends leaving such seats vacant if they become vacant. Who will be represented with fair votes in a system like that?

Seventhly, the report admits that the new system may not even work. A recommendation popped in at the end suggests that the matter should be looked at, and that there should be another referendum. We do not need that with our current system: our current system works, and will go on working. Eighthly—I do not expect the Conservative party to make this point—believe it or not, I have been elected eight times as a Labour Member of Parliament. An anti-Labour bias is built into the proposed system. For one thing, the report admits in terms that Labour will not qualify for many seats under the top-up formula—[Interruption.] It is in the report. I suggest that hon. Members read it, as I have done several times from beginning to end.

Mr. Stephen Twigg (Enfield, Southgate): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Kaufman: No, I have only eight minutes in which to speak.

The basic formula for the alternative vote topped up makes it inevitable that there will be fewer Labour seats, and the extrapolations in the report show that the party will suffer more than any under that formula is the Labour party—just as Lord Jenkins's own party will enjoy the greatest enhancement.

As I said, I have been elected to the House eight times, sometimes during periods of immense electoral adversity. I have sat here for 28 years. I have not sought election 10 times and been elected eight times in order to support a system that is definitely intended to reduce the number of Members of Parliament from my own party. That may be regarded as self-interest, but I must tell my hon. Friends in marginal seats who floated in here, that they will not be here for 28 years with this system.

The report is deliberately aimed at reducing the number of Labour Members of Parliament through a referendum. I offer my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench a serious warning based on the past. They ought not to support this system when the referendum comes because, if they do, the Labour party will be split in a referendum campaign against a Conservative party that is united.

The Financial Times reported today that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will allow Cabinet Ministers to take either side of the argument in a referendum campaign. We had that in 1975 and the direct result was the split that developed in the party right through to 1980; it was Lord Jenkins who split the Labour party in 1980. In 1980, Lord Jenkins nearly inflicted a terminal split on my party and he is now trying to do that in another way. I recommend to my right hon. and hon. Friends that they should have nothing to do with the report, because it is a poisoned chalice being offered by our ex-colleague.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I do not think that the body elected by the present system is the most favourable one in which to get a sympathetic hearing for radical change in the system, but I had hoped for a little more objectivity, not least from the—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): Order. I have heard the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) shout in this Chamber several times. He will not do it again or his feet will not touch the ground.

Mr. Beith: The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said that he had been elected to the House eight times. I have been elected a few more times. On the last occasion that the electors of Gorton sent him to the House, nearly half of them did not bother to vote. That is a repeated phenomenon in his constituency because it is regarded as a safe seat in which nearly half the electors feel that their vote will not make any difference to the outcome. Right across the country, millions have voted, year in, year out and felt that their vote has made no difference to the outcome.

The first-past-the-post system give us huge majorities that the voters did not give to the politicians. Of course, politicians like it if they can drive through measures such as the poll tax, which the majority of people do not want. Lady Thatcher was able to do that, even though she had rebels in her own party, because she had an artificially large majority, far beyond that given by the voters. Indeed, she did not have a majority from the voters.

The system produces dramatic and exaggerated reversals between one Government and the next. I can tell Labour Members that it may feel comforting to have a large majority today, but previous Governments have seen what they thought was good work built for the future undone, because the next election resulted in a complete reversal of power, brought about not by the voters but by the vagaries of the electoral system. Some of the Governments whose work has lasted the longest and been most successful have been those who have had to look beyond their own ranks for support. The wartime coalition produced measures such as the Education Act 1944, which lasted for decades because it was built on more than the supporters of one party.

The first-past-the-post system produces perverse results, such as that in February 1974 when the wrong party was elected, and it under-represents minorities on a drastic scale. In 1983, Labour got just over a quarter of the votes and a third of the seats. We got just under a quarter of the votes and a 30th of the seats. That is not fairness by anybody's standards. More than that, it denies some parties seats in vast areas of the country where they have support. There are no Conservative Members in Scotland, Wales or any of the major provincial cities of Britain. The reason for that—

Mr. Ben Bradshaw (Exeter): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the fact that there are no Conservative seats in Scotland and Wales means that the Conservative party is likely to change its opinion when it starts winning them back under proportional representation?

Mr. Beith: I have heard no offers from Conservative Members to decline to stand under the proportional system or not to take the seats given to them by the proportional system in Scotland and Wales. Similarly, the Labour party—

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Beith: I have promised to limit my speech and I must try to do so.

In the southern counties of England, the Labour party has been almost totally unrepresented in most elections. That is not good for the party.

Dr. Fox: On a logical point, if the right hon. Gentleman makes that argument about Conservatives in Scotland and Wales, are we to assume that, because he stands under the first-past-the-post system, he somehow approves of it?

Mr. Beith: I have made it pretty clear over the past 25 years in the House that I seek a change in the system.

The system proposed achieves a much higher level of proportionality while not making coalitions inevitable. It retains constituencies, but uses a system that ensures that Members have to command majority support in the constituencies. It gives the voters a say on who the top-up Members are. It cannot be fixed by the parties—the voters decide which top-up Members come higher on the list. It provides satisfaction for the criteria that the commission has set.

Hon. Members, in both the Labour party and the Tory party, who are opposing this move and who have been elected to this place under the present system, must think about what they are doing. They are campaigning to keep out of here members of their own party in other parts of the country. When north-east Labour Members such as the hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) argue that the system should not be changed, they are condemning Labour voters in many parts of the south of England to never having a Labour Member of Parliament. When Conservative Members insist that the system should not be changed, they are telling the whole of Scotland and the provincial cities of Britain, "Do not bother voting Conservative there because we will never win." That is no way to treat the voters.

What are the objections? The hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) claims that it is too complicated. The Conservative party elects its leader by a complex system designed to ensure that he has a majority. If that were not the case, the right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) would not be the leader of that party now. If the election had been carried out under a first-past-the-post system, the leader would be the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke).

Most other parts of the United Kingdom use proportional systems. Such systems are used in Northern Ireland and are to be used in Scotland and Wales. They are used in the Republic of Ireland and all over Europe. What is it about the Conservative view of the British people that makes them believe that they cannot fill in a ballot paper that people throughout the rest of the world can fill in?

The Conservative party says that the system would produce coalitions, which produce bad government. There would not always be coalitions. The recommendations in the report would have given one-party government in 1983, 1987 and 1997 but, rightly, not in 1992 when no party was anywhere near having a majority of the vote.

Most of Europe operates stable coalition systems of government. We cannot talk about the rest of Europe in the presence of the Conservative party or some elements of the oldest of old Labour because it is foreign and anything that happens in a foreign country must be wrong. However, the Conservative party has suddenly switched the argument and said that we cannot have the proposed system because it is not used in any other country. It will have to make up its mind where its argument lies.

The Conservative party says that there are too many small parties. Ten political parties were elected to the House at the last election under the present system because that system favours small parties that are regionally concentrated, such as Sinn Fein. Two Sinn Fein Members were elected to the House under the present system.

The Labour party has a manifesto commitment to hold a referendum in this Parliament on Lord Jenkins's proposals. That commitment was that it should be before the next election.

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): The right hon. Gentleman has told the House, correctly, about the number of parties elected to the House. However, he neglected to say that most of those smaller parties operate in very circumscribed areas of the United Kingdom and, therefore, represent not the broad mass of the British people as a whole, but their own local electorate.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Gentleman is right, but I thought that I had said that. I was making the point that small parties are elected if they are geographically concentrated, but that much larger sections of opinion that happen to be spread across the whole country are not represented.

We should have a referendum during this Parliament. The Prime Minister has confirmed in this House and elsewhere that it is what the Government continue to envisage. That is our view and we see no persuasive reason for delaying it until early in the next Parliament. It will be necessary to introduce the referendum legislation in this Parliament, at least in the Session after next, in order to keep those options open.

It would be desirable for the boundary commission's work to be under way before the end of this Parliament to ensure, in the event of a yes vote, that the system would be in place for the election after next. The Home Secretary recognised that it would take some time for the system to be established, but I do not agree that it would necessarily take eight years.

Hon. Members would do well to remember that the coalition outside the House for reform of the electoral system is broad. People outside the House are less ready to justify unfairness or absurdity and they are less likely to be resistant to change at any cost. The diehard opponents of change do not represent the breadth of opinion, even in their own parties.

I believe that the British people will welcome change and a fairer system, in which their votes count. Electoral systems exist not for the benefit of parties but to give democratic power to voters. That is what the proposed system does, and that is why I believe that the British people will vote for it when they are given the opportunity to do so.

5.50 pm

Mr. Giles Radice (North Durham): I entered Parliament as an unquestioning supporter of first past the post, as I understood its simplicity and the fact that it led to regular changes of Government and to Governments who were, by and large, stable. During the 1970s and, in particular, the 1980s, I changed my mind for several reasons. First, the Thatcher Governments were elected on a minority of the vote—43 per cent. was the most that they won—but with large majorities that exaggerated the movement of opinion.

Secondly—this is an important point—the system became extremely unfair to the Liberal party, which improved its share of the vote but only marginally increased the number of seats that it won. The system seemed to become even less fair.

The third argument is geographical. After the 1983 and 1987 elections, the Labour party held only three seats in the south of England—we were becoming a regional party. The same applies now to the Conservative party, which has no seats in Scotland or in Wales. That is not good for democracy.

I believe that the system needs to be reformed in such a way as to take account of the strengths of the first-past-the-post system and our traditions. I supported the establishment of the Jenkins commission and I welcome its report, which is extremely well written. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on many subjects, but I think that he has allowed his prejudices to overwhelm his usual objectivity and fairness about the quality of writing.

The commission has come up with some subtle and well-argued proposals. Many of the arguments of the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) were directed not against those proposals but against any reform of the system. That is not good enough, and the hon. Gentleman will have to hone his arguments before the referendum.

All Labour candidates are elected by an alternative vote system, so Labour Members should not say, "This is something quite extraordinary. We have never heard of it." The system is linked to single-Member constituencies, so that the vast majority of Members of Parliament will be elected in constituencies.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Radice: I have only eight minutes, so I think that it would be unwise to give way to the hon. Gentleman.

There is an element of proportionality in AV-plus, but that element is quite small and is designed to make the system fairer. Because AV-plus is not strictly proportional, the traditional criticisms of proportional representation are irrelevant. We are not talking about the Israeli or Weimar systems—AV-plus will not create unstable Governments. Indeed, under AV-plus, the elections of the 1970s, 1980s and 1990s would have produced Governments with workable majorities in every case except the 1974 and 1992 elections, which certainly did not lead to stable Governments. Moreover, the fact that, under AV-plus, most elections would not produce a coalition answers at a stroke the argument about the third-party hinge—Conservative Front Benchers can no longer use that argument.

AV-plus gives voters a bigger choice. They can express a preference and they have two votes. Their second vote need not be for the same party; they may decide to vote differently—and why not, if that is what they want? We are offering voters a larger preference, especially as AV-plus can also operate with an open list system.

No system is perfect, and I agree with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary that there are no absolutes in this matter. AV-plus would create two classes of Member of Parliament, and that is a serious fault. However, under AV-plus, the vast majority of Members of Parliament would represent constituencies, whereas the top-up Members would represent small county areas.

Siobhain McDonagh (Mitcham and Morden): Since when has south-west London been a county?

Mr. Radice: I should say that most top-up Members would represent small county areas.

Areas such as Surrey, which have never had a Labour Member of Parliament, could have one under AV-plus. [Interruption.] Labour Members may not represent Surrey now, but Labour voters in Surrey would like to have a Labour Member of Parliament.

I support the Jenkins proposals and I look forward to hearing the Government's eventual reaction to them. I also look forward to campaigning and voting for them in a referendum.

Mr. Forth: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you confirm that, under new Standing Order No. 47, which was passed by the House in June, it is in your discretion as occupant of the Chair to allow extra time so that interventions may be made and taken during time-limited speeches?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Madam Speaker has ruled on the time limit, but I take the right hon. Gentleman's point. It has been agreed that there will be—for want of a better phrase—injury time for interventions. I do not want to waste the time of the House, but I remind hon. Members that all interventions take time away from the total number of Members who want to speak, of whom there are about 50.

5.56 pm

Mr. William Ross (East Londonderry): It is a pleasure to speak in a debate on this subject, as I am one of the few Members of Parliament to have been elected by a system other than first past the post—I have experience of the single transferable vote, proportional representation system.

The Jenkins inquiry was given a restrictive framework—it had to produce an alternative to the current system but preserve what are generally perceived as the merits of the simple majority system. The remit was interesting. First, the constituency link between the Member of Parliament and the electorate was to be retained. Secondly, the system was required to create stable Government—I assume that that means stable Government for the duration of the Parliament rather than the long-term continuation of one party in government.

Thirdly, there had to be broad proportionality of Members to votes and, fourthly, an extension of voter choice. Indeed, the Prime Minister set out similar arguments in his article in The Economist in September 1996. I believe that the current system does all that fairly well, so precisely why a change is required to achieve the same result raises some interesting conjectures.

As the criteria were so clearly and narrowly drawn, it is no surprise that the commission reflected the view that change was necessary. I must protest against the denial of an open and fair appraisal of electoral systems. The simple majority system was denied a hearing—it was condemned, hung, drawn and quartered without mercy or thought about its merits, and it was not allowed to stand comparison with the commission's ideas. This has been our first opportunity to make such a comparison.

On 12 March, I attended the commission's hearing at Queen's university, Belfast. As I noted at the time, the proceedings attracted so much public attention—even in a place such as Northern Ireland—that only nine people attended, one of whom was Mr. Patrick Bradley, the chief electoral officer for Northern Ireland. His interest was purely professional. I was moved to ask how many had attended the previous meeting, which had been in Cardiff. The answer was 30 or thereabouts. I do not know what was the attendance at subsequent meetings—I hope that it was somewhat better—but if ever there was a case of silence giving consent, I would suggest that the electors of Wales and Northern Ireland have shown that they are content with the present system.

In a matter of such fundamental importance to the government of our country, it is simply not good enough to draw up the guidelines so tightly and appoint a commission membership that is perceived to be in favour of change. The House demands fairness in appointments to every imaginable quango. No lower standard should have been applied in this case. The Jenkins commission should have included those who are prepared to defend the simple majority system and criticise the PR case.

No effort is ever made to seek out the views of people in Northern Ireland, who have lived with PR for many years. There was, as always, no real desire to learn from those with hands-on experience of the system in action.

We all know that, in our system, very few people vote for an individual. The presence of the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Bell) is an exception to the general rule. He is one of those—notably the hon. Member for North Antrim (Rev. Ian Paisley)—who appear because of a conjunction of events in a constituency or a community, but in general individuals rarely endure in the House unless they create or represent a body of opinion that finds expression by evolving into a political party—either that, or they are absolute political geniuses and giants.

People vote for a party largely on the basis of their general approval of the main course of action that it represents. Personalities and minor themes in a party's structures can affect its standing, but very few individuals survive the sea change of perception of a party and the resulting tidal wave of public disapproval, as was proved only last year.

Much is made of the stability created by coalitions, which are the consequence of PR voting systems. It is said that they are effective and consistent. I consider them, and especially the pernicious system of power sharing proposed for Northern Ireland, not to be consistent but to allow the persistence in government of a particular theme, party or group of personalities long past its sell-by date.

All political parties are coalitions grouped around their natural political, ethical, social and economic centres of gravity. In my opinion, the present system means that people are forced into general political coalitions, to the good of the country, and that is a uniting influence, not a divisive one as PR is.

Owing to their common themes, parties possess a unity that is not possible in the shotgun marriages of convenience and necessity that force disparate groups into the same sardine box after an election. I am a proponent of the simple majority system for many reasons, many of which have been, and will be, rehearsed today. We are all equal in status here, and, despite the protestations of Lord Jenkins, we would not be under the proposed system.

How is there to be an equal work load? How can there be equality in the constituency? How can the additional top-up Members avoid treading on the toes of the constituency Members in the areas that they represent? How is a chosen party hack to have the same status as the Member who had to do the hard, dirty work on the ground before he got elected?

Mr. Beith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Ross: No, I have only two minutes left.

Mr. Beith: I gave way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Ross: I know, but I have only two minutes left.

We must also consider the simple matter of by-elections, which would be conducted under a form of the single transferable vote system that governs elections and by-elections in Northern Ireland and that is so familiar to us. The simple majority system has much to commend it for the election of constituency Members. It is the experience of all hon. Members that the supporters of other parties approach us with problems and expect—and, I believe, usually receive—the same courteous treatment from their parliamentary representative.

We would all reject the idea that we are partisan between electors who share similar difficulties with public bodies and/or Government. It is our duty to represent them all, and I believe that we do. Indeed, we generally have no way of knowing for whom they vote. I agree with much of what Lord Alexander says in his note of reservation.

The only real power of the electorate over Government is the capacity to put the rascals out of office. I object strenuously to any effort by politicians or parties to diminish the capacity of the electorate to take vengeance on those who have disappointed them, something that the alternative vote system would do. The power of dismissal under first past the post is simple to understand, brutal, merciless and terribly effective.

The effect is a sobering element in the thinking of any Government—or should be, if they have the wit to realise it—or, more likely, on their Back Benchers; that was evident among those on the Conservative Back Benches in the previous Parliament. There is a pressure on Government at all times to explain and to convince their supporters and the wider electorate.

The cleansing effect that first past the post makes possible should not be underestimated. It is cruel, painful to many and brutally effective. It allows the defeated party time to think, to revitalise itself and eventually to return with fresh ideas and new people able to pursue radical policies. No other system would create such opportunities. For that reason alone, it is worth while—indeed, necessary—to retain it.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): This is an important debate, whatever view we take, because we are discussing the basis of our authority. I will have been here 48 years at the end of the month, and it seems to me that people want a representative when they vote. The idea that every Liberal or Labour voter supports every item of Liberal or Labour party policy is absolute nonsense. People want to be represented. Introducing proportionality completely destroys the idea of representation.

When we discussed the subject in the Labour party's national executive a few years ago, when Neil Kinnock was leader, I said to Neil that I had a feeling that if we had a party list system my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) and I would be at the bottom of the list. He laughed, but in a funny sort of way. That is the direction in which politics is going.

No doubt, all hon. Members will go to their constituencies this weekend. Every person whom we meet in our constituencies is our employer—the bus driver, the street sweeper, the home help, the policeman—and has the power to remove us. Our constituents expect to be represented. They decide whether they agree with our views and whether we have done a decent job.

Any element of proportionality, which destroys that link, could lead to people being governed by a Government whom nobody had voted for, because nobody would know the basis of the coalition on polling day. At least the coalitions of the parties are transparent: people can see them developing and know what they are voting for and what their own Member thinks.

I do not intend to waste much time on the Jenkins report because, candidly, I do not think that it has a cat in hell's chance of succeeding. The idea that the parliamentary Labour party would go through the Lobby to destroy 50 of its own Members, to redraw all the constituencies and to introduce a new group of piggy-back Members is ludicrous. I heard it said by one cynic that the Labour party is so loyal that, if chimney boys were brought back in the name of modernisation, we would all go through the Lobby; but turkeys do not vote for Christmas. I do not honestly think that this is a serious plan.

The real issue is one that Jenkins neither considered nor was asked to consider: the power that people have over the government of their country. This is the beginning of a debate about democracy generally. Unlike almost every other country, we have no vote over the head of state. We have no vote over the second Chamber. If my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister reintroduces Edward I's method of appointing peers—when peers began in 1295, they were not hereditary—we will be modernising ourselves back to the feudal period. There will be absolutely no popular control.

The House of Commons has very limited power. After all, the Prime Minister derives his legislative majority from the people, but most of his executive power from the Crown. That is why the Prime Minister has put a spin doctor into Buckingham palace. If the Crown is not popular, the Prime Minister might lose the power to appoint bishops, judges, commissioners, peers and so on. That is how the system works.

It amazes me that the British people put up with that system. What is it about our training and breeding that makes us think that we are not fit to elect the second Chamber or the head of state? Jenkins does not deal with that, because he is an Asquithian Liberal. We have to be very careful.

People ask whether the proposals would lead to a coalition; but they are all about getting a coalition. Those who advocate the proposals favour a coalition. I do not want to be too political in a debate of this character, but it is worth noting that there is a big Labour majority and the leader of the Liberal party is on a Cabinet Committee, but I am not. I met him voting against the lone parents provisions last December. I was threatened with disciplinary action, but he knew that he would be at the Cabinet Committee the next day. There is already a broad perspective of views. For example, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the former Deputy Prime Minister, has been given a job and the former Chancellor has been given a job. The former chairman of the Conservative party is in Northern Ireland, clearing up the RUC and David Mellor is in charge of football. When we talk about inclusiveness, I just wish some of us were part of it.

In future, unless we are clear about stopping it, all candidates will be vetted by the party machines. That is not about the power of the Prime Minister, but the power of the party leader. All the European candidates have been vetted and put on a list, as have all the Scottish candidates. My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Canavan) was left off, because he was thought less suitable to be a Scottish candidate, although the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) has suddenly given the Labour voters there a Member of Parliament by changing sides. Candidates for the Welsh Assembly will also be vetted. So the language of devolution is accompanied by the centralisation of power.

I do not wish to overdo the point, but as a Minister I visited the Soviet Union and Brussels many times. In the Soviet Union, we used to meet the central committee, which had not been elected. We met the commissars, and they had not been elected. I went to Brussels and met representatives of the central bank, and that had not been elected. I met the commissioners, and they had not been elected. The truth is that capitalism and communism have one thing in common—they do not want the people to have a choice of system, only a choice of management. That is the problem that we face. I have not heard anybody suggest that it would be a good idea for the Governor of the Bank of England to be elected, even by first past the post, and he has more power than any of us here. He is appointed, so he depends, like the bishops and the judges, on patronage.

We must face the problem that government now is less about representation and more about management. I get my fax from the party headquarters every morning, with quotations already attributed to me—"Mr. Tony Benn welcomes compulsory homework for pensioners", or whatever it is, and I am supposed to put it back in the fax machine to send to the Derbyshire Times. I feel less and less like a representative and more and more like an Avon lady, who is told what to say when she knocks at the door. If the Liberals had joined the right end of the Labour party, we might have had a progressive party, but the trouble is that they joined the wrong end of the Labour party. I will not go into that now.

Direct representation is the delicate thread that links the people with their Government and the basis of it is that they elect a man or woman they know, can argue with and can get rid of. Do not think that minorities remain minorities for ever. After all, 10 years ago, the environmentalists were bearded weirdos, but it will not be long before Swampy is in the House of Lords. The Dunblane massacre led to the previous Government changing their policy and apartheid ended by popular pressure. Democracy is not what somebody does to us if we vote for them but what we do where we live and work, and Parliament then gets the message. After 48 years here, I can say that Parliament usually gets the message last. We must listen to the people and not try to impose on them a pattern that will provide a permanent coalition and remove real choice from the electors.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) was so interesting and entertaining. May we vote for extra time for him?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Mr. MacGregor.

6.13 pm

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): As I read the Jenkins report, I became more and more convinced that proportional representation is an idea whose time has gone. Of course, the report contains some good things. At the beginning, it states:

"We all of us believe that any system has defects as well as virtues."

That is a crucial point, because it is easy for the Liberal Democrats to point to some of the defects of first past the post. The real issue for the referendum, if we have to have one, is which system has the greater virtues and the fewer defects. I am glad that the Jenkins report at least recognises that.

In paragraph 19, the members of the commission admit that "there is no surging popular agitation for change."

They can say that again. I cannot recall ever receiving any representations from any of my constituents about changing the system. In paragraph 7, the report states that the commission, in its hearings around the country, found a near unanimous opinion of "distrust of any electoral system which increased the power of party machines."

That is a relevant point to the debate that we are having with the other place on the closed list system for election to the European Parliament and is also why the Jenkins report is in favour of an open list.

The majority report continues with two criticisms of the German additional member system. First, it substantially increases the power of the parties at the centre and, secondly, it gives too much power to minority parties—the report refers specifically to the Free Democrats. It is interesting that the Jenkins report makes that criticism of the additional member, or alternative vote, system, because it draws attention to the fact that the result of the Jenkins system would be more coalitions. No wonder the Liberal Democrats are the only people to have come out strongly in favour of the system: they are the only ones who would benefit. That is why they have always been in favour of coalitions.

The Jenkins report also makes some excellent criticisms of the single transferable vote and rightly comes down against it. After all its criticisms of PR systems around the world and how they might be applied here, what are the report's conclusions? It suggests a system based on the alternative vote whose defects even the majority report acknowledges. However, Lord Alexander's minority report is devastating in its criticisms of the alternative vote. He makes it clear at one point that he believes that it is neither fair nor sound in principle. I hope that all hon. Members will read his report, because his reasoning on the unfairness of the alternative is impeccable and very difficult to refute. He describes the alternative vote as "wholly illogical." In a marvellous phrase, he asks why the second preferences of only those who have supported the least successful candidates should be taken into account. Lord Alexander also quotes Winston Churchill describing AV as "the most worthless votes of the most worthless candidates".

Mr. Bradshaw rose—

Mr. MacGregor: I shall not give way, because I do not have long left.

The report recommends a system that is difficult to defend and also even less proportional than first past the post. Lord Alexander also makes that point. The commission therefore had to add a top-up system to try to avoid the danger of recommending a system that is even less proportional than that which we have already. I beg all hon. Members to read paragraphs 116 and 117 because they contain three substantial criticisms of the top-up system in Germany and why it would be wrong to introduce it here. The report appears to conclude that it is a rotten system, but just a little of it might be all right here to prevent us from producing a system that is not as proportional as our current system.

The report also did not deal adequately with the question of two classes of Members of Parliament. I once had a constituency with 110,000 voters, and I know what a heavy burden that is. The Jenkins system would take us back to those days and it also does not deal with tactical voting.

This afternoon, in a delightful speech, the Home Secretary killed the Jenkins report with kindness. If we are to have a referendum, I hope that he will take into account the recommendations of the Neill committee, about which I hope to say more on Monday, and the Jenkins report's remarks about the conduct of a referendum. However, it would be much better if we were not committed to holding a referendum, because the best thing to do with the report would be to drop it now.

Mrs. Anne Campbell (Cambridge): I welcome the Jenkins report as the start of a healthy and much-needed debate on the way in which we elect our Members of Parliament. It has been my belief for some time that we need a fairer system under which Parliament better represents the views of the voters. It is shocking to think that nearly half the people who voted in 1997 might as well not have bothered, because their votes failed to elect anyone. That state of affairs is very bad for our democracy. In areas of the country with a large majority for one party or another, a large proportion of the votes do not count. That deters people from participating and reduces the turnout. It is an unhealthy democratic situation. We must consider how political parties respond to that situation. In 1997, my party concentrated on seats that could be won on a swing of up to 6 per cent. The Liberal Democrats have long since realised that their lack of people on the ground means that they have to concentrate on seats in which they are in second place, and which they therefore have a chance of winning. That means that only a small proportion of the electorate effectively decides the outcome of a general election.

That situation encourages tactical voting, a sophisticated expression that we have heard in recent years. Large numbers of people are voting for candidates who are not their first choice, in order to keep out the candidate they hate the most. I admit that that has resulted in some spectacular victories for Labour and Liberal Democrat candidates. The success of my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) in beating Michael Portillo was an outstanding example. Tactical voting at the last election apparently produced around 30 more seats for Labour and Liberal Democrat candidates than would have been the case had there been a uniform swing. That was unfair to the Conservative party. On other occasions, it could equally be unfair to other parties. There is no doubt that the electorate is becoming increasingly sophisticated, and is beginning to use tactical voting more than it did previously.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Campbell: No, I have only eight minutes.

The first-past-the-post group of Labour Members has sent me a document, which was written by my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), a long-time supporter of the system. The document says that the link between a Member of Parliament and his or her constituency will be preserved by a first-past-the-post system. I agree that that is important, but Lord Jenkins has cleverly devised a system that will preserve the constituency link while also enabling voters to have an alternative representative.

I represent a Labour seat in the middle of a Conservative area. I know from experience that many people feel uncomfortable about contacting an MP whom they know to have no sympathy with their views. [HON. MEMBERS: "Nonsense."] I say again that I represent a seat in a part of the world in which it has been rare for Labour voters to be represented by a Labour Member. Throughout the 1980s, and until 1992, the voters of Cambridgeshire were represented solely by Tories. Under the Jenkins system, the constituencies may well still have returned Conservative Members, but the additional MP would have been Liberal or Labour. That would have enabled people who wanted to make representations about the poll tax or fox hunting or any of the other issues that Tory MPs felt unable to speak out about, and to ask the alternative MP to raise their views in Parliament. That would have been healthy.

We have heard it argued that the first-past-the-post system is simple, and that is so. However, are that system's supporters going to tell voters that filling in a ballot paper on which they must list candidates in order of preference is too complicated for them? We are talking about an electorate that regularly does the lottery. If voters can fill in lottery tickets without turning a hair, it is not too much to expect that they can vote under a preferential voting system. I would not advise supporters of first past the post to tell the voters that they are not clever enough to vote under an alternative system. The voters would be less than impressed.

Supporters of the first-past-the-post system also argue that it produces stable government. It has undoubtedly produced stable Conservative Governments in the past, which is why one party here is so opposed to Jenkins. The Conservatives want to shut down discussion before it begins. They are terrified that if people start to see the advantages of a better voting system, they will never be elected again.

First past the post does produce strong Governments, but they can implement policies that should never get through any democratic system. The poll tax once again springs to mind. It also produces a system in which there are only two political views—those in favour, and those against. The adversarial system is extremely off-putting to a large proportion of the electorate, particularly women. Parties and politicians spend too much time bickering and attempting to undermine each other.

There is no room in the system for taking on board someone else's view, or to consider a range of opinion. Being in government means taking all the decisions and trying to make sure that they are sold to the electorate. Being in opposition means little effective participation. All the Opposition can do is make a noise and hope that it will convince people to vote for them next time so that they can have the golden prize. That is not grown-up politics. No one is right all the time. Our political system should be sufficiently grown up to recognise that.

[Mrs. Campbell]

Many of my constituents would prefer to see an end to the schoolboy slanging match that so often demeans debate in the House.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Sexist rubbish.

Mrs. Campbell: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to make his own points later.

The document that I was sent also says:

"In casting their votes, voters may show a preference for a particular party which has no likelihood of forming a government, but they have nevertheless participated in the democratic process as much as a voter who does not cast his or her vote at all and stays at home."

I profoundly disagree. I do not believe that a voter who stays at home has contributed much to the democratic process. For goodness sake, let us have a change of system.

6.26 pm

Mr. Alasdair Morgan (Galloway and Upper Nithsdale): I cautiously welcome the Jenkins report's conclusions. The underlying basis of the system that it proposes has been Scottish National party policy for many years, and it formed the substance of our submission to the Jenkins commission. We did not adopt that stance out of self-interest—the SNP's tactic in the United Kingdom Parliament has been to gain a majority of Scottish seats, and it is far easier to do that under a first-past-the-post system than under any system of proportional representation.

No electoral system is perfect, and none will give us all we want, but the combination of alternative vote and additional Member will balance the needs for proportionality and for the constituency link. I begin to disagree with Jenkins, however, on the number of top-up seats proposed, because that figure is not nearly sufficient to ensure proportionality. The report seems to say that first past the post gives unjustified majorities in many Parliaments, and that that should be corrected if it is a small unjustified majority, but not if it is a large one.

I welcome the split proposed in the top-ups within the electoral regions and the four nations of the United Kingdom. That will allow for regional and national diversity. It will assist proportionality. I welcome, too, the fact that the regions chosen for Scotland are the same as those for the top-up seats for the new Scottish Parliament.

However, there is a substantial difference between the Jenkins model and the Scottish Parliament proposals in the Scotland Bill. At Holyrood, there will be seven additional Members for each region of Scotland, but under Jenkins there will be only one or two. In a three-party system, the availability of one or two extra seats might with a lot of luck just go towards proportionality. However, that certainly will not be so in the four-party system that exists in Scotland.

At the 1997 general election, the Conservatives got 17 per cent. of the vote in Scotland, and no seats at all. In the Scottish Parliament, they would get 17 per cent. of the seats on that vote, but under Jenkins they would get only 8 per cent of the Westminster seats. My own party got 22 per cent. of the Scottish vote at the general election, but only 8 per cent. of the seats. In the Scottish Parliament, we would hope, if that vote were repeated—and we expect to gain substantially more—for 22 per cent. of the seats, but the Jenkins proposals would give us only 15 per cent. of the seats for Westminster. It seems strange to say that one system is unfair yet to correct only a little bit of that unfairness. The Jenkins report is an improvement, but it is a compromise in an attempt to appease those who are against any kind of change.

My last word on top-up Members is that the proposal does not seem to be such a radical innovation. We have it now in Scotland. The hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), who opened the debate on behalf of the Conservative party, was appointed some time ago as the Tory top-up Member for Scotland.

Jenkins also proposes, or seems to recommend, a reduction in the number of Scottish Members provided for in the Scotland Bill. I accept that the number of Scottish Members at Westminster should be reduced, but I cannot accept the Government's proposal that the link should be maintained between Scottish Members of the Scottish Parliament and Scottish Members of the Westminster Parliament, so that, when the number of Scottish Members at Westminster is reduced, the number in the Scottish Parliament should also be reduced. In the light of Jenkins's endorsement of the reduction in Scottish representation in this House, there is no longer any justification to maintain a link between the two Parliaments. There is no longer an argument that the two Parliaments should maintain parallel constituencies. I look to the Government for assurance that they will not try to overturn the amendments that have been passed in another place which seek to sever the links between the two constituencies.

We look to the Minister to ensure that there will be a referendum before the next election. If not, the procedures necessary to put these recommendations in place, were they to be approved in a referendum, are such that we could not get to the proportional system at the election after next. There would need to be a Bill to set up a referendum, a Bill to change the voting system, and a Boundary Commission investigation.

My final point is a small one. Is there any reason why we cannot have the alternative vote part of the recommendations now? Is there any reason why we cannot have AV at the next general election?

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): The answer is obvious. The top-up is designed to correct the distorting effects of AV. Therefore, to implement merely AV would make our electoral system even less proportional than it is.

Mr. Morgan: The distorting effect is because we have single-Member constituencies. That is where the main problem arises. The argument used in the minority report is spurious. It is that a vote is worth less if the voter happens to vote for the candidate who comes third—not that the voter knows that his chosen candidate will come third when he votes. I would prefer that the second vote of a voter who voted for the third candidate was taken into account than that all the votes of, for example, 74 per cent. of the voters are ignored, as happens now. That is what happened in the Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber constituency at the 1992 general election. The winner was elected on 26 per cent. of the vote.

That is the kind of nonsense that we need to get rid of. That is why I recommend that we consider having AV on its own at the next election. I suspect that we would need only a one or two-clause Bill to introduce that part of the proposals.

6.32 pm

Mr. Roger Godsiff (Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath): I am a strong supporter of electoral reform, but not of proportional representation. The Jenkins commission did the best job it possibly could, bearing in mind that it was set an impossible task of reconciling the irreconcilable. I say that because the criteria that it was set were fundamentally flawed.

The main part of the recommendations refers to the alternative vote, which I strongly support. It is an improved version of the first-past-the-post system. It is not proportionate, and was never intended to be in any shape or form. It allows, for example, Labour supporters living in Newbury who know that their candidate will not come first or second, to vote for the candidate of their choice first and to indicate their second preference. Under the present system, they have to make a choice for one of the other candidates, or vote in the knowledge that their vote will be wasted.

In addition, AV does not force people to mark their ballot paper 1, 2, 3, 4, but allows them to put a 1 or an X against their preferred candidate. The vote would be treated in exactly the same way as it is now. The AV proposals are well argued by the Jenkins commission, and are worthy of support.

The second part of the recommendations refer to the additional member system elected on a county, city or geographical area. As I have said, the commission has done the best it can working with flawed criteria. The report states clearly:

"The Commission shall observe the requirement for broad proportionality, the need for stable Government, an extension of voter choice and the maintenance of a link between MPs and geographical constituencies."

It would have been much better if it had stated that the commission shall observe the requirement for the maintenance of a link between constituency Members of Parliament and their constituency.

Let me explain what I mean. Because of the criteria that were laid down, the noble Lord Jenkins and his colleagues have come up with what he has called a "unique British solution". One of the members of the commission, Mr. Lipsey, is reported in The Observer as saying that the commission rejected "importing foreign muck". I find it surprising if Lord Jenkins takes such a xenophobic attitude towards the British electoral system, given that throughout his political life he has championed everything European. That is by the bye. One of the members of the commission said that and no doubt Lord Jenkins went along with it.

Let us move on to what this unique British top-up system would mean. I shall cite three examples. In Birmingham at the general election, 10 Labour Members and one Conservative Member were elected. Under the Jenkins proposals for AV, there would be eight Labour Members and one Tory Member. The percentage votes were 56 per cent. for Labour, 27 per cent. for the Tories and 11.8 per cent. for the Liberal Democrats. Under the top-up system, both the Conservatives and the Liberals would have an extra seat.

I mean no disrespect to the Liberals, but I cannot understand how a Liberal Democrat could be called the hon. Member for Birmingham when he has been elected on 11.8 per cent. of the vote. It is illogical. If one wants to give more seats to the Liberals, so be it, but there are other ways of doing it. That is essentially what this is all about, but it is nonsense to give them localised democratic legitimacy in this way.

At the general election, every seat in the county of Surrey was held by the Conservative party. It is a rock-hard Conservative area. Under the Jenkins proposals, there would be seven Tories and two Liberals, with a top-up of one Liberal Member and one Labour Member. Much as I respect the work of Labour party members and candidates in Surrey, I cannot accept that a Labour candidate could be the hon. Member for Surrey, because he would not have been elected by any of the 11 constituencies in that county.

Finally I come to Durham, which is an interesting county. It has seven seats. Under the Jenkins proposals, there would be six Labour Members, with one top-up Tory. As my hon. Friends from the north know, with the exception of Darlington, those seven seats are as rock-hard as ever there will be. They have been Labour for time immemorial. In the county of Durham, every vote cast for the second candidate—the list candidate—by Labour supporters would be wasted. It would not matter if the Labour candidate at the top of the list in Durham got 99.9 per cent. of the votes, he or she could not be elected. That is nonsense, and a betrayal of democracy.

I do not oppose giving the Liberals more seats, but if we are going to do that, let us be honest about it and give them seats. We should not make out that we are imposing democratic legitimacy by aligning such seats with a localised area. It will not work, and it will be deeply resented by Members of Parliament who are elected for constituencies, whether by first past the post or by the alternative vote system. That proposal is the flaw in the Jenkins proposals, and I hope that the Government will not go down that path.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): We have heard many theories about how our electoral system should be conducted. Theories are all very well for academics, but they do not work in practice. Our first-past-the-post system has developed over centuries, and does work in practice. I am fed up with hearing how there are no Conservative Members in Scotland or Wales. The reason why there are no Conservative Members in Scotland is simply that the people of Scotland, or the vast majority of them, did not want any Conservative Members. They got what they wanted. I am not happy with that, but I accept it, just as the people of Surrey have no Labour Members; long may that remain so.

The talk of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) of wasted votes is nonsense. A vote is never wasted. The talk of safe seats where one's vote does not count if one does not support the party likely to win is also nonsense. I can name at least 100 former Conservative Members who would testify to that, because they thought that they were in what are called safe seats. The people voted against them. I am sorry that they did, but that is what democracy and giving power to the people is about—not the gerrymandering that would become part of our system if the Jenkins report were implemented.

[Mrs. Eleanor Laing]

We must not be so arrogant as to sit in academic rooms and examine theories while ignoring the lessons to be learned from other legislatures. With several other hon. Members, I have just returned from New Zealand. Lord Jenkins mentioned in his report the mixed member proportional system introduced in New Zealand for the 1996 general election. He is dismissive of the difficulties that the people of New Zealand are experiencing as a result of its introduction.

I want to present evidence from someone who really knows about the system, the Speaker of the New Zealand Parliament, Mr. Doug Kidd. He explains some of the difficulties in the New Zealand Parliament, and says that proportional representation

"involves members being elected for individual constituencies and also from party lists. Its essential feature is that the overall party composition of Parliament is the same as the proportions of the national vote that parties obtain at the election."

That is all very well in theory. He continues:

"From having a well-established, two party parliamentary system, New Zealand has moved to a multi-party system. There are at present six parties represented in Parliament, with no single party having an overall majority. Coalition or minority government has now become the norm."

Lord Jenkins suggests that coalition and minority government would not be the norm under his system.

Mr. Radice: It is a different system.

Mrs. Laing: Labour Members say that it is a different system, but a proportional system produced that result; it always does. It is arrogant only to look at theories and ignore practice. It is clear that some Members want to stay in the ivory tower of academia. I am talking about what happens in practice, and I am bringing news of exactly what happens in New Zealand.

The Speaker of the New Zealand Parliament adds that the introduction of the system

"has involved a massive culture shock for politicians who were used to the old system and . . . for society as a whole which had clearly not appreciated the implications of it and which now appears to be a little uncertain about the results."

That is putting it mildly.

The first question that everyone asks New Zealand Members of Parliament is, "Are you a real MP or were you elected on the list?" That is what happens in practice. It is insulting, because introducing two classes of MP means introducing a difference between them, and one group will always be second-class MPs. The other problems that arise from the New Zealand system are well documented by their Parliament's Speaker, and I should be glad of another opportunity to tell hon. Members about them.

Another problem arises from coalition government. As the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said, the people get a Government whom no one elected. As happened this year in New Zealand, the parties that come first and third in the polls are the ones that matter, because they do a deal to form a Government. Their manifestos are merged, and the people get not what they voted for in the majority, but a mish-mash of the manifestos of the first and third parties. What of those who voted for the party that came second? They do not count at all. It is nonsense to suggest that a so-called proportional system is fairer; it is not.

Our system is not only fair, but one that people understand. People can vote tactically if they wish to. I was amazed that the hon. Member for Cambridge was so dismissive of the electorate's ability to vote tactically. They are entitled to if they wish. We have an intelligent electorate, who understand how best to cast their votes. They know that their votes are not wasted. My party supports our traditional system, not because it is good for our party—clearly, looking at the Conservative Benches, it is not—but because it is best for our country and for democracy. We put first not the party's interests, but those of the country.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): I am glad to follow the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing), who made a point different from that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). He gave a clear view of where the Labour party stood and she finished her speech talking about where the national interest lay. I shall speak briefly on the national interest. I must tell my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) that the debate will be constructive, not destructive. We will not fall out on the issue but join the debate, talk to each other and reach conclusions that will eventually be put to the country.

I want to refer to criticism of the Jenkins report from a party that is not represented in the House and therefore has no voice. It writes:

"the use of the Alternative Vote will create as many anomalies as at present;

two types of Member of Parliament will be created, one with a larger constituency to look after, the other free to swan around Parliament furthering his political career;

the proposed party lists will put words into the mouths of the voters;

there is in-built discrimination against independents and minority interests. In particular, independent candidates will not be able to stand for the "top-up" ballots . . . If there is to be a referendum on these proposals", the party will campaign against them. As one who will participate in the national campaign, taking up the offer of the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and the statement of the Home Secretary that we should take the campaign to the country, I welcome the Liberal party to our debate.

Mr. Beith: They are the Wee Frees—the few who did not join us.

Mr. Bell: It is the genuine Liberal party, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) referred to the German situation. Many of us hear that Germany is a stable democracy with a powerful economy. We ought not to relate the two. One can have a stable Government and an economy that is not stable, or a stable economy and a Government who are not stable. After the last election in Germany, it took a month for the German Parliament to come to a conclusion between the red-green parties and the Social Democrats. I picked up a statement made by the German president,

Roman Herzog. He said that the new Government must find the courage for "vital change." He said:

"We need reforms and we don't have that much time. The world won't wait for us."

That does not seem to me a ringing endorsement of the coalition Government who have now been turfed out of office.

We all enjoyed the vignette of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). Literary criticism has been rife in this debate, so it is quite nice to say that it was a vignette. It was a wonderful speech from a right hon. Friend who has been in this Parliament for 48 years. I am glad to be joined by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) because he and my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield share a common experience. They were in the minority Government from 1978 to 1979—a Government who fell when the Liberals withdrew their support for the Labour Government. The Liberal party refused to support worker participation in the Bullock report. Lord Callaghan, who was the Prime Minister at that time, told me specifically, "We could not get worker participation through that Parliament because there was no support from the Opposition party." We were supposed to have the Lib-Lab pact.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk referred to a statement made by Winston Churchill in 1930. Jenkins in his report says that the House of Commons accepted electoral reform in 1930. It did so because the minority Government of Ramsay MacDonald had their arm twisted off. They were told by the Liberals that unless he gave them electoral reform, they would not support repeal of the Trades Disputes and Trade Unions Act 1927. The Liberals even then were dictating terms to a minority Labour Government. In the end, MacDonald agreed in order to get two more years in office. He was overwhelmed by the catastrophic international crisis of 1931, and we had to wait until 1945 to see a repeal of the Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act 1927.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) said in an intervention that all the emerging countries of Europe had chosen a system of proportional representation. Let me simply quote what the shadow Foreign Secretary of the Czech Republic has said in a letter to The Times. He says:

"We have found that PR leads to an unhealthy, inequitable, fragmented political environment, with larger parties subjected to blackmail by the smaller parties."

That is a statement from a new republic that went down the road of PR and is looking to get back to a majority or first-past-the-post system.

The point has been made often—the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Morgan) referred to it—that Lord Jenkins did not have the courage of his convictions. If he had, he would have taken up the proposals of 1917, to which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary referred. Jenkins said that he accepted them and wished that they would be accepted. The proposals were for a transferable vote and an alternative vote throughout our land. He might have given minority parties a 5 per cent. threshold. The Liberal party, which has had scorn poured over it from the Opposition Benches, might have had a chance of being represented here. The Green party, to whom my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield referred, might be represented in the House. Even minority parties such as Arthur Scargill's Socialist Labour party might be here, but Lord Jenkins did not go down that road because as president of the Liberal Democrat party, he is trying to increase the number of Liberal Democrat Members of Parliament.

We have heard a lot about the alternative vote. If the alternative vote had been extant at the last general election, it would have reduced the number of Conservative Members to 62 and increased the number of Labour Members to 450. It would have added volatility to the system. The top-up is needed to rectify the volatility. Lord Jenkins's report would create volatility. It is nothing to do with first past the post. He creates volatility through his alternative vote and then seeks to stabilise it with a new system of top-up Members of Parliament.

The first-past-the-post system has given us stable government. It gives us the constituency link. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge referred to accountability; it provides accountability. It also gives us the doctrine of mandate; we have not heard too much tonight about the doctrine of mandate. Every party puts forward its proposals in a general election and the country votes on them. The manifesto is there; we are there to fulfil the manifesto commitments. If we fail, we should say why. If we are not successful, the public have a chance to turn us out.

Our campaign will go to the country. We will debate this issue. We will campaign on it on a party basis in the sense that all those who are opposed to the changes will join together. We will campaign with trade unionists, academics, and business men. We will let the people of our country know what the alternative system means. We believe that when the people can see what is on the table, they will support the present system.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): The hon. Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) covered a good deal of recent history, or relatively recent compared with the history of the barons with which we were regaled by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). The hon. Member for Middlesbrough demonstrated how wise the Labour party was before the election to enter into an agreement that the issue of the electoral system should be put to the electors for their decision during the lifetime of this Parliament. For history, and recent history is no exception, suggests that when parties enter Government under a system of election that has favoured them, they are reluctant to alter that system by simple fiat. The hon. Gentleman is in the line of that historical tradition.

It is highly encouraging that so many Labour Members, many of whom have spoken in the debate and many of whom will not have the opportunity to speak because of the duration of the debate, take a more principled view and have argued strongly the case which, although headlined by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield, was not developed quite with the logic that it deserves. The right hon. Gentleman, with great passion, reached the climax of his speech with a declaration that "The people want to be represented." To that I say yes. He is entirely right, and that is the justification for the Jenkins commission's report.

It is the people's interest with which we ought primarily to be concerned, not putative views about what the impact of change might be for people who have shown an ability to adjust to some extent to whatever system they have. The capability of the present system to adjust to take account of people's views has been stretched beyond breaking point. The time has come to recognise the appalling distortions that the first-past-the-post system has caused in our democracy. Those distortions have made the system so incredibly unrepresentative in so many large parts of our country that at this time, there is no voice for Conservatives in any of the great cities in England.

Mr. Graham Brady (Altrincham and Sale, West): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maclennan: No. I, too, am obeying the rubric about brevity so I will not take interventions on this occasion, although I hope that we shall have other occasions on which to deploy these arguments.

The Jenkins commission was set up wisely and in fulfilment of the pre-election undertaking of the Liberal Democrats and the Labour party. In that sense, it is clear that the commission had two parents. It could also be said to have achieved legitimacy of support when, at the general election, the electorate backed those two parties to the extent of 64 per cent. of the vote. The commitment to hold a referendum within the lifetime of this Parliament was part of that undertaking and we look to the Government to fulfil it. I heard what the Home Secretary said about the complexity of the issues, but no one doubted that they would be complex when the two parties reached the agreement to which he put his signature, along with four other current senior Cabinet Ministers.

If the system is to be tested by the people, it should be tested close in time to the raising of the issues by the Jenkins commission, so that the arguments advanced are germane to the circumstances in which we live today.

Dr. Brian Iddon (Bolton, South-East): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Maclennan: I cannot give way, for the reasons I have already given.

The geographical rubric and requirement that the Jenkins commission had to take into account was a wise one, given the extraordinary distortions that the present system has produced. By its compromise, the commission has resolved that difficulty far better than any of the other systems that have been proposed would have done. The Liberal Democrats proposed a single transferable vote, and to those who say that Lord Jenkins was a kept chairman, I can say that he has robustly rejected the arguments that I advanced on behalf of the Liberal Democrats and explained why our proposal would not meet the criteria set down by the Prime Minister. That is undoubtedly true.

There has been a trade-off between proportionality and maintaining the constituency link. On reflection, I think that Lord Jenkins was probably right to take the view that, for many British people, the constituency link remains extremely important. It is the place in which they see their Member of Parliament acting to represent them, which the right hon. Member for Chesterfield regards as being of vital importance.

Now that the right hon. Gentleman has returned to the Chamber, may I take him up on one issue? He suggested that Lord Jenkins's proposals would give enormous power to political parties, but that is not borne out by the recommendations of the Jenkins report, which has clearly avoided the trap of the closed electoral system. Nor can it be argued that the proposed system is in any way worse than the existing system.

In the early 1980s, the right hon. Member for Chesterfield devoted considerable effort to ensuring that Members of Parliament who were not of a like mind to his could be, would be and, in some cases, were deselected by the Labour party. That was a highly controversial matter and it had nothing to do with the electoral system; it had a great deal to do with the centralising tendencies of the Labour party at that time. It is those problems on which the right hon. Gentleman should focus, if he genuinely wants power to be dispersed. The undoubted strength—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order.

7.3 pm

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Earlier, two arguments were advanced of which the House should take no notice. The first is that more than half the electorate at the last election had no hope of electing anybody. If we introduce any system with a threshold of 50 per cent., the 50 per cent. who did not vote for the person who gets 50 per cent. cannot elect anybody either; therefore, the argument is nonsense. The second argument is that we are childish and this place is noisy because we have an adversarial system. I invite my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) to go and watch the Dail Eireann, the American Congress, or Italy's Parliament at work. Be realistic: wherever there are a Government and an Opposition, there will be a row, so that argument does not wash.

Let us look at the proposals. What is proposed is a system that elects Members of Parliament. Good, say I. However, some say that we have to have a system that irons out the imbalances. Well, last night I rang up a mate of mine who lives in Mountain Ash in Wales. I said, "You've got Assembly elections coming up and we are having a debate on Jenkins," and asked his opinion. He is a shrewd old lawyer and he replied, "Yes, after we get a two-tier system in Parliament, I'll have three community councillors whom I can ask for advice; I'll have several county borough councillors; I'll have my Assembly man and my top-up Assembly man; I'll have my Member of Parliament and my top-up Member of Parliament; and finally I'll have my MEP, and sure enough they'll give me a top-up there as well." He went on, "And you know something? They can belong to five or six different parties." That, in a nutshell, is the lunacy of the proposed top-up system.

What is a Member of Parliament meant to do? He is meant to represent his people. He or she is not a servant of his party, but a servant of the electorate and his or her first loyalty is owed to the electorate. If we adopt the proposed system, there will be a group of Members of Parliament who are not the servants of the people, but the appointees of the party. I am sorry, but that is not democracy by any definition.

Let us have a debate. I might be accused of being a dinosaur because I am over 35 and have been through many elections that were won by the first past the post, but I would remind my accusers that, when I was first elected in the bad old days of 1983, I had 46 per cent. of the vote; I did not have the magical 50 per cent., although I have a lot more than that now. Since 1983, my party has looked at itself and realised that the party we had in 1983 was one of which none of us were proud. In the intervening 16 years, whether we come from the left or the right of the party, we have worked on the electorate, sold our policies, refined our policies and asked the electorate what they wanted.

Eventually, all our efforts came good, but it took a long time. We had once written the longest suicide note in history. The Conservative party took 18 years to write its suicide note and, when it was delivered, the party was executed. I hope that it takes the Conservatives 28 years to listen to the people and rewrite their policies. Perhaps they will win again, but that is democracy; that is the will of the people, and if the people want to get rid of someone, they do so. If we adopt the proposed system, how are we to get rid of the top-ups? Incidentally, how do we hold a by-election during the lifetime of a Parliament? The answer is that we cannot. Are the people to be told, "Mr. Smith has been appointed your Member of Parliament"? Get off with it.

Mr. Swayne: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bermingham: No, I cannot.

That is not democracy; it is electoral dictatorship. How are the electorate to overturn a Government in the middle of their term of office if they cannot boot out the Government party at a by-election?

I looked at the list for Merseyside to see how we would be topped up. I am supposed to be grouped with Bootle and Southport—

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): And Knowsley.

Mr. Bermingham: And Knowsley, God help me. In fact, Knowsley and St. Helens have a natural affinity with Warrington and the surrounding area, or west Lancashire. In short, there are natural affinities between certain areas, so the proposed system will lead to the sort of rows with the boundary commission that we had in the late 1970s and early 1980s. I should declare an interest at this point: I was the solicitor to the parties who fought the boundary commission in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and I was solicitor to the Labour party. I realised just how difficult boundary-drawing exercises are. Can we not remember that sometimes simplicity is best? We have simplicity in our system, and it is the best.

7.9 pm

Mr. Robert Syms (Poole): This is a well-attended debate, I think because we are talking about first principles. [Interruption.] I have attended economic debates with fewer Members present. We are talking about how we derive our authority and do our job. When it comes down to it, we probably all have quite strong opinions about how we want to represent people in our areas.

The key point about the first-past-the-post system is that, far from being a withering, minority system around the world, it is used in 62 countries, by nearly half the world's electorate. It is simple and quick. It is all very well saying that members of the British public can use complex systems, but there are many elderly and near-sighted people and others who would find it difficult to adjust to a new system. Sadly, even under our simple system, votes are wasted because some people cannot use a ballot paper. I fear that under Jenkins's proposal we will have far more wasted votes from people who cannot understand how to fill out both ballots.

The key point about our current system is that we have coherence and transparency in public policy. Parties coalesce in advance of elections to agree a platform that they put to the public, who then choose whether to back them. In government, that platform—the manifesto—is carried out. After a period, people decide whether they wish that party to continue in office. Under our system, it is possible to elect Governments on a platform which they carry out and on which they are judged. If the judgment is that the Government's performance has been poor, our system is decisive in turning that Government out.

The most valuable aspect of our political system is the power of the electorate to dismiss a Government who lose their way—as the British electorate periodically do dismiss Governments, resulting in the appearance of furniture vans at No. 10. My party was, to some extent, on the wrong side of that last year—quite rightly, because that is democracy—when the electorate gave us a good hiding, but, as a democrat, I have to accept that that was what the electorate wanted. Given that the current Government have only 43 to 44 per cent. of the vote, under any kind of proportional system, we might have stayed in office if we had done a deal with the Liberal Democrats. The reality is that we have a system that can push unpopular Governments—Governments who lose their way—out of office.

We also have a system, rooted in the individual based in a constituency, that tempers party control. We must all be careful that we allow people to be elected to the House who are lone voices; who are out of favour with their party; who can make a contribution with which the majority of us may not agree. Even Winston Churchill was out of step with his party in the 1930s, but he knew that, if the good burghers of Epping Forest supported him, he would be returned here and he could give voice to his views. That is the key.

Jenkins's proposals devalue the constituency link because they create two categories of MP. They would increase the size of constituency—and hence the work load—of geographically based Members, but would reduce the work load for those swanning around, as was said earlier, looking for preferment.

There are times when we all get lots of letters and have to work hard for our constituents. We may think it would be nice not to have any constituents. In reality, however, much of my education comes from my postbag and from meeting and visiting my constituents. That is an important part of our political system.

Over the years, proponents of proportional representation have always said that it would be fairer and better. The real test, and the test of Jenkins, was to come up with an alternative system. Jenkins has come up with an alternative system and has failed the test. The proposals are a ragbag. The alternative vote, as was pointed out earlier, is a volatile system. So we end up with a more volatile system, trying to balance it with a list system. There is no logic in that.

[Mr. Robert Syms]

Of the five members of the commission, one produced a note of reservation, which, in a political party, would be called a split. Even the committee does not have a united view. Lord Alexander's comments were perfectly sensible, and attention should be paid to them.

Why the magical 50 per cent. in the alternative vote? Each vote is equal, no matter whether the vote is for someone's first, second, third or fourth choice. Why should someone's fourth choice outweigh someone else's first choice? Votes could be weighted so that someone's second or third choice was worth less and then topped up, but why equal them out? Under the proposed system, the least worthy candidates—the second, third and fourth preferences—outweigh the most worthy candidate, the first preference.

One of the best jokes in the Jenkins report was the suggestion that, because people would need second preferences, the alternative vote would mean that people would be kinder to each other and that there would be a less adversarial system. In the Australian system, which uses AV, water is occasionally chucked across the table—a robust system. No one who knew that system would think that the alternative vote led to kinder politics.

With the list, we would have the unusual system whereby a Government with a majority of one would hope that any death would be of a Member from the list, which would mean no by-election, rather than of someone who represented a constituency where the Government might lose their majority. There is no equity in that at all. At the moment, we are elected on an equal basis. We might argue about the size of our constituencies or the geographical areas that we represent, but in reality we are here on the same basis. There is equality. We speak with the same authority. The proposal diminishes that.

I am strongly opposed to the arrival of a day when we refer not simply to the hon. Member for Poole or North Wiltshire, but to an hon. Member for the list from Birmingham or the list from Sussex. That would be a retrograde step.

Lord Jenkins has not come up with a workable, sensible alternative to the first-past-the-post system. I support the current system. It is not a system under which my party is prospering. There is an argument that because we do not distribute our vote equally, we are deficient. It is for the Conservative party to sort out its policies, to persuade the electorate, to target and campaign and to try and win a majority of seats in the House. If we cannot do that, we do not deserve to be on the Government Benches and to have a majority in the House. That is what we have to do, and that is the thought that we need to hold on to.

Mr. Martin Salter (Reading, West): I am not in favour of the Jenkins report—for reasons entirely different from those cited by Conservative Members. Many of the arguments were eloquently made by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath (Mr. Godsiff), but there are no absolutes in the debate. There is no perfect system and, to be honest, we are probably the worst people to debate this subject. After all, we are not exactly impartial.

There is a case for change, however, and we should not diminish the arguments of those who put forward the case for change. Yes, the first-past-the-post system is simple, but the electorate are capable of listing people: 1, 2, 3. As was said in The Guardian recently, most four-year-olds make a more complicated decision when deciding on their breakfast cereal each morning. Some arguments put by Conservative Members against the alternative vote are spurious, to say the least.

The first-past-the-post system is simple, but it produces a confrontational style of politics, and politics is not only what takes place in this Chamber. If the United States is held up as an example of stable government, as a model for us to follow, I would cite yesterday's congressional elections. A 36 per cent. turnout is not something to which we should aspire if we want a participative democracy.

There is the oft-quoted example of the Member who was elected in Inverness—I cannot remember quite when—on 24 per cent. of the vote. More than three quarters of his electorate did not want him as their Member of Parliament. That makes a powerful case for change. But the problem is that Lord Jenkins had four criteria. To hear the howls of protest from Conservative Members one would think that there was some conspiracy at work. But Jenkins had to come up with a system that gave us broad proportionality, retained the constituency link, extended voter choice and produced stable government. There is no conspiracy; those criteria are simply not achievable. No one could come up with a system that met those four criteria—so let us give the noble Lord a break on that one.

The Jenkins report has blown it. I support electoral reform, but not proportional representation. The breaking of the constituency link makes the Jenkins report unsupportable. That constituency link is the foundation stone upon which our system of representative democracy is built. It gives us the authority to speak on behalf of ordinary people in the Chamber. Without that constituency link, we have no authority. Hon. Members have made clear the absurdity of having two classes of Members of Parliament. Whatever happened to first among equals?

Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): It is a rubbish novel.

Mr. Salter: No, it is not. I also believe that the system is a recipe for civil war inside the Labour party. The constituencies of many Labour Members are surrounded by those of other Labour Members. Will we spend the next three, four, five or eight years deciding which of our number will be chopped? I think not. This system is not a recipe for a cohesive parliamentary party.

It is time to destroy some myths about the alternative vote. The Conservatives attack it for not being proportional enough, yet you use it to elect your leader, do you not?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) that he is addressing the Chair.

Mr. Salter: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was addressing the Chair in a roundabout way.

Conservative Members use the alternative vote system to elect their leader. They reject more proportional systems and then attack the alternative vote for not being proportional enough.

Mr. James Gray (North Wiltshire): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Salter: No, I do not have time. The alternative vote is important because it enshrines honest, tactical voting. We have tactical voting in our present political system, but it relies on our second guessing how our neighbours may or may not vote. Politicians play an absurd game of double bluff.

AV has distinct advantages: it rewards parties that work together, punishes extremists, provides Governments with clear, workable majorities and meets three of the four criteria set down for the Jenkins commission. I agree with the hon. Member for Galloway and Upper Nithsdale (Mr. Morgan) who said that we could introduce the alternative vote system now. I would prefer to take this debate even further and examine both Houses of Parliament. I think that there is a compelling and powerful case for using the alternative vote—with its clear majority and clear mandate and its generation of stable government—in this place and a pure proportional system in a second Chamber.

I believe that, by breaking the link between a Member of Parliament and his or her constituents, Jenkins has become unsupportable and will be consigned to the dustbin of history.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Using a rather unfortunate simile, the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) compared voting under the Jenkins system to filling in a national lottery ticket. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that that comparison is all too accurate. If the Jenkins system were implemented, instead of voting for what they knew they would get if enough of them voted in the same way, people would be voting for a mish-mash, for confusion, splits, backroom deals and for an outcome that no one could predict in advance.

If ever there were a case of "physician, heal thyself", it is this report. All five members of the commission were committed to electoral reform, but they could not reach a unanimous verdict among themselves. Various right hon. and hon. Members have referred to the dissenting report by Lord Alexander, and I shall put a little of that on the record in the short time available to me. In the second conclusion of the main report, the Jenkins majority admitted:

"On its own, AV would be unacceptable because of the danger that in anything like present circumstances it might increase rather than reduce disproportionality".

The commission drew attention to what is called in the overall report a "Note of Reservation by Lord Alexander."

Anyone else would call that a minority or dissenting report. However, these guys do not believe in minorities and majorities, let alone—heaven forbid—dissent. So it is a "Note of Reservation". In that note of reservation, Lord Alexander says:

"AV comes into play only when a candidate fails to secure a majority of first preference votes. It does not, however, then take account of the second preferences of all the voters, but only of those who have supported the least successful candidates. So it ignores the second preferences of the voters who supported the two candidates with the highest first preference votes"— in other words, the parties that came first and second—

"but allows the voters for the third or even weaker candidates to have their second votes counted so as to determine the result.

I find this approach wholly illogical. Why should the second preferences of those voters who favoured the two stronger candidates on the first vote be totally ignored and only those who support the lower placed and less popular candidates get a second"— he could have added third, fourth or fifth—

"bite of the cherry?"

Let us move from the alternative vote to the actual Jenkins formula. That formula would create a situation whereby coalition became the norm—it might not always happen, but it would happen much more frequently than in the past. The central question is not whether this system is better than that system which is better than the other—which might be worse than a fourth, fifth or sixth system—but whether a coalition result is a better outcome than a decisive result and single-party government. That is the key to the whole debate.

If we believe that it is more important to have single-party government than coalition government, there is no need to change the present system. However, if we believe that coalition is better, we must defend the disproportionate amount of power that is granted to parties that come third, fourth or fifth in the election result in persuading them to join the Government. That issue is not tackled properly in the report. The commission cites Germany as an example. Paragraph 56 of the report says that, in Germany, the single transferable vote has "undoubtedly made coalition the norm, but not inevitable."

I would reply that the British system makes coalition the rarity, but not impossible.

Lord Jenkins explains in the report how 13 years of coalition between the Free Democrats and the Social Democrats in Germany were succeeded by 16 years of coalition between the Free Democrats and the Christian Democrats. If we had seen then the result recently achieved in Germany—and the Greens instead of the Free Democrats had held the balance of power—what would have happened at the height of the cold war? This is one of my hobby horses. What would have happened if the Greens had been in the position of the Free Democrats? During the cold war, the Free Democrats were able—using a small minority of votes—to command the foreign and the defence ministries. The Greens have now done much the same. With less than 7 per cent. of the vote, the Greens command Germany's foreign ministry. Is that democratic? Is it proportional?

The reality is that coalition government makes up for the increase in proportionality between the votes cast and the members elected with a decrease in proportionality in the actual distribution of power between the parties. The minority partner in the coalition has a stranglehold on the majority.

[Dr. Julian Lewis]

I conclude by giving an example using the system that was forced upon the newly emergent democracies. In Slovenia in 1992, a centre right coalition comprised of about six parties was forged after a general election. However, an issue arose that split off the Social Democrats and the Greens. Those parties decided that they did not want to play any more and would take the ball from the field—in fact, they wanted to take the ball and join the opposing team. So the people of Slovenia went to bed with a centre right Government in power, and awoke the following morning to a centre left Government comprised of the Greens, the Social Democrats, the former communists and the socialists. There was a total change of government, and not one vote was cast in an election.

I discussed this question a few years ago with a distinguished British psephologist, Dr. Robert Waller, who encapsulated the essence of the argument more concisely than I ever could. He said that the introduction of proportional representation into this country would be the largest single transfer of power from the people to the politicians in British political history. That says it all, and that is why we must reject that system.

7.29 pm

Mr. Richard Burden (Birmingham, Northfield): Like other hon. Members, I apologise in advance for the fact that time will prevent me from taking any interventions.

We have had a thoughtful debate. I particularly enjoyed the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). I agree with him that we are discussing the nature of our democracy. That is the key question before us. Before we become too sanguine or too complacent about our electoral system, it is worth reflecting on the disconnection that so many of our citizens feel from the political process. The turnout in the last election was the lowest since the 1930s.

Many factors contribute to that sense of disconnection. The electoral system is an important part of the political landscape. Polls taken recently show a great deal of support among large sections of the British people for changing the system. My hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) was right when he said that the important debate is not the one in this place, but the one that takes place outside. We must listen to what the people say.

Time is short, but I shall comment on three parts of the Jenkins report. Many of the media attacks on the report have been attacks on things that are not in the report, but I do not find that surprising from Opposition Members. When I turned up for the launch of the Jenkins commission, I was ushered into a room where a Conservative party press conference was taking place. All the pitfalls of the Jenkins report were being pointed out. There was just one problem: the report had not yet been published, and those at the press conference did not know what was in it.

The three issues that I shall address are the constituency link, the top-up and, if time permits, coalitions. On the constituency link, it is true that certain proportional systems abolish that link. The Jenkins system is no such system. If the Jenkins recommendations were implemented, every elector in every constituency would be able to elect a constituency Member of Parliament. That important principle is retained by the Jenkins commission.

Although we in the House value the constituency link, it is worth while listening to what the people say about it. We do not always get the form of the constituency link right. We need to consider how the hours of the House and our resourcing work with the constituency link. I believe that there is room for improvement. Let us be clear that the Jenkins report retains the constituency link.

The second point concerns top-ups. The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) spoke about the New Zealand experience. I have some differences with her analysis, including the fact that the polls in New Zealand do not show support for the return of first past the post. She is right, however, to say that there is dissatisfaction with the mixed member proportional system there. The Jenkins system is not the same as the New Zealand system. It is important to put that fact on the record.

There have been several comments about centralisation in political parties. Those concerns are legitimate. I am also worried about centralisation in political parties, but there is no God-given law decreeing that that happens only under proportional systems. It is political parties, not electoral systems, that centralise power. If we were introducing the first past the post system, hon. Members could argue that that would centralise power, because it would require parties to contest elections with closed lists of one candidate. That is what the first past the post system involves.

Under Jenkins, we are not dealing with straight party lists. The commission makes it crystal clear that the top-up Members of Parliament will be from an open list system. Electors will have the right to vote for candidates, and they will therefore also have the right to remove those top-up Members. The open list system will be used. It is not a centralising mechanism and will genuinely empower the voters.

Another criticism of the top-up system is that it will produce two classes of Members of Parliament. It is true that, under the Jenkins system, there will be more than one person who can call himself or herself the Member of Parliament for a particular area—the constituency Member and the top-up. However, the top-up will not be a floating Member, as has been suggested; he or she will represent a clear geographical area.

Some of us may feel that our constituencies are our personal property and that no one else can have a say in them. I do not feel that. If I did, I do not know how I would work with councillors in my constituency or with Members of the European Parliament. When regional government comes, it will force us to confront the issue. I see no problem in more than one person representing an area.

If it is suggested that there would be two classes of Members of Parliament, let us consider what we have at present. It is true that we all arrive at this place by the same route, but can we honestly say that there is only one class of Member of Parliament? Can we say that the job of constituency caseworker, law maker, member of the Executive, Opposition spokesperson and Government spokesperson are all the same job? They are not. Members in safe seats are not subject to the same pressures as Members in so-called marginal seats.

Mrs. Laing rose—

Mr. Burden: I am sorry, I cannot give way. I must stick to what I said earlier.

I shall deal briefly with the third point—coalitions. It has rightly been said that, under the Jenkins system, many of the elections that have taken place since the war would have resulted in single-party government. It is not true to say that the Jenkins system would automatically lead to coalitions.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said that the Jenkins proposals will split the Labour party. I do not believe that. In the Labour party, we have a body of principles and policies that we share, under whatever political system we operate. However, it is true that every political party in Britain, unless it is a party of one, is a coalition. There are different views in every party.

I ask hon. Members to ask themselves whether it is healthy for coalitions of political parties to operate under an electoral system that forces them all to address the concerns of a few hundred thousand voters in about 100 marginal seats, rather than the concerns of the electorate as a whole. Whether coalitions are good or bad depends not on the electoral system, but on whether the electorate gives a clear view and whether the coalitions are honest, open and transparent. The Jenkins system offers a far greater chance of achieving that than the present system.

The debate will go on. It must take place outside, as well as in this place. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell) that we should conduct the debate in a grown-up atmosphere, so that it informs the British people and they can choose the democracy that they—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must resume his seat.

7.37 pm

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): On a point of frustration, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if you will indulge me. The points that I shall make could easily have been dealt with in interventions, if Labour Members had been a little more generous with their time. I know that the time available is limited, but the Chair has some discretion. This business is killing debate.

Had I been allowed to intervene, I would have dismissed the argument—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member will be allowed injury time as a result of my intervention. May I point out that interventions are perfectly permissible. They do not take time away from the hon. Member who is speaking. It is entirely at the discretion of the hon. Member whether he or she gives way. The point made by my predecessor in the Chair was that interventions simply take time out of the debate as a whole.

Mr. Swayne: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

First, I dismiss the notion that the leader of the Conservative party is elected by some form of alternative vote. If any analogy is to be drawn, it would be to the French system of run-offs, which is much closer to the British electoral system than to any form of alternative voting. The choice of system is a matter of horses for courses. Members of the Conservative party elect a leader, not a Member of Parliament. Those are entirely different things.

Secondly, it is interesting that, as the debate on proportional representation has unfolded during this Parliament, the position of the Liberal Democrats has changed somewhat. We began by being told that, in principle, Liberal Democrats were in favour of the single transferable vote. Interestingly enough, they were given the opportunity in the other place last week to vote for the STV for the European elections. Instead of voting for that in Committee, they voted against it. We were subsequently told, or have subsequently been told—

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): What the hon. Gentleman says is untrue. The single transferable vote was not on offer in the other place. What he says is just not true.

Mr. Swayne: That is not my reading of the debate, but I am sure that an examination of the record will prove whatever is true.

We were told also that the hon. Gentleman's party was in favour of open lists as opposed to closed lists. When it was provided with the opportunity to vote in favour of open lists, it voted against them. It boils down to the fact that the Liberal Democrats are interested not in grandiose principles of fairness but in bottoms on seats. That is what this is all about.

Mr. Gray: Will my hon. Friend note that, if the Liberal Democrat party is interested in bottoms on seats, the seats on which it is putting its bottoms now are at restaurants and bars throughout the land and not in the Chamber? That is extraordinary given that the subject that we are debating is one of key interest to the Liberals, of all people.

Mr. Swayne: My hon. Friend makes an effective point.

I shall move on to turnout at elections.

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Swayne: I shall not give way because I have moved on.

I shall deal with the issue of low turnout. I think that our turnout, despite the most recent election, is pretty healthy, even for a seat such as mine where the winning candidate commands more than 50 per cent. of the votes. My seat is regarded as rock solid for the Conservative party and, typically, the turnout is still 80 per cent. I reckon that that is pretty good.

I suspect that low turnout is a worldwide phenomenon. I suspect also that it will, as a consequence of frustration at not being able to change the Government, be a rather greater problem with systems that are more proportional. The result of the voting systems elsewhere is that, irrespective of the way in which the votes are cast, politicians stitch up a coalition subsequent to the election. The same faces always appear in government. That engenders cynicism and indifference among the voters.

That brings me to my final point, which is the constituency link. The system proposed by the Jenkins report undermines the constituency link by creating top-up Members who have not effectively been elected by anyone. [Interruption.] I agree to differ with Labour Members on that. Of course I accept that there are arguments to the contrary. However, as no one has voted for those candidates specifically—[HON. MEMBERS: "Yes, they have."] To an extent, the electorate will have done so in an open list. I grant that. However, given that they do not geographically represent a constituency in the same way as other Members, they lack a legitimacy. I believe that that has a corrupting effect on the entire polity.

I take Germany as an instructive example. As an aside, I thought that it was grotesque, watching the results of the German election, when Chancellor Kohl, rejected by his constituents and turned out by the voters in precisely the way in which voters in this country can turn out someone, appeared again as a Member of the German Parliament as a consequence of his place on the list. It is something of a sport on election night in this country to be able to knock off the leading lights of the various parties and to gloat over their fate. It is perhaps not an edifying sport, but it is one that voters enjoy. It would be denied them under proportional systems, as it was denied to the German voters.

It is instructive that, under the German political system, a large proportion of the population has been deeply sceptical, troubled and preoccupied for years about the notion of abolishing the deutschmark. However, that attitude has not been reflected by German politicians. It is extraordinary. The answer, I believe, is that, under the list system, politicians have to address the preoccupations of the party managers and not those of the voters. That leads to a division between the voter and the political class. That is profoundly unhealthy. To prevent that, we must hold fast to the constituency link and the British electoral system.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): I am grateful to have the opportunity of making a few comments in an important debate. I am a strong supporter of the present first-past-the-post system. When we come to the referendum, I shall be campaigning for that system. However, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Reading, West (Mr. Salter) that, if we are to ask the people to tell us the way forward in our democracy, we must also link in the other place and the way in which people should be elected to it. I do not necessarily reach my hon. Friend's conclusion, when he said that there should be proportional representation. We must recognise that this is an extremely difficult debate. Once we give the other place a mandate, it will argue that its mandate is equal to that of this place and it will therefore not want limited powers. That in itself raises an extremely difficult argument.

Clearly, there are different views on the changes that should be made and I have grave doubts about the nature of the referendum that we shall put before the electorate. Should there be only one alternative? Should the electorate not have a wider choice than that with which the Jenkins committee has come forward? That issue should be examined carefully as we proceed along what I consider to be a dangerous path. As I have said, I want to remain with the present system.

For those who argue that every vote should be an equal vote and want proportional representation, the Jenkins recommendation is not the answer. If we say that 43 per cent. of the electorate vote one way and that those electors should have 43 per cent. of the seats, it is clear that the system that Lord Jenkins is proposing will not produce that result.

I have been in the Labour party for more than 40 years and I was a party organiser. Against that background, I find it extremely strange that it is being argued by some Labour supporters and Members that we should adopt a system that will produce fewer Labour Members. I can understand the Liberals, who will be clear gainers under almost any new system that we might adopt, wanting change, but not the Labour party.

We should remember the closest election result in terms of numbers of seats that we have had since the war, which was in February 1974. The same sort of result could be the outcome if we adopt the sort of change that is proposed. The Prime Minister of the day was defeated in February 1974, having been rejected by the electorate. However, he hung on in power for a few days trying to do a deal behind the scenes with the Liberal party. In the end, the Liberals, to their credit, said no. They said that it was a defeat and it was Harold Wilson who was finally called to the palace to form a Government.

A more recent example has been presented to us in Germany with Chancellor Schröder, who had to do deals to get a coalition Government in place. We have read reports of that in our press. In the German press, there have been more reports than in ours. However, we do not know what has gone on behind the scenes in dark, smoke-ridden rooms where deals have been done to produce a coalition. I have grave fears about such a system and now we have the Jenkins proposal. It seems to be trying to maintain the link with constituencies, which I believe is crucial. Lord Jenkins has tried to move towards proportionality, but only marginally. He has also tried to propose a system that will avoid too many coalitions, and thus too many of the problems to which I have just referred.

The report is a poor fudge, as it deals with none of the problems with which it was supposed to deal. The system that it proposes is nonsense. It plucks 15 or 20 per cent. out of the air to provide a limited combination of an additional member system and a top-up system. It seems crazy. As for vacancies or deaths in that top-up system, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary referred to "spares" being brought in to fill gaps. If there were no spares, seats would be left vacant. That is nonsense.

I remind hon. Members that by-elections can change a Government's policies. Let us remember the by-election results after the poll tax. Ultimately, the by-election in Ribble Valley next door to my constituency made the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), decide that the poll tax had to go and that council tax legislation had to be introduced. Despite an overwhelming Conservative majority, that by-election changed the poll tax policy. The Conservatives knew that the election could not be delayed beyond 1992, and they feared the consequences. I accept that, if it is a direct election, there will still be a by-election, but it could just as easily be within the 15 or 20 per cent. top-up. Again, that must be nonsense.

New Zealand has been referred to. I went there just over a year ago. In New Zealand, the National party won 44 seats out of 120—New Zealand First, led by Winston Peters, won 17 seats. It did a deal, part of which was that it was over-represented in terms of both ordinary and Cabinet Ministers. It dictated the terms. Some people have moved away from that party since, and other changes have taken place. New Zealand First is certainly cracking up and the coalition no longer exists.

Although the prospect of having a system that is fair to minority parties may be the basis for our debate, ultimately, the tail always wags the dog. The minority dictates the terms and gets more than its fair share. That is nonsense. We may look at what has happened in New Zealand and other parts of the world, but our system has worked well. I strongly support it and hope that the House will not go along with change. If we choose to hold a referendum, I hope that people will say that we should keep the system as it is because it has worked well for many years.

Mr. John Hayes (South Holland and The Deepings): There has been much talk tonight about stable government, which has been produced by the first-past-the-post system. Appropriately, there has also been talk about the possibility of coalitions.

The Liberal Democrats, though, have talked less than one might have expected about Lord Jenkins's failure to come up with a proportionate system. Advocates of proportionality in electoral systems—principally the Liberal Democrats in modern times—have not been true to their history and their principles. No one would argue that, even with a top-up, AV is a proportional system. We have had some honesty from those on the Labour Benches tonight. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook and Small Heath (Mr. Godsiff) was honest enough to acknowledge that the system was not proportional and to give an empirical analysis of it. However, we have heard little from the Liberal Democrats, who seem to grasp at any alternative to the current system, regardless of its merits.

I want to speak not about coalitions and stable government but about a subject referred to by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn): this debate is, above all, about power and the people. It is about the relationship between the elected and electors. Electoral systems are not just about elections; they are about the subsequent nature of representation. Their effect is to establish a relationship or partnership between politicians and the people.

Being a Member of Parliament is about making laws, but it is also about speaking and fighting for ordinary people, and I am not ashamed to say that I have a disproportionate responsibility to speak and fight for those who are least able to do that for themselves. I am surprised that more hon. Members do not regard that as the most significant and rewarding part of their job.

As the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) said, there are many types of politicians, both in government and on the Back Benches, but a unifying, binding factor is their common accountability to their constituents. They must all hold a constituency surgery and go to boring as well as interesting meetings in their constituencies.—[Interruption.] The meetings that I go to are implicitly less boring. Politicians have to open fetes, visit hospitals and schools, and are in touch with their electorates, all of which informs them and keeps their feet on the ground. Heaven knows, many people who are attracted to politics find it hard to keep their feet on the ground. That constituency link—the communication and contact with the average elector—is the principal means by which politicians retain their ordinariness.

Roy Jenkins does not appear to value that highly. We can see from his political background that he is a different type of politician. He is certainly very different from me. Although he is not quite a carpetbagger of Gladstonian proportions—Gladstone represented six seats during his political career, one of which he is reported never to have visited—Jenkins was certainly never in tune with what electorates now expect of their representatives. More than ever before, people want a Member of Parliament to whom they can relate and with whom they can empathise—someone who lives in their community and shares their interests. A Member of Parliament totally unlike Lord Jenkins one might argue. A story persists about Lord Jenkins holding his constituency surgery at the railway station because he did not live in the constituency.

We should move away from such politicians, but those on a top-up list would be of exactly that type. Although those politicians may have some notional connection with the county—Jenkins has given us that palliative—imagine a county like mine, Lincolnshire, with an extra top-up Member floating about somewhere between the Isle of Axholme and the Fens. Would he go to those boring meetings with boring people, or would he be down here hobnobbing and fine dining with the Westminster cognoscenti at one of Lord Jenkins's six London clubs? I think I know where he would be, and it would not be in Lincolnshire.

Mr. Maclennan: I was brought up in the Glasgow constituency to which Lord Jenkins was twice elected. He was not a native son of Glasgow, but he was more than acceptable.

Mr. Hayes: Lord Jenkins never lived in Stechford when he represented it for 27 years and he never lived in Glasgow when he represented it either. Many hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber moved to their constituencies when they were elected because they believed that they should be at the heart of the area that they represented. I am not impressed by Lord Jenkins's track record. Given that he has been outside mainstream politics for some 15 years, that he is 77 years of age, and that his best political days were when he was a member of the Cabinet a generation ago, he was an odd choice—I put it no higher than that—as chairman of the commission.

This debate is all about power and people. A factor that has only been scantily mentioned is that, if the system were introduced in a constituency like mine—assuming that the boundaries were redrawn and I were reselected—I would represent a constituency that was 15 or 20 per cent. larger than my current one. In a seat like mine, which covers 350 square miles, I could not do that without delivering a lower quality service to my electorate.

[Mr. Hayes]

I would be taking on an extra 20,000 people. We have moved away from that. The idea of constituencies of 100,000 people was abandoned by the boundary commissions because they believed that constituencies should conform to a uniform smaller size. The current proposal is surely a step in the wrong direction. Perhaps the commission underestimated the impact of that.

Mr. Andy King (Rugby and Kenilworth): It is unfortunate that the hon. Gentleman has chosen to argue ad hominem, which undermines a debate which is long overdue in this House. Is the hon. Gentleman frightened of having the support of 50 per cent. and above of his electorate? It sounds to me as if he would benefit from the top-up Member to assist him with his work in Lincolnshire.

Mr. Hayes: I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman thinks that I am not making a useful contribution to the debate. Being a Member of Parliament is about representing people and caring for people. It is about articulating people's needs, fears, aspirations and hopes. That is more important to me than the machinations of the Westminster cognoscenti, of which the hon. Gentleman is clearly fond.

I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman thinks so little of my contribution to the debate, but I can tell him that for myself I am frightened of nothing. I got 49.5 per cent. of the vote, and I am confident that I could have picked up a few of the second choices from some of the other candidates. I am frightened for the British people though because I care about them being properly represented in an informed, modern democracy.

The debate is about power and people, and the Jenkins proposals would take power further and further away from the British people. That has been recognised by the right hon. Member for Chesterfield, by myself and by many people who are better informed than myself. I will fight hard to retain power with the people by retaining our current electoral system.

8 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): I do not believe that the debate is about the report of an independent commission. Frankly, how can a Liberal Democrat Lord chairing a commission offer us an independent outcome? I do not blame Lord Jenkins, however, who has jumped at the chance afforded to him to have the floor and to argue his case at length.

Some of my hon. Friends have expressed fear about the list system. Some people have said that Jenkins is not talking about a closed list, but an open one. Nevertheless, the introduction of the top-up system for the Westminster elections would make it far easier for party headquarters to centralise the decisions about the selection of candidates, whether it was an open or closed list.

I do not fear coalition Governments. Every Government in this country is a coalition one. The Tory party is a coalition, as is the Labour party. Any wise party leader recognises that his party contains a right wing and a left wing. That is why Attlee chose to accommodate both Aneurin Bevan and Ernie Bevin in his Cabinet when he became Prime Minister in 1945. However, Jenkins is proposing to create a situation where coalition Governments of more than one party would be more likely to be in power more often—and would, very often, be inevitable.

If we moved to the proportional system, as recommended by Jenkins, it would be true to say that whichever major party was in office, the Liberal Democrats would always be in power. It is no wonder the Liberal Democrats favour proportional representation, although there is no record of the Liberal party supporting PR in 1906 or in the days of Gladstone. I do not blame the Liberal Democrats. They are politically motivated, as are we all to an extent.

Under our system, the voters vote for the coalition with which they are familiar—whether it is Labour or Tory. The voters understand that. PR would mean coalitions being cobbled together in back rooms by politicians. It is an electoral system for politicians. The first-past-the-post system is an electoral system for the people of this country.

Some new Labour Members may not recall the history of the Liberal Democrats. It is often assumed that if we moved to a proportional system, the Liberal Democrats would always support the Labour party. That is not true. We have seen what has happened in Germany. Helmut Kohl became Chancellor in 1982 not because of an election, but because the Free Democratic party—a party which, with the exception of four years, has always been in government in Germany—chose to move from supporting from one Helmut, Schmidt, to another Helmut, Kohl.

The Liberal party in this country has switched support as well. I recall the elections in 1951 and 1955, when Conservative candidates stood down to allow Liberals to win seats in Bolton and Huddersfield. I can even remember the day when The Guardian—which was then thought to be the house magazine of the Liberal party—called on people to vote Conservative in 1950. That was despite the fact that the Labour Government after the war had created the welfare state and maintained full employment—the sort of things which the Liberals should have supported.

In 1979, we had the Lib-Lab pact. The Liberals' opposition to the Labour Government on a confidence motion helped to give us 18 years of Tory Government, many under the extremism of Thatcher. Is it fair to Labour and Tory voters that the minority who choose to vote Liberal Democrat should nearly always be in a position to determine who should govern? Following electoral defeats in the 1980s, many Labour activists thought that we should perhaps look at changing the electoral system. In 1983, it looked as though we had a mountain to climb; in 1997, we did not just reach the summit—we touched the stratosphere with the result.

Jenkins has made a number of errors in his report. On page 13, paragraph 47, the report says that there was no certain control of the Attlee Government from 1950 to 1951, or of the Wilson Government of 1964 to 1966. How many times did those Governments lose in the Division Lobby? The answer is that they never did. If we had had PR in 1964—when the Labour Government had a tiny overall majority—Wilson would have been unable to exercise the option to call an election in 1966 and to come back with a stable, overall majority of 100 for the Labour party.

We should fantasise just a little. Imagine if, in 1997, the Labour party had been elected as the largest single party, but in a hung Parliament. Who would have had to give way to accommodate the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown)? Would it be the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs? Would it be the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Maybe it would be the Secretary of State for the Home Department.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. The hon. Gentleman's time is up.

8.9 pm

Mr. Andrew Stunell (Hazel Grove): I do not want to confront others with errors, but I think that the hon. Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) crammed more errors into his speech than any other Member who has spoken tonight—although there have been other errors. But I want to spend my allotted time speaking up for disfranchised voters, and especially for disfranchised Conservatives. I am not going to talk about those who have been disfranchised in Scotland and Wales, because, as has been pointed out, a top-up Member has been appointed for them by the Conservatives here; but in my region—and in the northern region, where there are no Conservatives—there are serious problems.

Greater Manchester has 28 parliamentary seats. The Conservatives have two of those 28 seats, although they have 25 per cent. of the popular vote across Greater Manchester. It takes 154,000 Conservative electors in Greater Manchester to produce one Member of Parliament, which should certainly not be the case. Mention has been made of Surrey, which has the opposite problem.

In the general election of 1997, those 28 contests in Greater Manchester had one feature that is common to all the elections in the present first-past-the-post system. Each involved a closed list of one candidate per party. Those who fulminate against the idea of a proportional system and the control of parties have clearly failed to observe the present circumstances. As is so often the case, it is easier to look out of the glass house than to spot the glass that surrounds us.

In last year's general election, the election results in Greater Manchester had one unusual feature compared with results elsewhere. In 25 of those 28 contests, the winning candidate gained more than 50 per cent. of the vote. It should be borne in mind that 44 per cent. of hon. Members sit here having received less than 50 per cent. of the vote in their constituencies.

I must say that I look forward to a referendum campaign in which Conservatives visit my constituency—where I did receive more than 50 per cent. of the vote—and try to persuade my voters that they are so dumb that they cannot understand any alternative voting system that is put to them. I hope that those Conservatives will make clear their belief that voters in my constituency are dumber than the Germans, dumber than the French, dumber than the Italians and dumber than the Spanish—because I have a feeling that my electors will reply, "We were smart enough to see through their arguments at the general election, and we are smart enough to see through them in a referendum campaign."

It has been alleged that one of the consequences of the proposed change would be weak government. Let us take the period between 1945 and 1998. In that period of 53 years, we have had 35 years of Conservative government and 18 years of Labour government—strong government, provided by the other parties, as I am sure they would agree. In that time, the Germans have overhauled us and taken on East Germany; France has overhauled us; Italy is snapping at our heels; and the Spaniards, who have had only half as much time in a democratic system, which took over from a dictatorship 25 years ago, are now very close to us. All that has been supplied by "weak" coalitions—by the proportional government that the Conservatives so despise.

It has been said that the proposed system is a recipe for minority government. Anyone who observed the Major Government may have wondered exactly who was wagging the dog. Was it the Europhobics? Was it the Ulster Unionists? And what about the mysterious change without an election? What happened when the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) took over from Mrs. Thatcher? Let us not concern ourselves with the nature of the Conservative party's voting system; what about the votes that were offered to the people of this country? There were none at all. We do not need lectures about parties changing course in midstream without elections.

Let us be clear about one thing: the Jenkins proposals would not produce the results cited by their opponents. It is evident that many of them have not even read the report. They have not read the academic evidence in the CD-ROM—because, I imagine, they are still using quill pens. If they did so, they would learn that, in four of the last five elections, a majority party would have been elected.

There is a saying that those who live by the sword must die by the sword. The Conservatives have adopted a different policy: they have decided that those who die by the sword must die by the sword. They have a system that is destroying them in Parliament and in local government, and they are urging us all to stick with it. Some of us are almost tempted to say yes to that.

Let us have a look at this business about strong and weak government. We need not look to France or Germany; we can look to Doncaster and Westminster to see why powerful single-party domination of any political culture leads to more corruption and worse government than a more representative system. [HON. MEMBERS: "Like Italy."] Like Italy, which, in fact, has pulled up its economic bootstraps over the last 50 years, and has developed its political culture. I gather that the view is that Italian voters are so stupid that they cannot run the system.

It is said that we have one class of Members of Parliament in the House. Only three months ago did we finally and formally get rid of the distinction between right hon. and hon. Members, and anyone who believes that there is no class distinction or separation of powers between different Members of Parliament here has been living in a dream world.

I do not think that the Tories' big fear is of being replaced by Liberal Democrat or Labour Members. I think that their fear is of being replaced by Tory Members of Parliament from Scotland, Wales and Greater Manchester. There would be more Tory Members of Parliament as a result of a new voting system; but they would be more representative, they would know what they were talking about, and they would be in a position to serve the country far better.

8.16 pm

Ms Claire Ward (Watford): Some hon. Members may well feel that the report, and the debate, have been long awaited—especially those who stand to gain most, the Liberal Democrats. Surprisingly, however, the Liberal Democrats have been unable to muster even a 50 per cent. attendance.

I believe that those who claim that there is a great desire for change are talking nonsense. In the 18 months that I have been a Member of Parliament, and during the many years in which I have campaigned with the Labour party—both before elections and in the interim periods—not one person has said to me, "I will vote Labour because I want proportional representation," or, "I will vote Labour because I want to change the electoral system."

Let us be honest: people do not vote for a political party because they want a change in the electoral system. They have much higher priorities, as I am sure most hon. Members can tell us on the basis of their surgeries and constituency correspondence. I do not believe that there is any real clamour for change. I think that the 1997 election result showed us that the current system can deliver huge swings, and that people are capable of making up their minds to get rid of a Government, or a Member of Parliament, whom they do not believe to have represented them adequately.

It is wrong to believe that proportional representation—or, indeed, the Jenkins report—will bring more democracy. The truth is that democracy ends the moment the ballot box closes. When people have voted for a party, they may well end up with a Government who are a coalition of parties none of which they supported. Under proportional representation, there is a much greater risk of a mish-mash of policies and deals done in back rooms after the people have had their say.

We need only look at other countries in which the system is operating to see that that is so. The most recent example is Germany, where the smallest party has held the balance of power for many years. Even at the last general election, it took nearly six weeks for the Germans to agree on a coalition Government for whom the people had not voted, although more people voted for Schröder's party than for any other.

I shall deal now with some of the specific issues in the Jenkins report. I am surprised that those who support proportional representation support the Jenkins report, because it does not meet the criteria set out by those who believe in PR. The use of the AV system does not give equal weight to votes. If an elector votes for the Monster Raving Loony party or the Let's Have A Party party or any other fringe or minority party, in a seat where there are two main parties, the second preference will be taken into account to determine the overall winner. A person voting for either of the main parties will have only their first preference taken into account. How can that be democratic? How does that give equal weight to votes? It will inevitably give undue weight to minority parties.

The AV system has a tendency to produce random results depending on which party is placed second in the first count. One party may gain far more first preferences than its main rival, but second, third, fourth or even fifth preferences may carry that second party over the winning line. I do not believe that that is democratic. The Jenkins commission has failed to fulfil its terms of reference.

Mr. Andy King rose—

Ms Ward: I will not give way, because of the time.

Jenkins was told to come up with a system that kept the constituency link, but he has failed to do that. The top-up breaks the constituency link and creates two types of Member of Parliament. It does not matter that Jenkins recommends that those Members of Parliament should be treated the same in the House. We all know that, in reality, that will not happen. One type will be elected on an expanded constituency boundary and one type will be elected on a top-up, on a county or city list system.

We would need to increase the size of the constituencies, which I believe are large enough already. Members of Parliament have enough responsibility serving 70,000 or so electors without increasing that to an average of 90,000. Also, those top-up Members would have no direct relationship with the people voting for them.

I shall take as an example the constituency area that Jenkins has suggested for Hertfordshire, in which Watford would be one component part. The people in Hertfordshire already have no real direct contact with the county council. They have no idea what the organisation is or what it does. The notion that they will have any more idea about the top-up Members of Parliament on a county-based system is nonsense. They want a local Member of Parliament whom they can hold accountable, who knows the area and who will be waiting to listen to their views. Top-up Members will be floating around the county and, in Watford, we will never know where on earth they are.

Mr. Hayes: They will be down here in the Tea Room, dear.

Ms Ward: Yes, more than likely.

Where vacancies occurred in the top-up list, there would be no opportunity for a by-election. Parties would simply put forward their next highest placed candidate to take the seat. Surely voters are entitled to elect their representatives and not to rely upon parties to put up whomever they choose without any endorsement. It has already been said that it is important to have a system in which by-elections can cause changes to the Government so that it makes them sit up and listen.

The Jenkins report is a half-baked plan. It requires an electoral commission to fill in the details that he has been unable to provide. In my view, we should stick with a first-past-the-post system, which is simple in concept—one cross, one vote. It is easy to count and it is clear. The electorate vote for a party and a candidate to form a Government.

I do not believe in the concept of a wasted vote. The important principle is that a voter has his or her say through the ballot box. It is a fact of life that some parties will not win and that some people may feel that they have not voted for a party that will win. That does not mean that we should change the system. Just because minority parties have been unable to convince the electorate of the value and credibility of their policies is no reason to change the system.

Labour Members who have fought for many years for a Labour Government believe that we should stick with a system that will be representative of those we serve. We want a Labour Government who will be implementing their policies, not forming a coalition with the Liberal Democrats and doing nothing to tackle the issues concerning most people in my constituency.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): The first question that comes to my mind this evening is why the noble Lord Jenkins is not in the Gallery listening to this debate. My suspicion is that he is being topped up in another place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Although we are debating the Jenkins report, we should remember that the noble Lord Jenkins is a Member of the other House. It is usual to refer to all Members of the other House with courtesy.

Mr. Fraser: I shall take that on board, Mr. Deputy Speaker. These are serious issues.

The first-past-the-post system has served the country well and has generally provided what I think we all believe has been stable government. It has the confidence of the voting public. I am curious as to why the Jenkins commission has not been allowed to consider the advantages and disadvantages of our current voting system, which has served our democracy in this country. After all, as has already been said in the debate, 62 countries around the world have the same system, and they represent about half the world's electors.

Why did the commission come up with a complicated system that is not used anywhere else in the world? Seven alternatives exist, but none was good enough for Jenkins. We must ask why not. It is yet another excursion into the unknown. I believe that this is Jenkins's revolution, but it is certainly not evolution. I believe that it is change for change's sake. Without being too disingenuous about the noble Lord, I suspect that it is an old man in a hurry, trying to make a mark. That is a pity, because, with the Jenkins commission proposals, the voter and democracy will be poorer. His proposals do not do what he set out to achieve.

How can voter choice be extended in a system in which votes for the least popular candidate can be more important than votes for the most popular? How can voter choice be extended if voting for one's preferred candidate can harm his or her chances? How can voter choice be extended if a large number of so-called top-up Members are selected from closed party lists? Some may even have been rejected by the electorate in their constituency, but may enter Parliament as if appointed by a quango. How can voter choice be extended if Liberal Democrat Members become established by default, irrespective of their performance on election day?

None of us in the House would argue against the case for stable government, but we would not argue for stable government at all costs. Under the current first-past-the-post system, the voter understands that the Government can be called to account at the polls if they fail to deliver. The Government of the day have the support of Parliament for their policies and promises. They have the ability to carry forward those policies and there is a clear-cut accountability to the electorate.

What happens under the proposed system? As was eloquently pointed out by the hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward), after an election, policies would be cobbled together in smoke-filled rooms in the pursuit of power and the interests of survival. What seems compatible at the outset may turn out to be wishful thinking when times get tough, particularly if expediency results in a coalition with a political party some way down the voters' preference list which has extreme or single-issue views. Small parties would enjoy disproportionate influence.

Policies would be muddled, accountability would be obscured and the ability to remain in power would be a matter of compromise. The classic criticisms of proportional representation have not been addressed in the hotch-potch system that has been advocated in the Jenkins report. That concerns me at constituency level as well as at national level. The direct link with the electorate on which our Parliament is based is understood and appreciated. Our constituents may not entirely understand our role, but they do understand that we, and we alone, represent them and their interests. A Member of Parliament is a single point of contact for every person of voting age.

As Members of Parliament, we have nothing to lose and everything to gain by diligence and service to the local community and the individuals that we represent. We work directly for the whole constituency, not only for those who voted for us. We know and understand the complexities of our patch, and we speak in the House against that background. Our constituents judge us on what we do in and for the constituency, at least as much as on what we do in the House.

Candidate selection—in the Conservative party, at least—remains largely a local matter. Every vote at every level counts. If we fail at local level, we pay the price, and someone else will be found to take on the job.

The proposal for top-up Members should be thought through carefully. What is their remit? Whom do they represent? I believe that they represent no one. How are they to be judged? How can voters identify with their work and their performance? How can they be called to account? How can their performance in the House serve democracy?

Lord Jenkins's support for proportional representation is long-standing and well known. He has at last found a Prime Minister who might be prepared to listen and be swayed by his enthusiasm for coalition politics.

The commission was not allowed to consider the advantages of the current system, so we must voice them in this debate. Under first past the post, Government stability is almost always achieved. There is a close link between voters and their elected representatives. Electors understand the system, and have confidence in it. A party in government ignores the electorate at its peril. The fate of the Government is in the hands of the voters.

Even the Jenkins commission has acknowledged that there is "no surging popular agitation" for change in this country. It has failed to make a compelling case for forsaking a system that has served us well, and I do not support it.

8.31 pm

Mr. Alan Keen (Feltham and Heston): My hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) said that, if Labour voters in Surrey were asked whether they wanted a top-up Member of Parliament, they would say yes. I have lived and voted in Surrey, but I have still felt exhilarated in the polling booth when I voted—despite the overwhelming majority against Labour and despite the fact that, when I stood for the council, I was roundly beaten. I think that we know what the answer would be if Labour voters were asked the whole question—"Do you want a Labour top-up Member even though that means that there would be 50 fewer Labour Members of Parliament?"

[Mr. Alan Keen]

If this debate were about a choice between the Jenkins proposals and a fully proportional system, the people who are arguing for the Jenkins proposals would be ridiculing them, saying that they were unfair and ludicrous. I do not expect hon. Members to admit to that, but they know, when they think quietly, that it is true.

Those people who claim that it is easy to vote cannot have met people like the ones I have met during the past two elections—perhaps about 10 of them—who have not voted before and have no idea what to do. I tell them how to vote, saying, "Go and give your name. Tell them where you live and they will give you the ballot paper. Go into the box and put a cross against the name of the person you want to vote for." We should not forget the fact that many people are frightened and have never been in a polling booth before.

Any major change to the system is serious. If there is no demand for a change, why should we cause such chaos? The demand comes not from the people, but—of course—from politicians. Some hon. Members—from both sides of the House—have so many axes to grind that it is surprising we can hear the debate for the noise.

If a perfect system existed, there would be an argument for ditching first past the post, but we know that such a system does not exist. People who have argued for proportional representation over the years would call the Jenkins proposals ridiculous if they had a more proportional system to support.

To change to the proposed system would be damaging. It would damage relationships between people in the same political party and it would be costly in time for party workers, who keep our political parties going and get us into Parliament.

If we accept the proposals, what would we lose? The public understand the current system, for all its deficiencies. As I said, when I voted in Surrey, I did not mind that my vote would not count. I was happy to let the people of Wales, the north-east and Manchester make my vote count—

Mr. Kaufman: Hear, hear.

Mr. Keen: Especially Manchester.

Governments are invariably thrown out; the electorate do not really vote for us. At the general election, people may have found the Labour party's proposals acceptable, but, on the whole, they wanted to throw the Government out, as Conservative Members have been honest enough to admit. People vote largely to get rid of politicians. I do not think that they like or trust us, and I do not blame them—if they have been watching this debate, their views will have been confirmed.

Proportional representation will make it more difficult for the electorate to throw politicians out. Even if, under AV plus, only one election in the past 25 years would have resulted in a coalition, that is more than enough to make me want to throw out the proposals.

The report is flawed. Paragraph 7 of chapter two says that the "unanimous opinion . . . expressed . . . distrust of any electoral system which increased the power of party machines", yet the commission still recommends AV plus.

Moreover, paragraph 10 of chapter two—this is worth mentioning, as it highlights what other hon. Members have said—states that the role of Members of Parliament is "to represent their constituencies". I want to change that slightly; instead of "constituencies", it should say "constituents". That shows the difference in philosophy between the Jenkins commission and me.

The commission is described as independent, but I remind the House of what Lord Cocks said in early October:

"People asking for information about the electoral system are referred"— by the commission—

"to the home page of the Electoral Reform Society. Surely this organisation has a massive vested interest in the whole subject."

That is hardly independent.

Lord Cocks also described the consultative meetings that were held. He said:

"I drew attention to the average attendance of 80 and said this represented 0.0000625 per cent. of the electorate. Even this figure is doubtful.

At the recent Labour Party Conference I collected the annual review . . . of the Electoral Reform Society. There I see that, apart from society members writing to the Commission,

'a large number have also attended the Independent Commission's hearings to present their arguments for change and in particular STV'."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 8 October 1998; Vol. 593, c. 684.]

Again, that is hardly independent.

The other day, I heard someone trying to justify the role of top-up Members by arguing that they would be more in touch than directly elected Members. I am nothing special, but to serve my constituents, I hold four advice surgeries a month in different locations. I am worried about the people who do not have their own transport, so I travel to them.

Feltham and Heston is a small, suburban constituency, but for top-up Members to give the same service, they would have to attend 36—four times nine—locations, from Cranford by Heathrow to as far away as Carshalton. Not that I know where Carshalton is; I know it is past Kingston somewhere, but I do not want to offend anyone who represents it. [Laughter.] I doubt whether even 1 per cent. of the people of Feltham and Heston would know where Carshalton was. If they went there, they would probably love it. They would probably love it more than they love Feltham. That is why there are lots of problems in Feltham.

The report talks about better representation in Parliament of women and people from ethnic minorities. If we are serious about electoral reform, perhaps we should go further and consider term limits. That is turkeys voting for Christmas. Term limits would give a more rapid turnover and we would get a more representative—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I call Mr. Gerald Howarth.

8.39 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): We have seen the House at its best today. I hope that the hon. Member for Watford (Ms Ward) will wait a second before she disappears. When the public see us debating issues that concern the House, they see us at our best, arguing with passion about important issues that affect everybody in this country.

This fascinating debate was well opened by the Home Secretary, to whom I pay tribute, and my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) responded well. There was a splendid contribution from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn). I agreed with virtually every word that the hon. Member for Watford said. I say that with no deliberate intention of harming her career. She made a good speech, and I think that she was absolutely right when she said that the Jenkins report was fundamentally flawed.

The remit that the Prime Minister gave Lord Jenkins was to examine all the alternatives to first past the post and to recommend one. The report is a wonderful grand tour, as one would expect from someone so versed in claret, of not only Europe but the whole world, and it gives us some marvellous cameo histories of various countries. It spends about two pages on the present arrangements and goes on for no fewer than 17 pages, seeking to demolish the case for first past the post. The document is not an independent report recommending one of the alternatives to first past the post. Its objective is to destroy support for first past the post and only then to come up with a proposal to put to the Prime Minister.

I cannot promise any great new illuminations, but I hope that, in reinforcing points made by others, I will be able to advance the cause in which I believe. The new system is complicated. As the hon. Member for Watford said, the present system is easy, it does not take long to count, and one does not end up having to work out who will form the Government. As we have heard, it has taken six weeks to form the Government in Germany. It is a good job that there have been no major crises in that time.

It is not sufficient to say that we should rule out a system merely because it is complicated. There are other grounds on which the system should be ruled out. It gives disproportionate power to small parties—that is the inescapable logic—and that is why the Liberals want it. In Germany, the Greens, whose vote went down at the most recent elections from 7.3 per cent. to 6.7 per cent., ended up as the power brokers.

It has been said many times tonight, but it bears repeating, that the Free Democrats in Germany were able to remain in office while the main party changed. The tiny FDP stayed throughout and was never subjected to being booted out. The report is interesting on that. It says:

"Mostly the FDP has been the hinge, and has done very well out of the role."

Lord Jenkins got it in one. The hinge—the disproportionate power of a small party—in this country would fall to the Liberal party, which would do very well out of it. The House is entitled to ask whether it is no accident that Lord Jenkins is the man who started up the Social Democratic party and then merged it with the Liberal party.

I resent the way in which the Liberals parade themselves as not being involved for party political reasons. They rise above the dirty business of politics in which we and the Labour party are engaged, because they are interested only in the principle. Garbage: every single alternative system that is produced for our consideration results—lo and behold—in their party doing extremely well, thank you very much indeed. I do not mind, but why do not they simply own up to it and say, "Yes, we do rather well out of it"? That is what Lord Jenkins says, in any case.

I know that the Conservative party does not enjoy the unmixed support of Fleet street these days, but let me quote from The Times, which, in an editorial on 30 October, headed "Too clever by half", said:

"There is every chance that the Liberal Democrats would hold office on a semi-permanent basis regardless of their performance at the polls."

I am more inclined to believe The Times than the Liberal party, which is trying to seduce us into the new arrangements.

The new system would unquestionably create two classes of Member of Parliament. I say earnestly to those who are new to the House: beware. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) was absolutely right when, in his letter to The Daily Telegraph, he pointed out that the voters had booted out Mr. Kohl, but that he was back a few hours later because he was top of the list. What kind of democracy is that?

I see that the hon. Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg) is present. I lost a very good friend at the election, when his predecessor, one of the finest of Members of Parliament, was defeated. He and I had about the same notional majority, and he had a safe seat. It is not true that it is not possible to remove people in so-called safe seats, and the hon. Member for Southgate is the proof of that pudding.

We need to be careful about the top-up Members of Parliament. The Home Secretary wonderfully described them as "spares", and I think that it was the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) who called them "clones". The spares will be in our constituencies. If the arrangements go through, we shall have two in north Hampshire. They will have no constituency responsibilities, and they will not go even to the exciting events, let alone the boring ones. The spares will be there, undermining the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mrs. Campbell) and seeking to take her seat from her. That will be the effect of the system that she supports.

I believe that the report is fundamentally flawed. It is an exercise in posturing by Lord Jenkins. Hon. Members should guard jealously their freedoms and responsibilities and should not lightly give up their direct connection with their electorate.

8.47 pm

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase): It is a special pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth). I defeated him in 1992, in a fairly muscular first-past-the-post election, which is almost enough evidence to make me think that it is a rather interesting system—but not quite.

I think that it was Adlai Stevenson who said that a politician is a person who approaches every question with an open mouth. Some of our debate has been interesting, but some of it has been as though the Jenkins report had never been written. Some hon. Members simply rehearsed positions that they would have held anyway. The real challenge of Jenkins is to invite us to get into some new and interesting territory. Either we respond to that challenge or we think that we can simply go on rehearsing the old arguments.

On the first page of Jenkins, in typical Jenkinsese, it says:

"we have endeavoured to seek relative virtue in an imperfect world."

Incidentally, there are some lovely examples of Jenkinsese around. I know what "fissiparous" means, but I am not so sure about "inspissated". Perhaps it is what one becomes if one spends an evening with the claret.

Hon. Members should approach the subject with some humility—although those who have protested how excellently they do the job have not shown much. No doubt they are excellent, but we should have some realism, too. Hon. Members puff out their chests and say that they represent all their constituents, but in at least half the cases, most of their constituents have voted for other parties. Members of Parliament go through the Lobbies night after night, voting with their party. If they were representing their constituents, they would vote for the views of the majority of their constituents who have supported other parties, but they do not do that. Under our system, with all its merits, we first get ourselves selected—the selection is far more important than the election—by a very few people. We are not selected by first past the post but by some other system. We then get ourselves elected, often by a minority of the electorate, and we then claim that we represent everybody, even though by our behaviour we do not. Then we invent conventions that tell everybody else to keep off our patch. That is an interesting system, but we need to be honest when we describe it. Although I enjoyed the speech by my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), whom I respect greatly, I could not help remembering that he and his friends opposed the extension of the vote to all members of the Labour party so that they could choose their representatives. It is a funny kind of democratic argument that leads to such conclusions.

The Jenkins report has managed to square a difficult circle. It makes it difficult for those who have supported other systems and for those who want to defend the old system. Lord Jenkins was given criteria to meet, and he has met them. In particular, he has confronted the question whether it is possible to combine more representative government with effective government. Traditionally, we have thought that that was not possible. In devising a home-grown British system that combines the disparate criteria ingeniously and imaginatively, Lord Jenkins has managed to strengthen the constituency link in many ways while adding some fairness. That is a considerable achievement that takes us into new territory.

Where do we go from here? The Government gave the commission the task of devising a concrete alternative to the existing system, so that we did not carry on a debate about some unimagined alternative that might be better. We now have that concrete alternative which we can discuss, as we have tonight.

I regret that the Government now appear to say that we will not have a referendum on the matter, having told the people that we would have a referendum and having made it central to the rest of our constitutional reform programme. It would have been the only referendum in which my constituents and the people of England would have voted. People in Scotland, Wales and London have had a referendum, but the referendum on voting reform was the one that everyone was to have.

It is ludicrous to propose more debate, because we have had a debate on the subject for most of the century. We have now at last been offered a concrete alternative to run off against first past the post. The Jenkins report makes it clear that there are good arguments on both sides and we should not be ideological in our approach. What are we afraid of in turning the matter over to the British public for them to decide? We could finally resolve an issue that has gnawed at British politics for decades and we might end up giving a little more energy and strength to our democracy.

8.54 pm

Mr. Donald Gorrie (Edinburgh, West): I have great pleasure in following the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) and some of his arguments. The voters will choose in a referendum, so the argument that the commission is biased is irrelevant. The commission was not a royal commission tasked with producing a great new method of running social services or whatever. It was asked to propose an alternative proportional system to set against the status quo, and it has produced a compromise. The idea that the report is some sort of Liberal Democrat stitch-up is complete rubbish, because the commission has not proposed a fully proportional system. If the Liberal Democrats had had their way, the commission would have recommended a single transferable vote system that was fully proportional. Lord Jenkins and his colleagues have tried to take account of different points of view and have produced a system that is more proportional than the present one; gives more voter choice; and has retained the link with the constituency. It is not a fully proportional system and, therefore, coalitions are not inevitable. The report makes it clear that the majority of elections since the war would not have produced a coalition. It is not true that the system would produce a permanent coalition and give the Liberal Democrats an easy ride.

Mr. Hayes: If the hon. Gentleman's principal argument against the current system is that it is not proportional, and the Jenkins system is, as he has just said, not proportional either, what is the incentive for change?

Mr. Gorrie: The system taken as a whole, with the AV members and the list members, is much more proportional. Lord Jenkins and his colleagues had to balance the desire for proportionality with the desire for a personal link with the constituency. They have produced a compromise that is acceptable to the Liberal Democrats because it is a great step towards proportionality.

Much of the argument tonight has centred on the allegation that the alternative vote system is wrong and unfair and that the worst votes for the worst people somehow decide the outcome. AV is not at all like that and is in fact used in many internal party elections. The system requires the voter to mark the candidates in order of preference. If someone has voted for candidates C or D and the contest ends up being only between candidates A and B, the person's preference will be taken into account. Ultimately, the whole electorate decide the run-off between candidates A and B and it is all done at one time, instead of coming back a week later—or two weeks later, as the Conservatives do in their leadership elections. The suggestion that some votes are more equal than others is not true—and nor is the idea that the constituency link would be lost. All 100 per cent. of the voters would still have a personal constituency link, and they are the people who count. Eighty per cent. or more of Members will still have a constituency link. The link has been kept, and it has been strengthened.

The idea that Members vote for the benefit of their constituents is complete rubbish. They vote as their Whips instruct. I am sure that some Members here tonight have constituents who were not in favour of fees for students or altering benefits for single parents. Members voted as the Whips directed.

Mr. Hayes: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way to me a second time. Surely he will acknowledge that the vast majority of our case work and the letters in our postbags have nothing to do with issues that divide the parties. Most of our work is about solving individual problems for individual people for whom those problems, which may to others seem trivial, are the biggest thing in the world. It does not matter to those people whether their MP is a Liberal, a Tory or a socialist. What matters is that the MP cares and helps them to solve their problems.

Mr. Gorrie: The new system does not alter that one bit. Members will still represent the constituency. They will merely have a greater degree of proven support than they do now.

The proposals will increase voter choice. The idea that it is too complicated to ask a voter to put 1, 2, 3 and 4 opposite names in one list and X opposite a preferred person on another list is ridiculous. Filling in a football pool or doing the national lottery is much more complicated.

Lord Jenkins has suggested that the top-up should be on a local basis so that top-up candidates are also chosen by the people in a county or a city. To argue that we would not have the fun and games of by-elections is rubbish. Eighty per cent. of Members will be elected in constituencies that could require by-elections.

Do the Conservatives seriously believe that it is good for the democratic health of Scotland that there are no Tory representatives of Scotland in Westminster? I believe that that is bad. Any Members who say otherwise should look into themselves quite seriously.

The question is whether the new system would improve democracy. We seem to have a hatred of coalitions, but we might reflect that the occasions on which the country has been faced with the gravest problems—the two world wars—produced coalitions, and the country came out of those wars successfully. We might learn from that success.

The Conservatives should consider the graph on page 11 of the Jenkins report which shows that the present system builds in disadvantage for them. They must obtain 6 per cent. more votes than the Labour party to get the same number of seats. There are serious defects in the present system. We want a referendum. Those who want change can argue for it; those who want the present system can argue for that; and the people can decide. That is what democracy is about.

9.1 pm

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North): It is difficult to join the debate at this stage because most of what I wanted to say has been said. However, I will emphasise a few points as quickly as I can.

No one believes that the first-past-the-post system is perfect. However, I believe that of all the different systems on offer, first past the post is the best. Is proportional representation on offer? We have heard that it is not. We are being offered a mixed bag of proposals that the Jenkins report has pulled together, but they cannot be described as PR.

It is not really for those of us who support the first-past-the-post system to make a case against the Jenkins report. A system exists, and it is up to Jenkins's supporters to make a clear case that deals with the positive issues that have been raised in our debate. There can be only two reasons for changing the present system. First, we should do it if there were an overwhelming wish for change among the general public. We all know that that is not so. I have been in politics for 35 years, and I have knocked on doors up and down the country. I have never met anyone who has demanded a change in the electoral system. Jenkins admits that there is no demand for change.

The second reason to change would be if change would improve democracy. I find it hard to understand how a system that would leave 20 per cent. of Members accountable to no one other than their party would be an improvement. I have heard no argument in defence of that position. It would mean that 20 per cent. of Members were no longer directly accountable to voters. The centralisation of power and control of Members would take a step further forward. I believe that the vast majority of the general public do not want that. Constituents expect us to speak on their behalf and to be as independently minded as we can. That would be less likely if Jenkins were adopted.

We must ask ourselves whether the proposals have met the criteria laid down. As I understand it, Jenkins was asked to come forward with a fairer, more democratic system that enhanced choice. I have not heard any Member argue today that that is what has happened.

As people look in more detail at the report, they will worry increasingly over other issues. We have heard a great deal about what the outcome of the past few elections would have been had the system been in operation. How are the estimates in the report made when it cannot be known how people would vote for their second preference? That would alter the outcome dramatically. There is much in the report that is supposed to be fact but is not.

A further practical problem is that the recommendations will lead to fundamental boundary changes. Many of us are being lobbied over the 1974 boundary changes even now and referendums have been held up and down the country. Only about six months ago there was one held on Merseyside about changing boundaries and structures. We would get even more of that.

In one constituency in Liverpool, the Member would represent a Liverpool seat, yet some of his constituents would be over the water in the Wirral. The River Mersey would divide the constituency. The system, then, would not connect that Member more closely than the present system does to his constituency. It is important that the

[Mr. David Watts]

Member is accessible. Most of us have a constituency office which many constituents visit. Will the proposals mean that a constituent in the Wirral would have to take a boat over the Mersey and then catch a bus to raise a matter with the Member? Such practical problems will not be welcomed by voters.

There have been a lot of red herrings about whether PR will improve the economy, yet there has been no evidence that it will.

The recommendations are nothing other than an attempt by some politicians to win seats. The Liberal Democrats support the proposal, not in principle, but because they see it as a way of getting more seats out of the system than they do at present. I am a practical politician and I have never met someone from another party who wants to give away their seat. Throughout my political life I have tried to defeat the Liberal Democrats and the Tories. I do not believe that politicians will willingly give them their seats. That is not a practical possibility.

9.7 pm

Mr. Alan Johnson (Hull, West and Hessle): I came to praise Jenkins, not to see the report buried. It has been unkindly, indeed scurrilously, said by Tory Members that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will try to do both. That is not possible. As President Nixon famously said, "Once the toothpaste is out of the tube, it is impossible to get it back in again."

As we approach the 21st century, we are having a debate on our democracy. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright)—I am surprised at some of the comments from this side of the House—that, if we are committed to reforming the second Chamber, decentralisation, a Scottish Parliament, devolution for Wales and incorporating the European Bill of Human Rights into British law—something, incidentally, similar to a freedom of information Bill, a matter that has never been raised on a doorstep with me anywhere—we cannot just screech to a halt when it comes to the system for electing Members to this Chamber.

This can be a healthy debate. There is no need for any rancour or divisions. We can change the system devised by a small political elite at a time when working-class men, let alone all women, did not have the vote. For the very first time, we shall give the British people a say in the type of voting system that is crucial to our democracy. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) said, it is a foundation stone of our democracy.

In this debate, we must accept that the Conservative party will be united against us on the referendum. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) said that would be terrifying. I do not find it so, but of course they will be against us. That is the stance of the Conservative party. It is against all constitutional change, conservative in every sense of the word. Labour can have a healthy debate because we are committed to moving it forward.

I go some way along with it, but it is depressing to hear the argument that we are dearly loved by our constituents and that they elect us because of our special skills and talents. I arrived in my constituency 18 days before polling day, halfway through the campaign. The posters for the previous candidate were in the windows but I was still elected. The preening, self-regarding argument that everything in Parliament is perfect has come up again and again. It is suggested that new Members who come in on the top-up will spend their time in the Tea Room, that they will be lesser politicians than us, as if none of us ever went near the Tea Room.

The argument, especially for Labour Members, must be about whether we are committed to change and whether there is a case for change in the Jenkins report. Jenkins is not the only one to examine our system and come out for change. There was a Speaker's Conference in 1917 and a Hansard Society commission on electoral reform in 1976. Labour set up the Plant commission. Plant did not convert to electoral reform and proportional representation until he had been through that process. There is plenty of evidence to suggest that we should change.

I do not accept that narrow party political advantage should colour our judgment. As others have said, turkeys do not vote for Christmas. We are the first party in power to decide to go to the country to give it the chance to change the system that gave us power.

There is an important lesson for Labour Members. Not only votes for women and the universal franchise but electoral reform were founding principles of our party from 1900. We sought electoral reform until 1945, when our landslide—the precedent for our general election victory last year—led to a sudden loss of interest. We thought that, if we could win Hastings, and Hove, we had no need to worry about electoral reform. However, in 1951 our Government received the largest vote ever for a political party in Britain—250,000 votes more than the Conservative party got—yet lost the election by 26 seats and spent 13 years in opposition. That is why I want us to address the issue properly and give the people a chance. Let us start the debate in the right way by accepting that, while there will be different points of view, in the end, we shall agree that there must be a referendum of the British people because it is their decision.

9.12 pm

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree): I am glad to follow my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Mr. Johnson). When he talked of a scheme devised by a political elite, I assumed that he meant the Jenkins committee, but he was referring to our forebears.

Jenkins is being misjudged in many ways. He was not asked, as though he were King Solomon, to devise the perfect electoral system; he was asked to present an alternative to our system. His alternative greatly flatters our present system because, whatever else it is, it is not proportional representation. There may be a hint of proportionality, but that is like saying that a man is a little bit honest. It is not what the Liberal party has campaigned for from about the time that the Labour party took the other side of the argument. In the end, all the arguments about proportionality are based on electoral calculations, although I concede that political principles run through the system.

I am surprised that the Liberals are prepared to go with the Jenkins recommendations. Ever since I can remember, the Liberal party has supported the single transferable vote, and, whatever the Jenkins system may be, it is not that. I have a feeling that the Liberals have been hoist by their own petard. Having supported the single transferable vote for so many years, and having now won some seats by tactical voting, they would rather like to jump to the alternative vote, but it is very difficult to eat 60 years worth of words, is it not?

So the Jenkins position is neither proportional nor anything else. I do not blame the noble Lord for that because, within the terms of reference, it was impossible to produce something that was broadly proportional while retaining the other features that he was asked to include.

There is a case for the alternative vote in single-member seats, but I do not endorse that for the following reason. We should not be seen to be playing politics with the electoral system to our own advantage. If the voters perceive that we are coming along with calculations for different systems, they will lose even more faith in our democratic process than some of them have already lost. I would sooner quote Adlai Stevenson, but my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Mr. Johnson) mentioned Richard Nixon. A famous quotation from Richard Nixon is, "Winning is a lot more fun". I think that that is what all those calculations are about, but we should not base our judgment on that. I am wedded, as other hon. Members are, to the single member seat so that a Member represents an individual division, irrespective of who voted for him or her. That is the kernel of the argument. That can be retained with the alternative vote, but I believe that it would be wrong to be perceived to do that.

I come to the ultimate danger of the proposal before us. At the start of the debate, we heard about the Conservative romantic poet—that is like the Jenkins system, something that is almost impossible to combine—who was the Member of Parliament for a rotten borough. The rebellion that produced the Great Reform Act was, among other things, against the fancy franchises. I fear that the Jenkins system is the fancy electoral system, rather like the curry dinner that one has stiffened up or weakened down, depending on one's taste. One can increase the proportionality or diminish it according to the party political calculation of the result.

I can only think that the noble Lord had asked focus groups about what would have happened in the 1950 election had we had various systems. We do not know, and, in view of the risks inherent in change, I wish to stay with the system that has served this country well for so many years.

9.17 pm

Siobhain McDonagh (Mitcham and Morden): This is only the second time that I have spoken in the House since the election. I come tonight to speak just because I feel so strongly about the issue. I find it difficult and off-putting, but in considering the role of the Member of Parliament in the past 18 months, I should like to say to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Mr. Johnson) that I represent a constituency in which I was born and brought up, a constituency that I fought three times. I would not want to represent anywhere else in the country. So, for me, the local link is incredibly important.

I am worried about top-up Members of Parliament because I see a society in which people feel more and more alienated from what is around them. Young people feel alienated. Banks, building societies, the Post Office and the benefits system are removed from our high streets, more distanced and moved further away from people. The journey towards top-up Members of Parliament strikes me as going in that same direction. People are finding themselves further away from the Members of Parliament whom they want to represent them.

I do not believe that I am anything wonderful. I do not believe that most of the people here are anything wonderful, but I believe that, whatever party they represent, they represent their constituents and listen to their constituents' problems. I am sure that no one here asks, "Who did you vote for?", before helping them with their housing inquiry or benefit inquiry. That lie has to be nailed because we shall get increasing alienation if that sort of image comes across.

What will top-up Members of Parliament do? Lord Jenkin outlined two roles. The first was that they could liaise with local authorities and Whitehall. Do we not all represent our local authorities? Do we not all get our council leaders in to see Ministers when there are problems? Do any of us want to delegate that job? No, we do not, because we live in our area and we know our local councils. I do not know Sutton as well as the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow), nor any of the other boroughs included in the area into which my borough is to be put as well as the local constituency Members of Parliament. How will the top-up Member of Parliament know the five boroughs better than any individual Member of Parliament? If that is the best system for top-ups that the noble Lord Jenkins can come up with, it is doomed from the start.

The top-up area containing my constituency is a bizarre and wholly arbitrary construction, covering Feltham and Heston, Brentford and Isleworth—areas north of the Thames and those out in west London. It happily tramples over the huge distinctions between inner and outer London as though they do not matter. It ranges from deprived Mitcham council estates to leafy Surrey suburbs. It is a totally artificial construct, which fails almost every test that any self-respecting boundary commission would set. It adds nothing to local democracy and accountability and takes no account of the needs of the people it contains. It has been brought into existence purely to fulfil some psephological criteria and, as such, should be strangled at birth.

The second justification for the innovation is that it will guarantee a greater political spread of parties represented. Thankfully, the commission rejected the German level of top-up Members and in doing so attempted to avoid the scenario of a rival and equally active Member of Parliament of an opposing party being on the scene. However, that is precisely what the proposed system will deliver, and it takes no great leap of imagination to envision top-up Members of Parliament being played off against constituency Members of Parliament. I would find it extremely difficult if a top-up Member of Parliament who had been elected by people who, in the main, lived 15 or 20 miles away from my constituency set him or herself up in opposition to me—the Member of Parliament directly elected by the people of Mitcham and Modern—over a local issue that directly affected my constituents. What possible democratic justification could there be for a system that enabled that to happen? Such a system would remove accountability.

How would voters get rid of an individual top-up Member of Parliament whom they disliked? If Michael Portillo had been a top-up Member of Parliament, he would still be sitting on the Opposition Benches, instead of making television documentaries that nobody watches. The people of his constituency replaced him with my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Twigg), which was an excellent decision, even though my hon. Friend is wrong on this particular issue. The people of that constituency had the power, and democracy worked.

The introduction of top-up Members of Parliament is a step in the wrong direction and, yet again, highlights the essential absurdity of the so-called compromise. Lord Jenkins has produced a system that is neither one thing nor the other. He calls it "unique" and says that it is the "best solution for Britain". However, the only reason why the report shoehorns an entirely arbitrary number of top-up Members of Parliament into the system is to give it a veneer of proportionality. Removing the top-up element leaves a system that is hardly proportional at all.

It is wrong that a major constitutional innovation, containing all the inherent weaknesses that I have described, has been proposed, purely to graft a proportional element on to an otherwise modest set of reforms. It is not the best solution for Britain. It is a report which, to coin a phrase used by the noble Lord Jenkins, plays the fuddled fiddle in the muddled middle. I, for one, would have great difficulty giving it my support.

Mr. James Plaskitt (Warwick and Leamington): In a sense, those who speak in this debate should declare an interest: we are all the product of the current system, so we all have an interest in it. However, it is not our system, it is not our democracy and, as some speakers have said, they are not actually our constituencies. We need to raise our sights above self-interest and party interest, which is something about which we have heard a great deal in the debate. We have to look critically and objectively at the system that sent us here and we need to test the reform proposal, not against our interests, nor those of our party, but against the public interest. That is where we find the current system wanting and why we should reform it.

Three groups of arguments against reform have been used and I might have time to look at each of those. The first argument—that the proposed system is too complex—is the one that I find the least reputable of all the arguments ranged against reform. Voters are asked to complete two ballot papers—well, they often have to do that already. In addition, they are asked to rank candidates in order of preference—it really is as easy as one, two, three. The hon. Members who have argued that the system is too complex are insulting the electorate's intelligence.

The counting may be complex, but voters will not be asked to do that. The transition may create upheaval, but, again, voters will not be involved in that. Different electoral systems exist throughout Europe and all have higher turnouts, but in none do the voters complain that they are too complex. I do not understand why that argument is being wheeled out.

The second argument is that reform leads to coalition politics. The Jenkins report aptly reminds us that, for 43 of the past 150 years, first past the post has delivered us coalition government, and for a further 34 of those years, Governments were propped up by minority parties. If the past four elections were rerun on the Jenkins system, three would have had clear winners and only the 1992 election would have had an indeterminate outcome.

Another point to consider is that voters might want cross-party co-operation. Why should they not? That is a perfectly legitimate choice. Who are we to deny them that choice if that is what, in certain elections, they want?

Related to that is the argument that a reformed system would offer too much power to minorities. In many senses, so does first past the post, especially if the minority is geographically concentrated. At the 1974 election, the Scottish National party, with about 1 per cent. of the national vote, had almost as many seats as the Liberal Democrats with 19 per cent. of the national vote. Therefore, small parties can hold the balance of power under the first-past-the-post system.

The criticism of reform is that it would give too much power to minorities. That charge could be brought against the first-past-the-post system. It delivers outright wins and total power to parties which have secured less than 40 per cent. of the vote at a general election. That is what I call giving too much power to minorities.

The third argument is that electoral reform is irrelevant and that there are more important things to do. I would argue that electoral reform is important. It is about a greater maturity in, and greater credibility for, our democratic process. It is not acceptable to cling to a system that is unfair and that distorts people's choice.

We did not hear much about electoral reform between 1945 and 1970 when two political parties garnered between them about 95 per cent. of the vote, but that was an unusual period in British politics. For most of the 19th century, for the first half of this century and for the past 30 years, British politics has been a multi-party system, which first past the post does not fit in with and which leads to distortions.

We should have a system that aspires to be democratic, to make votes count and to make them count equally. I commend the Jenkins report. Some proportional representation systems are terrible. They create instability, fracture the political process and foster extremism. I welcome the Jenkins report because it steers us away from those failed proportional representation systems and offers instead a system that builds on what is best in British electoral tradition—constituency links, local identity and ease of use.

9.27 pm

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): I shall be brief because many of my colleagues want to speak.

We hear much about the third way. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister tells us that the third way is work in progress. Nothing could illustrate that more than what is happening in the sphere of constitutional change.

Proposals for a reformed other place should link in with proposals to change the electoral system. We now have a multiplicity of voting systems in the United Kingdom. We have the supplementary vote for the London mayor and other city mayors and the closed proportional list system for the European Parliament, and we still have first past the post for local government. So it goes on. We have the single transferable vote in Northern Ireland and the first-past-the-post additional-member system for the new Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly. There is no coherence there.

Commentators rightly say that we do not have the faintest idea of where the dismantling of the British state is taking us. The Prime Minister has an obligation to start painting the big constitutional picture. I have no idea yet what that big constitutional picture is. I want to know whether changing the voting system is part of the project, because I do not yet have a clear idea what the project is. If we are turning completely on its head the way in which this country is governed, Members of Parliament, members of the Labour party and people in the community must have a vision of where those changes are taking us.

I wish to raise a point that has not been made in the debate so far. I refer hon. Members to the Plant report, which was published in 1991. In that report, Lord Raymond Plant says that there is "no ideal electoral system and each one has its defects and its drawbacks."

That is a statement of the obvious, but he continues:

"but it has to be understandable. We believe it is important for citizens to be able to understand the electoral system in which their democratic rights are exercised."

I have read the Jenkins report several times, and I do not think that most people will understand it. In an article in The Daily Telegraph on 30 October, Lord Alexander, a member of the Jenkins commission, wrote that the alternative vote is no alternative. However, he was describing the supplementary vote. So a member of the Jenkins commission, writing in The Daily Telegraph, has completely misunderstood what the Jenkins report says. If a member of the commission can get it wrong, I am sure that the rest of us can do the same.

9.30 pm

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset): If I had realised what a memorably splendid speech the hon. Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice) would make, I would have requested that he be given more time in which to do so.

In 1917—which, I admit, is a long time ago—the subject of proportional representation was debated in the House. A splendid figure named Colonel Sanders told the House that "extraordinary people" are returned to the House of Commons. The Home Secretary is indeed an extraordinary person. His brilliant stratagem of ministerial charm—I do not know why more of his ministerial colleagues do not follow suit, but I hope that they will not—was exercised tonight highly destructively and to great purpose.

The Home Secretary told us at the beginning of the debate something of which the whole House needed to—and, on the whole, did—take account. He said that we ought not cynically to decry the motives of people on either side of the debate. During the progress of the debate, we were given ample reason to follow that advice. Tonight, a combination of Conservatives, who lost abundantly the last election, sided with Labour Members, who won abundantly the last election. It is difficult to construct a single interest that joins those two groups who take a common view. We opposed Labour Members, who won the last election, joined with Liberals who have never won any election.

Mr. Straw: Early in the century.

Mr. Letwin: I apologise. I mean that they have never won anything as the Liberal Democrat party. The real Liberal party opposes the whole scheme in any event. I admit that the Liberal Democrats have a self-interested reason for proposing the scheme. However, Liberal Democrat Members offered some real arguments in favour of the scheme, and I do not think that we should decry their motives either.

There are principles at stake, and the debate revealed two clear principles: one positive and the other negative. The positive principle is that the current British system—the simple majority system—has inestimable advantages. As we were reminded frequently during the debate, the system is used in half the world. Why? It is used in half the world because the system affords clear government and clear and robust debate—which is a central part of the political and judicial culture of this country. We believe in debate in the law courts and in Parliament and also in clarity, and our system delivers those things. The hon. Members for Middlesbrough (Mr. Bell), and for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) and my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser) made that point most clearly this evening.

Secondly, our British system ensures that all Members of Parliament represent all their constituents. That point was emphasised over and over this evening. The right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn)—in what was a splendid performance, even by his standards—told the House what that meant to someone who has been here for a very long time. My hon. Friend the Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes), who made a characteristically robust speech, emphasised the same point, as did the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh), from whom we might have heard more with great pleasure.

There is a third inestimable advantage attached to our British system. Again and again this evening the point was made: our system delivers coalitions, but it delivers them before elections. It forces politicians in the great parties to join together and argue the toss, and then to put to the electorate a single platform and programme, which the electors can accept or reject. That is known as voter choice.

The point was made repeatedly and forcefully by my hon. Friends the Members for Poole (Mr. Syms) and for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), and by the hon. Members for East Londonderry (Mr. Ross), for Burnley (Mr. Pike) and for Watford (Ms Ward). I hope that I have not forgotten any other hon. Members.

Mr. Kaufman: The hon. Gentleman says that parties are elected on manifestos and are expected to carry out their manifestos. Is it not interesting that the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) asked us to hold to our manifesto by having a referendum before the next general election, whereas when the Liberals had power during the Lib-Lab pact in the 1970s, they prevented us from carrying out our manifesto?

Mr. Letwin: Indeed. With his customary acuity, the right hon. Gentleman makes a point that is deep, as well as amusing. It is a function of post-electoral coalitions to muddy the waters. As many hon. Members pointed out, they create manifestos for which no one has voted, and they end up by preventing either of the parties in the coalition from fulfilling its manifesto. We should add that the Liberals during that period also did not fulfil their manifesto. That is par for the course.

[Mr. Letwin]

There is a fourth feature and a further inestimable advantage of our simple British system. It delivers what has been christened "removal van democracy." We know that—we were in the removal van last time, hundreds and hundreds of us.

Mr. Graham Allen (Vice-Chamberlain of Her Majesty's Household): Not enough.

Mr. Letwin: Even the hon. Gentleman ought to have been satisfied by the scale of that removal.

Our system allows the British people to make a choice to get rid of their Government. My hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) made the point strongly, but before the debate began, someone else made it to me even more poignantly. That person will be recognised by Labour Members, some of whom worked with him.

I spent a little time this afternoon with the noble Lord Callaghan. He told me what he thought about the elections going back a long time—longer than I had imagined anyone could—since 1935. He pointed out the striking feature that even in the cases where there was an apparent disproportion between votes cast and seats won, if one asks the historical rather than the statistical question, "Did the product roughly correspond to what the people of this country wanted to bring about?", broadly it did. That was a grand old Labour politician speaking, who has won and who has lost.

Mr. Allen: He was pulling the hon. Gentleman's leg.

Mr. Letwin: Contrary to the hon. Gentleman's statement, I do not believe that Lord Callaghan was pulling anybody's leg. He spoke with passion and from conviction.

The argument is not based solely on the inestimable advantages of our system. If it were, we would be on weak ground. Although I have described the great advantages, there are of course arguments against our present British system which, like any system, has its defects. The strength of the argument relies on the fact that allied to the real advantages of our present system, the system proposed by Lord Jenkins has grotesque disadvantages.

First, as one of the members of the Jenkins commission pointed out, its report is self-contradictory. My hon. Friend the Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) and the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) made that clear. The report contains abundant contradictions, above all because it starts out by establishing one part of a system—AV—only to find that that contradicts the essence of what the commission is trying to achieve, and therefore has to add a contradictory system of top-up. That is an odd thing to do.

Secondly, critically and ironically, the proposed system is not a proportional system. It does not even claim to be a proportional system. It is what the hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) described as a fancy franchise. The hon. Members for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Keen), for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) and others pointed out that the proportionality in the proposed system is strictly limited. AV-plus it may be; proportional representation it is not.

It has another feature. I agree that it is not compelling by itself but surely it is one that is enough to make one have doubts. The proposed system has never been used anywhere else in the world. However, that is less remarkable than the fact that so far as our researchers have been able to unearth it has never even been proposed for discussion anywhere else in the world. People have been talking about proportional representation for more than 200 years. There are—I have so far been able to count only a portion of them—more than 120 books written in the English language on the subject yet no one has ever come up with the system that has been proposed. That must give one cause for thought.

Mr. Linton: Even though the proposed system is put forward as a unique British system to suit British conditions and therefore does not purport to be like some other system, does the hon. Gentleman agree that there are 27 countries that have mixed proportional and majoritarian systems, that seven of them are additional Member systems, including Germany and Italy, and that one of them uses a preferential system combined with a majoritarian system? To say that the proposed system is unique is not quite true.

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman, alas, neglects the fact that one half of the proposed system has never been combined with other half in any other place; nor has it ever been proposed that it should be so combined. Most of the problems with the system arise from that very combination.

Thirdly, like every other proportional representation system known to man, to the extent that it is proportional it has another tendency. That is inevitable. It is the logic of the thing. It tends to produce weaker coalition Governments. It has been said that the present British system can also produce coalitions. That is true but a proportional representation system is likely to produce them more of the time.

It has been said that in three of the past four elections the proposed system might not have produced a coalition. That is slightly untrue because it probably would have in two. Even if three of four were true, that hardly makes the point. Of the past 15 elections, seven at the very minimum, eight probably and possibly nine would have produced coalition Governments under the proposed system. It has a greater tendency to coalition and hence to weakness than our current system.

Next, and most importantly—indeed, to my mind conclusively—the proposed system would create coalitions in the opposite way to that under which our present circumstances direct us. It would create coalitions after elections. The politicians would create the coalitions and not the voters. The proposed system denies voters choice.

I regret to say that that does not worry Lord Williams of Mostyn, Minister of State, Home Office, who in the other place was defending the Home Secretary's splendid proposals for a closed list, when he said that the open list would give voters too much choice. That is one of the most remarkable statements ever made in any parliament. It was something that worried the hon. Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) and it also worried

Ramsay MacDonald. All those years ago Ramsay MacDonald, well known to some Labour Members, of course, said:

> "The present method, at any rate, compels candidates, whilst they are still candidates, to declare where their cohesion is, who their colleagues are, and what party they have got to work with, so that, on the whole, the majority in this House is a representative majority and not a scratch majority."—[Official Report, 22 May 1917; Vol. XCIII, c. 2232.]

I could not have put it better myself.

Mr. Beith: I do not remember that at the start of the Government led by the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) he announced to the world that to get the Maastricht treaty through he would have to seek the support of another party—the Liberal Democrats—in order to do so, but that is what happened.

Mr. Letwin rose—

Mr. Bermingham: The right hon. Gentleman paid the price.

Mr. Letwin: The hon. Gentleman says exactly what I was about to say and very well. My right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) paid the price.

Irony of ironies, and finally, the proposed system of Lord Jenkins of AV-plus produces a disproportion of power. It may produce proportionality to some slight degree in seats and votes but far more powerfully it creates a disproportion, I think uniquely among all the systems of proportional representation proposed anywhere. It excludes all the tiny minorities and gives permanent or near-permanent position of power to one party, a party which by pure coincidence is the party of the chairman of the commission.

I have only a minute or two left so I shall bring my remarks to an end. This has been a good debate and, I think, a fair one. I think that it has been one in which the arguments have been put well. On the whole, as a matter of fact, the right side has won, but that is not my point. It has been a fair debate because it has been conducted by the rules and because the House has rules that we all observe and respect.

My final plea is directly to the Home Secretary. I am sure that he is a decent man. He has a reputation for integrity. His position on this matter is well known, though it is not entirely shared by the whole Cabinet. Let us have, in this and all cases, a fair referendum, which is also conducted by the rules. Those rules should be settled by a genuinely independent commission, appointed by the Speaker or some other utterly independent person. They should govern access to the media, and funding so that we do not have a one-sided campaign. They should ensure that the people of this country genuinely decide, on the basis of real understanding, with the arguments made fairly on both sides. If the arguments that I have put forward do not win the day, as democrats we shall accept that. I expect that, on the contrary, we shall overwhelmingly win such a referendum.

9.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. George Howarth): It is traditional to say so, but this has been an interesting and wide-ranging debate. As the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) said, we see the House at its best when we debate a subject which, for once, we all understand. The prospect of any change to the way in which we are elected to this House is of fundamental importance to right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber. If my mathematics is right, 38 hon. Members have spoken in the debate. There are few debates in which so many hon. Members have has the opportunity to speak.

In opening the debate, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary typically kept us guessing throughout his speech about his point of view on this subject. He made a plea for as wide a discussion as possible to take place, not just in the House but throughout the country. Today's debate has been an excellent starting point.

Before dealing with some of the points that have been raised, I should like to say a word about the report, its purpose and the process that it has triggered. Like others, I pay tribute to the commission and its chairman, the noble Lord Jenkins, for the manner in which they have conducted their inquiry and the result, which, as many hon. Members have said, is both readable and faithful to the terms of reference that were given. Some might disagree that the report is readable, but I shall return to that in a moment.

During the debate, and in comments in the media, for example, much has been made of the role and motivation of the noble Lord Jenkins. Those who made such comments include the hon. Members for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), for Mid-Dorset and North Poole (Mr. Fraser) and for West Dorset (Mr. Letwin).

It is both unfair and short-sighted to malign the character or motivation of Lord Jenkins. It is certainly unfair to those who sat on the commission with him, as it implies that they played only a passive role. From what I know of those concerned, it is unlikely that they would behave in that manner. Baroness Gould is the commission member I know best. I have known her for many years, and on several occasions have really feared her—she was formerly general secretary and a senior official in my party. Anybody who knows her will agree that she is the last person to be used in such a way.

The prose style of the report bears all the hallmarks of Lord Jenkins. My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright), who had to leave early, mentioned some of the words used in the report. I looked up one in the Oxford dictionary, but could not find a definition. Nevertheless, the report was extremely readable. The analysis and thinking in the report, with the possible exception of the note of reservation from Lord Alexander, was the product of a consensus between the members of the commission as to how the terms of reference could best be met.

Leaving aside my views, my reading of the report suggests—several hon. Members have taken issue with this—that the members of the commission have arrived at a recommendation which comes as near as possible to meeting the terms of reference that they were given to work with. My hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) made that point, as, implicitly, did my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst).

If we are to have change—and ultimately that will be, quite properly, a decision for the voters—we now have an alternative, whether we like it or not, alongside which the status quo of the first-past-the-post system can be judged and debated. In that important sense, the commission members have done us a service.

The report gives us an excellent starting point for a debate which can take place, hopefully—as, for the most part, it has done this afternoon and this evening—in a considered manner as part of the process leading up to the referendum. Surely—as has been pointed out—this is a grown-up way of doing things, and I hope that we can continue in that way.

Some aspects of the report will excite those of us who stand for election. There is no question about that. These are important issues, and strong views are held on all sides. However, that is no reason to stop us having a proper and informed debate on the subject. In order to have that debate, it is necessary to have a considered alternative to the status quo. Otherwise, we will end up debating the first-past-the-post system against all other systems. Frankly, that will take us nowhere.

Mr. Bermingham: Let me ask my hon. Friend a simple question. When the referendum comes, will it be a question of Jenkins or the status quo? Could it be that a new way will emerge?

Mr. Howarth: Certainly the referendum question will be drawn from Jenkins, but it would not be sensible to say at this point quite how it will be framed. The hon. Member for West Dorset referred to the issue, and Neill had something to say about it. We will debate that on Monday. For the moment, it is best to leave the question in that setting. It is not that I do not wish to engage in debate, but it would not be right to hurry into such a dialogue.

Perhaps I could briefly cover some of the points raised in the debate. I wish to refer in particular to the speeches by my right hon. Friends the Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) and for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman). Both have wide experience of this House and of the process of government, which gives added weight to their arguments. It has often been said in the debate that not all Members of this House are equal. In an important sense, the kind of experience that both my right hon. Friends have had makes them slightly more equal than others.

Knowing the strong views of my right hon. Friend the Member for Chesterfield on many subjects—particularly constitutional issues—I wonder if it gave him pause for thought to find so many right hon. and hon. Members from the Conservative party agreeing with every word he said. That phenomenon has not always been familiar to him.

Mr. Benn: It's the third way.

Mr. Howarth: My right hon. Friend calls it "the third way". My right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton has, on many occasions, expressed his displeasure in a very elegant way—a way that I have often admired. He did not let us down on that score today, and he has wide experience that he brings to play.

I wish to single out two speeches by Opposition Members—the hon. Members for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne) and for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis). The hon. Member for New Forest, West made a speech—I say this in a true spirit of friendliness—which was one of the most surreal I have ever experienced in this House. In an eight-minute speech, he had to concede that almost every one of the points that he made was wrong. Indeed, he conceded that on more than one occasion. I suspect that, if the hon. Gentleman is completely honest—which I know him to be—he will have to agree that he has not read the report as thoroughly as he might have. The hon. Member for New Forest, East, however, has at least read some parts of the report. We know that for certain, because he read them out to us.

I am worried about one aspect of the report. Paragraphs 114 to 116 discuss, in terms, the concern that the proposed system would create two classes of Members. The hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) mentioned that when he opened the debate for the Opposition, and it was also mentioned by the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) and others. Having been a Member of Parliament for some 12 years, I—like many other hon. Members—would take some convincing that a system involving constituency Members and top-up Members representing larger sub-regional areas would not turn out to be a recipe for local instability. It might well produce greater national stability, but at local level it could create problems.

Let me put it bluntly. The proposals contain the seeds of a system that could lead to permanent electioneering at local level, not only between political parties—which, of course, is very healthy—but between elected representatives within parties. That is a real fear, which must be dealt with in the debate that we will have in the future.

A further issue that arises from the proposed new role for top-up Members of Parliament is accountability. Several speakers have raised that issue. The report itself makes it clear that all Members of Parliament take pride in, and bear in mind, the fact that, once elected, we represent all our constituents, irrespective of whether they voted for us. My hon. Friends the Members for Mitcham and Morden (Siobhain McDonagh) and for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) made that point very effectively, in their own way.

Between elections, however, we are held to account in various ways. There is the pressure of local opinion; there are our surgeries; the way in which we perceive policies may affect our constituents. There is also the oft-quoted postbag. Several of my colleagues have developed novel ways of being held to account, such as forums and question times. Tomorrow night we are holding a Member of Parliament's question time in my constituency, in Knowsley village, for the first time. I am interested to see how that will work, and I consider such experiments to be useful.

However, one of the main ways by which we are held to account is through our constituency parties or associations. In some important respects, between elections, local party members and organisations stand proxy for the wider electorate. They hold us to account. In my experience, that is not a means by which the party machine subverts us in smoke-filled rooms; it is a more subtle, but nevertheless important, process. Inevitably, top-up Members would not readily have such means available to them. I fear that, in trying to establish themselves, they would step on the toes—or even, dare I say, more sensitive parts of the anatomy—of those representing constituencies. That brings us back to the problem that I mentioned earlier.

We are all aware that the Government are embarked on a process of enacting major constitutional reforms, and it is important for us to see that as part of a bigger picture. The real issue, however—as many hon. Members have said—is that the final decision should not be made by politicians, or even by the House of Commons. Whatever prejudice, or whatever objective view, some of us may or may not hold, the people should make that decision. It is appropriate that there should be a referendum at the right time. It will be a big decision, with far-reaching consequences.

I believe that this has been a useful debate. The House has started a process. All the arguments have been rehearsed and, in a real sense, the House has performed a useful function. As many hon. Members have made clear during the debate, in due course it will be for the electorate to decide, and rightly so.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): With the leave of the House, I will put together motions 2, 3 and 4.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Monday 9th November, the Speaker shall not adjourn the House until any Message from the Lords relating to the Scotland Bill shall have been received.

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 10th November, paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 31 (Questions on amendments) shall apply to proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr. William Hague as if this day were a half-day Opposition Day allotted under paragraph (2) of Standing Order No. 14 (Arrangement of public business) and the questions on that Motion shall be put at Seven o'clock.

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 10th November, notwithstanding paragraph 1 of Standing Order No. 16 (Proceedings under an Act or on European Community Documents), the Speaker shall put the questions on the Motions in the name of Mr. William Hague relating to the Personal Equity Plan (Amendment) Regulations 1998, the Individual Savings Account Regulations 1998 and the Individual Savings Account (Insurance Companies) Regulations 1998 not later than one and a half hours after the start of proceedings on the first such Motion.—[Mr. Allen.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With the leave of the House, I will put together motions 5, 6 and 7.

COMMITTEE ON MODERNISATION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Ordered,

That Mr. Mike Hall be discharged from the Committee on Modernisation of the House of Commons and Mr. Ivor Caplin be added to the Committee.

COMMITTEE OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Ordered,

That Mr. Christopher Leslie and Mr. Phil Hope be discharged from the Committee of Public Accounts and Mr. Gerry Steinberg and Mr. Stephen Twigg be added to the Committee.

PROCEDURE COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That Mr. Damian Green be discharged from the Procedure Committee and Mr. Robert Syms be added to the Committee.—[Mr Allen.]

Theatres and Opera Houses

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Allen.]

Mr. Brian Sedgemore (Hackney, South and Shoreditch): This is a tale of two cities. One is inhabited by white, middle-class, elderly citizens, outwardly genteel and soft spoken, but inwardly grasping and greedy with a belief in their divine right to use and, if necessary, empty the public purse for their own purposes. When they visit the Royal Opera house, they shuffle uneasily in the presence of unwelcome strangers wearing smelly trainers. When they leave, they step gingerly over beggars wondering what the world is coming to, blissfully unaware that all the brilliant entrepreneurial strategies for pulling this chaotic, shambolic and dysfunctional organisation from the brink of financial ruin consist of little more than begging for increased public subsidy to be paid by those who are considerably less well off than themselves. Were it not for the fact that I am an opera lover, I might be tempted to comment critically on that absurd situation.

A couple of miles away in the other city, a younger, more eclectic audience, streetwise and sharply dressed, many of them black, some of them Turks, a few of them Vietnamese and none of them rich, makes its way to the Hackney Empire. It is easily the largest and certainly the finest theatre in east and north London, with its wonderful proscenium arch and Frank Matcham's inspiring and dazzling interior.

It is not that those theatre-goers envy the patrons of the Royal Opera house—I dare say more of them might get into opera if the house dropped its sneering policy of paying only lip service to education—it is simply that those who live in the east end are a world apart from the AB social classes of the ROH. Profligacy and conspicuous consumption are not part of the east end lexicon. The Hackney empire audience is puzzled as to the whys and wherefores of how the British arts establishment works.

Those in the Hackney empire audience see that the toffs at the Royal Opera house have no difficulty in getting funding for their building. They sense that it has something to do with establishment cronies in the opera world moving through revolving doors. They worry that their Government may be giving middle England and metropolitan London a higher priority than disadvantaged London. They get angry when they witness the shenanigans and financial improprieties of the Royal Opera company. The minds of the Hackney empire audience can only boggle when they witness the ROH receiving a lottery grant of £68 million for a new building, followed by the promise of increased public subsidy, at a time when there is anarchy at the house and the company is building up a £20 million plus deficit to take with it into the new millennium.

Let us not beat about the bush. If the Royal Opera company was treated as it should be, like a private trading company, the members of the board and management of that bankrupt company would be up on charges of fraudulent trading. Millionairess Mrs. Vivien Duffield, the deputy chairman, would be carted off to Holloway prison. Sir Colin Southgate, the chairman and Lord Eatwell, two new Labour stalwarts, would find themselves being treated by Her Majesty, not at Buckingham palace but at Wormwood Scrubs.

When the Royal Opera company offers Sadler's Wells £1 million in compensation for breach of contract, it is offering the ballet company a bouncing cheque, as it has no money in the bank, only a mammoth pile of mounting debts—the Royal Opera is insolvent. That is a financial scam, based on the creditors' assumption that the Government will, in the end, always bail out the Royal Opera.

Even more bizarrely, as the Chancellor tells every firm in Britain to increase productivity or we die, the Minister for the Arts tells the Royal Opera company that, if it closes down its operation and reduces productivity to zero, a lot more subsidy will be on the way. That is obscene—a damnable disgrace.

It is no wonder that audiences at the Hackney Empire felt so cheated when the lottery application to preserve the theatre's stunning building and to provide modern facilities was turned down after the Arts Council's peremptory deliberations when, as a result of a change in policy, the new apparatchiks took over. It is no wonder that the "Save London's Theatres" campaign is up in arms and has told the Secretary of State and Gerry Robinson, the chairman of the Arts Council, so in no uncertain terms. It is no wonder that those who believe in fairness feel sickened at the way in which the Arts Council of England and the London Arts Board have told the Hackney Empire to get stuffed.

The Arts Council made its decision on the basis of a new policy to cut the size of bids. That policy was not approved until the Hackney Empire had spent £1.5 million on feasibility and development work with money provided by the lottery. What a wanton waste.

The Hackney Empire also seems to have run into the anti-London bias that has been developing at the Arts Council, a bias that the London Arts Board has, to its shame, done little to stop. There is also an element of snobbery and elitism that frowns on popular culture, although I do not want the House to be misled on that point. The Hackney Empire puts on first-class opera and has produced some of the best Shakespeare that I have seen, in addition to dance, music hall entertainment, comedy and alternative comedy. In October, we had a fortnight of "As You Like It" and "Antony and Cleopatra" directed by Michael Bogdanov and performed by the English Shakespeare Company. This week, we have the Carol Straker Dance Foundation and, next week, the Venice baroque orchestra Accademia Di San Rocco. This is state-of-the-art culture.

I am both saddened and pleased to be able to report that an insider at the Arts Council has confirmed my understanding that the council concocted the reasons it gave for rejecting the Hackney Empire bid. The true sequence of events—in so far as the Minister's brief from the Arts Council differs, it falsifies the record—is as follows.

A £1.5 million award was made by the Arts Council national lottery panel in October 1996. The purpose of the award was to contribute to the costs of feasibility and design studies to restore and upgrade the Hackney Empire, and to rebuild and add essential facilities. Part of the award was for the purchase of the Samuel Pepys public house. The size of the bid—£28 million—was determined partly by the need to integrate physically three sites and to dig out the basement, and also by the request for first-class architecture from all concerned.

Following European Union procurement procedures, a full design team, headed by a small group of architects, was appointed during July and August 1997 after an exhaustive series of interviews. Hackney Empire management and the design team developed the design brief and began the design process in August 1997, with an agreed deadline for completion to design stage—ready for a planning application—by the end of February 1998, and an agreement to submit an application for full lottery funding by the end of April 1998. Regular contact was maintained with the Arts Council, through written reports, the Arts Council's appointed project monitoring team and face-to-face meetings at the Arts Council offices.

On 17 November 1997, the Arts Council made the strange announcement that capital lottery awards were generally to be limited to £15 million. However, a statement was also made that an additional £200 million was available for

"large scale projects of national or international significance", with a clear inference that the Empire was eligible.

On 21 November 1997, in anticipation of a meeting arranged for the beginning of December, Hackney Empire's chairman wrote to the national lottery director at the Arts Council of England's lottery unit, saying that he was assuming that the Empire would come under the national significance classification and stating that it was essential that the Arts Council's position be made clear at the December meeting.

At no time did officers from the Arts Council state that Hackney Empire could not be considered in the national significance classification. In a meeting at the Arts Council on 11 March 1998, the progress of the project was discussed. Once again, outline costs were given and nobody said that the Empire's bid was too high. The bid was supported by English Heritage, which liked the mix of modern and traditional architecture; the Royal Fine Arts Commission; the Theatres Trust; Sir Ian McKellen; Julie Christie; Griff Rhys Jones, the fundraiser, who had an enormous £7 million in place; Sir Norman Foster; and Sir Jacob Zunz, the engineer for the Sydney opera house, who was so excited by the scheme that he joined the Hackney Empire board. It seems that all those people knew nothing about theatres but that the Arts Council, with its new policy, suddenly did.

The lottery application was submitted to the Arts Council of England on 30 April 1998 and finally discussed by the council on 29 July 1998, in what was reported to be a two-hour meeting that considered more than 130 applications. The bid was rejected. Hackney Empire believed that it was part of a process, starting in October 1996. The approximate project costs were known at an early stage and were reported back to Arts Council officials. The expectation was that the bid would go through if the Empire kept in contact with the officials. Enormous pains were taken to follow the procedures outlined by the Arts Council.

For many reasons—not least its unique audience and its widely acknowledged architectural importance—Hackney Empire continues to believe, as I do, that it is of national significance. If the Empire had made a decision to redraw the scheme to fit into the sudden, arbitrary £15 million limit, it would have been unable to fund the scrapping of the original scheme and the complete rethink that would have been required. In that event, it would undoubtedly have missed the agreed deadline for submission.

Despite all that, the Hackney Empire continues to present approximately 240 events a year in the main theatre, and 380 on the Samuel Pepys site, which currently houses a studio theatre and a small cabaret stage. About 150,000 people use the Empire each year. With the lottery grant, the number of events would rise by between 10 and 15 per cent., with a corresponding increase in audience size.

If the Minister is tempted to plead that he cannot intervene because of the arm's length principle, I remind him that the Secretary of State's finger, thumb, palm and foot prints are to be found all over the ROH fiasco. The arm's length principle is a myth and has been so for more than a decade. I gave a lecture at City university a few weeks ago devoted entirely to that subject.

I beg the Minister to instruct the Arts Council to get together with the Hackney Empire board to discuss a renewed lottery application, and to ensure that the council does not foul up a second time.

I end unashamedly on a personal note. A few weeks ago, Audrey Sedgemore, my ex-wife, almost died at the Hackney Empire. It was a Sunday—an open day—and, with other volunteers, she was showing people around. Suddenly, she fell and fractured her skull, ending up in the intensive therapy unit of the Royal London hospital, helplessly wired up to any number of machines. I am not asking the Secretary of State or the chairman of the Arts Council to die for the Hackney Empire, but I am asking them to produce a rescue plan, for the sake of Audrey Sedgemore and all who love the Empire and for theatre, art and culture in our capital city.

The Minister for Arts (Mr. Alan Howarth): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr. Sedgemore) on securing tonight's Adjournment debate. He has expressed his views with characteristic trenchancy and, as he put it, unashamedly. I wish to address some of the particular issues he raises, but also to look beyond to the wider arts policy scene, which is one of great change and much promise.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch has understandably raised issues on funding for theatres and made a comparison with funding for opera. There has, of course, been much coverage of the latter in recent months. There is much public interest and concern about both theatre and opera, which is as it should be. The Hackney Empire and the Royal Opera house are very different. I do not believe that one either does or should prosper at the expense of the other. The policy of this Government is access to excellence for all: culture as a shared experience, not a divisive one. I would remind my hon. Friend that, although £78 million of lottery money funds have been spent on opera and ballet, £145 million have gone to theatre.

I will speak only briefly about the Royal Opera house. It is essential to find a long-term solution to the problems of the Royal Opera house. The artistic merits of the Royal Opera and Royal Ballet are not in doubt: both are world-class companies. I would add that the Royal Opera house has a highly developed educational programme. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have made it clear that we are wholly committed to securing a proper long-term future for opera and ballet of the highest quality in the redeveloped Royal Opera house. Covent Garden, after its reopening, will be one of the most advanced and exciting venues for lyric theatre anywhere, and will provide the stage for world-class opera and ballet. The redevelopment represents a significant investment from both the public and private purses, and we are committed to securing the future of the ROH.

Unfortunately, standards of financial planning and management at the Royal Opera house have not always in the past matched the high standards of the companies. The financial situation had deteriorated to such an extent that the ROH was on the verge of insolvency this year. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State approved the appointment of Sir Colin Southgate as chairman of the ROH board with a clear mandate to remedy the financial situation, complete the redevelopment, and ensure the long-term artistic and financial success of the ROH. It was clear at that stage that to maintain the status quo was not an option. In September, Sir Colin announced a radical strategy to put the ROH's affairs on a proper footing. My right hon. Friend and I support this strategy.

I deplore, in the strongest possible terms, the aspersions cast by my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch, taking advantage of parliamentary privilege, on Sir Colin, Lord Eatwell, and Mrs. Vivian Duffield, whose generosity to the Royal Opera house and museums and the arts throughout the country deserve admiration and gratitude. The new board and generous donors deserve our appreciation, not abuse.

Of course I understand the disappointment of my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch about the decision by the Arts Council not to fund the proposed redevelopment of the grade 2* Hackney Empire in his constituency. He has rightly praised the theatre for the important role it plays not just in the local community but as a magnet to audiences from outside the borough. Although primarily a receiving house, providing a venue for touring productions, it has, as my hon. Friend noted, been reclaiming a reputation as an important theatre able to combine popular culture with Shakespeare and opera. I admire and welcome the contribution of the Hackney Empire in developing audiences of people for whom the theatre may not have formed part of normal cultural experience and for whom it has been difficult to find such an opportunity. To experience performances at the Empire has, I am sure, been a revelation and a delight for them.

It is not for me to go into details of the application itself. However, I know that the Arts Council took the decision to reject the application with reluctance. Mr. Hewitt has told my hon. Friend that the decision to reject the application was taken on a proper assessment against the published criteria. It should at least be noted that although the Hackney Empire bid failed, Hackney has benefited from lottery funds of £11 million since the lottery began.

The lottery, as the House will acknowledge, has done much to improve Britain's arts infrastructure. We have recognised, however, that it was not sensible to restrict the use of lottery funds to capital projects and to spend money on buildings while the artists that we want to perform in them lack funds. The new National Lottery Act 1998 will change that so that lottery distributors, including the Arts Council, will be able to use lottery funds more strategically. They will be able to fund people as well as buildings, and if particular parts of the country or sectors of the arts world seem not to be sharing in the lottery as much as we would expect, the distributors will be able to solicit applications so that lottery money can go where it is needed and where people up and down the country can benefit from the differences that it makes.

We are changing the lottery for the better. I am pleased to say that an extra £50 million will go to the arts over the next three years or so. That has become possible because the lottery is set to deliver higher levels of income than forecast, which is another testament to its success. We are changing the lottery for the better, and we are changing the relationship between Government and the arts. The new contract with the arts between Government and the bodies that receive public funding, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced in the summer, re-states the arm's-length principle, but makes clear what we expect in return.

In July my right hon. Friend the Chancellor announced spending plans for the next three years. I am delighted that my Department will receive an additional £290 million of which £124 million will go to the arts between 1999 and 2002. That is very good news after years of standstill funding. The arts, and our cultural life in general, have been a political afterthought for too long. The comprehensive spending review places them again at the heart of Government and reflects the central role that all my Department's sectors, including the arts, can play in delivering wider Government priorities. The arts are, of course, important in their own right, but they are also generators of employment and economic growth, a key educational resource and an important way of asserting and enhancing community identity. We want to create a healthy and stable arts sector and to make sure that the arts play their part in advancing our social and economic goals.

The additional funding announced will be linked clearly to outputs, so that the taxpayer can see what the funding is buying. It will allow progress on our principal objectives: the promotion of access for the many, not just the few; the pursuit of excellence and innovation; the nurturing of educational opportunity; and the fostering of the creative industries. Those are the Government's priorities, and the arts are well placed to help us deliver them.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has also announced proposals for revising the structure and mechanisms through which Government support will be channelled in future. The principle of arm's-length funding will remain and Ministers will, rightly I believe, not seek to intervene in individual funding decisions. Equally, it is right that my department should give a clear policy lead in the context of the overall strategy.

In January, Mr. Gerry Robinson was appointed Chairman of the Arts Council with a clear mandate to bring about changes. Mr. Robinson has recently announced his strategy to restructure and redefine the Council's future role, and the Secretary of State and I fully support him in that. I want to put on record my appreciation of the way in which Mr. Peter Hewitt, the chief executive of the Arts Council, has set about addressing the responsibilities entrusted to him.

The Arts Council has already committed itself to delegation. The aim is to devolve as much as possible of what is currently dealt with by the Arts Council to the regional arts boards, including in particular grant-making and stewardship responsibility for regional clients. My hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch may welcome that development, which will enable the new national body to give a strategic lead across all its sectors and to set the framework within which regional bodies operate, taking into account their own local circumstances and priorities. This will of course mean in my hon. Friend's case that responsibility for the Hackney Empire will be devolved to the London Arts Board which already provides its grant-in-aid funding—currently £120,393.

We will be taking steps with the Arts Council to assure ourselves that the regional arts boards have the necessary capacity and systems in place to take on the additional responsibilities required of them.

This is a time of great change in the arts and a time of great opportunities, too. I have been struck by the willingness of the arts community to embrace that change and its determination to make a success of it. The Government share that determination and, in setting out their new approach to the arts, have made clear their belief that the arts have a central role to play in improving the quality of our lives. We look forward to working with, and through, the arts to achieve that.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-five minutes past Ten o'clock.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Church Wardens

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what representations he has received on proposed changes to the role and status of church wardens in the Church of England. [55787]

Mr. Stuart Bell: The Churchwardens' Measure, which has been passed by General Synod, does not, strictly speaking, propose changes to the role or status of churchwardens. I have, however, received representations about the provisions contained in that Measure which would give the bishop power to suspend a churchwarden from exercising the rights and duties of his or her office without the bishop's consent for a limited period. The Measure will be considered by the Ecclesiastical Committee at its next meeting in December.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Nolle Prosequi

Mr. Baker: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the use of nolle prosequi in the case of Judge Richard Gee. [56324]

The Attorney-General: My very firm rule in approaching cases involving persons in senior public positions is to do so with impartiality and objectivity so that the decision is fair in the sense that those concerned are treated no more favourably and no less favourably than any other citizen in the same position.

The charges against Judge Gee related to a mortgage fraud which operated between 1980 and 1988. In essence, the fraud involved false details being provided to lenders, of which the most important was the assertion that the applicant intended to reside in the property to be mortgaged. The effect was that the mortgage rate was lower than it would have been had the lenders known the true position—i.e. that the properties were to be rented. The alleged offences pre-dated the appointment of Richard Gee as a judge. His participation in the transactions was as a solicitor with a conveyancing practice. The prosecution was unable to prove any evidence of personal gain, although his firm would have received professional fees in relation to the conveyancing.

Judge Gee stood trial in the first half of 1998. Prior to that trial, his condition had begun to deteriorate so that the trial judge ordered postponement of the commencement of the trial by 3 months pending treatment to restore him to a position where he was fit to stand trial. The trial itself occupied several months and there then followed a jury deliberation of some 3 weeks—quite unprecedented, I believe, in this country for a case involving only one defendant. As senior prosecuting counsel said at the Central Criminal Court on 7 October 1998, all concerned in the case observed his deterioration in that period.

The initial decision of the prosecution, with which I concurred, was to seek a retrial. The Crown Prosecution Service was, however, asked by the defence to consider medical reports obtained, including one from Professor John Gunn, a distinguished forensic scientist, which concluded that Judge Gee was unfit to stand trial. The prosecution commissioned Dr. Joseph to examine the defendant and prepare a report. He too came to the conclusion that Judge Gee was unfit to stand trial and it was clear that he was not likely to be fit to stand trial in the foreseeable future. It was therefore clear when I met with the Director of Public Prosecutions and prosecuting counsel to discuss the case that, the evidence being all one way, there was effectively no prospect of persuading the trial judge that the case could proceed. We all agreed that the most appropriate course was for me to enter a nolle prosequi because it accorded most closely to the reality of the situation: there was a case which the prosecution would have wished to put forward had the accused been fit to stand trial.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Attorney-General if he will abolish the legal power of nolle prosequi. [56325]

The Attorney-General: No.

PRIME MINISTER

China

Mr. Collins: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he held on the export of United Kingdom defence-related technology or goods during his recent visit to China. [56427]

The Prime Minister: I had no discussions on these issues during my visit to China. However, Premier Zhu Rongji and I reaffirmed our commitment to work towards a much stronger bilateral commercial relationship.

Mr. Collins: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the application of his Government's ethical foreign policy to his recent visit to China. [56426]

The Prime Minister: I believe that dialogue with China on human rights, supported by practical co-operation, is more likely to bring about positive developments than confrontation. In my meetings with Chinese leaders, I welcomed some of the positive steps recently taken by China, such as the signature of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. I also expressed our continuing concerns about human rights in China, referring to the cases of individuals and the situation in Tibet. I encouraged China to take further positive steps in all these areas.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Collins: To ask the Prime Minister when he last travelled on a train operated by (a) Virgin Rail and (b) another United Kingdom train operator; and if he will make a statement. [56424]

The Prime Minister: I last travelled on a train operated by Virgin Rail on 30 July 1998. On 16 July 1998 I travelled on a rail service provided by another train operating company.

Mr. Collins: To ask the Prime Minister on how many occasions since 1 May 1997 he has paid a ministerial visit to (a) the constituency of Sedgefield and (b) capital cities of European Union countries other than the United Kingdom. [56423]

The Prime Minister: Two of my official engagements in the United Kingdom as Prime Minister involved visits to my constituency. I have of course been on other occasions in a constituency capacity. In the course of my programme of overseas engagements I have visited capital cities of EU countries other than the UK on twenty-four occasions.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Grant Applications

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will calculate the average time taken for the completion of grant applications to her Department in 1997–98. [56537]

Clare Short: I understand that this question relates particularly to procedures for the Joint Funding Scheme and Economic and Social Committee on Overseas Research (ESCOR) grants, and have answered on this basis.

The average time taken to complete grant applications to the Joint Funding Scheme is 6 months. All applications to the Joint Funding Scheme must be received by 30 November each year, with decisions being taken when the appraisal of all the project proposals has been completed. Decisions are usually taken in May.

For ESCOR the period between receipt of grant application and a final decision will vary according to the size, type and timing of the application. The decision time normally varies between a few days and eight months. The average decision time for larger projects which go before the ESCOR committee is 5 months. The average time for smaller projects is 3 months.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the procedure for grant applications to her Department. [56536]

Clare Short: I understand that this question relates particularly to procedures for the Joint Funding Scheme and Economic and Social Committee on Overseas Research (ESCOR) grants, and have answered on this basis.

The Joint Funding Scheme operates a single annual funding round. All applications must be received by 30 November each year. Each proposal is considered on its merits and receives careful appraisal; this will often involve lengthy dialogue with applicants. The decision on what projects to support will take place once the appraisal of all project proposals has been completed. Decisions are usually taken in May.

The usual procedure for ESCOR is to submit an outline of the proposed research project, which is reviewed internally. For projects under £40,000, a decision may be made fairly quickly based on the outline and internal review. For larger projects, if the outline is deemed promising, a full application is invited and submitted to either an internal Panel or the ESCOR Committee (for projects over £70,000). Larger projects are subject to refereeing by 2 independent reviewers. The Committee or the Panel, which meet every 4 months, will then take a decision on each application.

Information packs and guidelines on how to make an application under both schemes are available from my Department.

European Communities Humanitarian Office

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the total amount of UK support for the European Communities Humanitarian Office in 1997–98. [56534]

Clare Short: In 1997, the EC Humanitarian Office (ECHO) made available a total of 442 million ecu (£305 million) for humanitarian aid for 85 countries outside the European Union. This funding comes from the main EC budget, of which the UK's share is approximately 15 per cent. Some £46 million of the ECHO funding committed in 1997 is thus attributable to the United Kingdom. Outturn figures for 1998 are not yet available, but are expected to be similar to 1997.

World Trade Organisation

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the role of her Department in the (a) previous and (b) forthcoming rounds of World Trade Organisation talks. [56542]

Clare Short: (a) As the Overseas Development Administration, the Department played a minimal role in previous trade talks—the Uruguay Round—though it kept a watching brief on implications for developing countries.

(b) As we made clear in the White Paper, this Government support an open, fair and sustainable multilateral trading system for the benefit of all countries. The second WTO Ministerial meeting in May 1998 established a preparatory process for a prospective trade round. My officials are actively working within Whitehall and Brussels to ensure that prospective talks take due account of development concerns. At the same time, we are working with multilateral agencies to enhance the capacity of developing countries to articulate and negotiate their own trade interests.

European Union

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of her Department's budget will be paid to the European Union in the current financial year. [56221]

Clare Short: Approximately 30 per cent. of the Department for International Development budget will be paid to the European Union in the current financial year. In 1996–97, the latest year for which an exact figure is available, the percentage was 28.64 per cent. As the hon. Gentleman will be aware these commitments arise largely from the agreement reached by his right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) at the Edinburgh Summit in 1992.

Non-governmental Organisations

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of her Department's budget will be paid to NGOs based (a) in the UK and (b) overseas in the current financial year. [56223]

Clare Short: Information on Department for International Development (DFID) expenditure through UK NGOs in the current financial year is not yet available. Information on such expenditure in 1997–98 is currently being collated and will be available later this year.

The total expenditure through UK NGOs for 1996–97 was £166.757 million; 7.7 per cent. of the total DFID aid budget.

Information on spending through overseas NGOs is not held separately, but is included in DFID's bilateral country programme expenditure. Full details appear in "British Aid Statistics", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Departmental Employees

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many people were employed directly by her Department on (a) 1 September 1997, (b) 1 March 1998 and (c) 1 September 1998. [56222]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development employed directly the following numbers of staff:

September 1997: 989

March 1998: 1,054

June 1998: 1,060[1]

[1] Latest available figures. Statistics are compiled quarterly, those for September 1998 are still being established

These figures do not include staff employed on contract terms both in the UK and overseas.

Sudan

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made of the impact of the work of (a) non-Government organisations and (b) Operation Lifeline Sudan following the bombing of Khartoum in August 1998. [56540]

Clare Short: Our judgment is that the bombing of Khartoum in August 1998 had no long term effect on either non-government organisations (NGOs) or Operation Lifeline Sudan (OLS). UK based Embassy staff were temporarily withdrawn from Khartoum on 27 August but some senior staff have relocated to Nairobi in order to continue monitoring the performance of OLS and NGOs in the field.

In addition, officials from my Department visited Sudan and Kenya from 13–27 September. They were able to visit the worst affected areas in Sudan, including those controlled by the Government and the rebel movements and monitored NGO activities there. They also participated in an EU mission to the region which reviewed the adequacy of the relief response to date including the performance of the OLS consortium. The mission found that from mid-July onwards the humanitarian response began to match the scale of the crisis in southern Sudan. This has contributed to the improvement in the condition of some of the worst affected groups there.

WALES

Deeside Industrial Park (Rail Station)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with (a) Railtrack and (b) local authorities concerning the construction of a rail station on Deeside Industrial Park; and if he will make a statement. [56494]

Mr. Hain: I have not had any discussions with Railtrack about the construction of a new railway station on Deeside Industrial Park. However, as part of the 1998–99 Transport Grant settlement, £480,000 was allocated to Flintshire County Council in support of the Deeside Integrated Transport Strategy. Part of this award is for the Council to develop plans for a railway station to serve the Deeside Industrial Park. I am currently considering a bid from the Council for further funding of the Strategy in 1999–2000.

River Wye Navigation Rights

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects the results of the inquiry into the River Wye navigation rights to be announced; and if he will make a statement. [56440]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: An announcement will be made as soon as possible. The issues involved in the case are complex and require detailed consideration.

Community Council Elections

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the date of the ordinary elections to community councils in Wales in 1999. [56675]

Mr. Ron Davies: I propose to make an order under section 3(4) of the Government of Wales Act 1998 to move the date of ordinary elections of community councillors in Wales from 6 May to 10 June 1999. The community council elections will be held on the same date as the European Parliamentary elections, with which they will be combined. The order will also make provision for moving the date of the annual meeting of councils.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Olympic Games

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what support he has given to efforts to attract a future Olympic Games to the United Kingdom. [56030]

Mr. Banks: The British Olympic Association, who have ultimate responsibility for UK bids for the Olympic Games, have decided that the next UK bid should be London-based. Like the BOA, the Government are determined that any bid should be of the highest possible quality. My Department is already working closely with the BOA who are conducting comprehensive studies on what is already in place and what needs to be in place to mount a winnable bid at the earliest possible opportunity.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Driving Test Centres

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to close driving test centres during the next two years; and if he will list the centres concerned. [55528]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Driving Standards Agency continuously reviews its test centres in the light of operational viability, the local demand for driving tests and the costs of using a particular centre. Before a closure, a case is considered on its merits, and wherever possible there is consultation with interested parties. The provision of car driving, and, where appropriate, motorcycle tests in the following locations is currently being reviewed:

Minehead; Edinburgh (Newington); Coventry (Holyhead Road); Didsbury (South Manchester); Rochdale; Birmingham (Washwood Heath): Oswestry; Wealdstone; Crosby; Keighley and Skipton; Sevenoaks and Tunbridge Wells; and Stafford.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the driving test centres which made a loss in the last year for which figures are available together with the amount of loss made. [55529]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information is not available as driving test centres are not operated as separate profit centres.

Pollution

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will assess the recommendations of the report published on 1 September by the Independent World Commission on the Oceans, relating to environmental protection and pollution prevention. [55443]

Mr. Meale: The recommendations of the Independent World Commission on the Oceans report published on 1 September 1998 are still being considered by my Department.

Bus Company Pensions

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government will refund to the Bus Pension Fund of the former National Bus Company the pension surplus withheld at the time of privatisation; if payment of funds will be made so that bus company pensioners can be paid without further delay; and if compensation will be paid to the families of those bus company pensioners who have died since privatisation. [55796]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Discussions with the NBC pension trustees have already begun with the aim of reaching as quickly as possible, a just, out-of-court settlement of the trustees' claim for return of the surplus. If a settlement is achieved, which the Government very much hope will be the case, it will be for the trustees to decide how the moneys paid pursuant to that settlement should be distributed among all eligible beneficiaries.

Standard Spending Assessments

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list those measures which reflect the additional costs from seasonal influxes of population contained within local authority grant settlements; and if he will make a statement. [55714]

Ms Armstrong: Estimates of day visitors and overnight visitors are used in the calculation of standard spending assessments.

Lisbon Charter

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the Lisbon Charter on the development and implementation of economic instruments for the protection of the marine and coastal environment by local governments dated July 1998; and if he will make a statement. [55713]

Mr. Meale: The Lisbon 'Charter' on the development and implementation of economic instruments for the protection of the marine and coastal environment by local governments was adopted by a group of representatives of local and regional authorities from various European states during a conference organised by a non-governmental organisation in Lisbon on 1 July 1998. It contains some interesting ideas. It is for those who adopted the document to take it forward.

Rents

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list market and reference rents by district from 1996. [55718]

Mr. Raynsford: The available information is published in table 1.0 of the Department's quarterly publication Rent Officer Statistics. Copies are held in the Library.

Council Tax

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his proposals for the council tax discounts on second homes in England. [55720]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government do not have any proposals to change the council tax discount for second homes in England during the course of this Parliament.

Diabetic Drivers

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent representations he has received about driving licence restrictions on insulin-dependent diabetics; and if he will make a statement. [55715]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In the light of representations by individuals and their representatives, and further advice by the Department's expert Panel, the previous restriction was relaxed to allow certain drivers with insulin treated diabetes to regain or renew their entitlement to drive 3.5—7.5 tonne lorries for employment, subject to stringent conditions. This took effect on 11 September. The Department continues to receive representations from individuals and others who would like further relaxations. At present the Department's expert advice precludes this. The situation will continue to be kept under review.

Environmental Integration

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to implement the Cardiff Summit Ministerial Declaration on environmental integration; what indicators he is developing for measuring progress; and if he will raise these matters during the forthcoming Energy and Transport Council of Ministers meetings. [55779]

Mr. Meale: During our recent Presidency of the EU the Government established a co-ordinating group of representatives from the European Commission and the three succeeding Presidencies—Austria, Germany and Finland—to help guide the process of environmental integration in EU policy-making up to 2000. This initiative has now been passed to the Austrian Presidency. UK officials continue to take an active role in this forum which is taking forward the development strategies within the various sectoral Councils. This will ensure that environmental integration and sustainable development are taken fully into account within those respective policy areas. The use of indicators is being considered as part of this process.

To meet the terms of the agreement at the Cardiff European Council we are working with the Austrian Presidency in the preparation of the report which the Transport Council will consider at the end of November. My Department is similarly working with the Department of Trade and Industry in support of a Presidency report on environment/energy policy for discussion at the Energy Council on 13 November. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is also taking a positive role in the report being prepared on agriculture/environment for the Agriculture Council. All reports will be submitted to the European Council in Vienna.

In the UK we are developing a national sustainable development strategy which we expect to publish early in 1999. This will be accompanied by a set of indicators covering, inter alia, transport, energy and agriculture. We are also contributing to the development of a transport and environment report mechanism which will establish a set of indicators at the European level.

Polegate Bypass

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the total compensation paid, or agreed to be paid, to date to contractors in respect of the Polegate Bypass scheme. [55828]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The overall levels of compensation are still being discussed with the companies who submitted tenders for the cancelled Weald and Downland DBFO Project, which included the Polegate Bypass. Interim on-account payments totalling £2.5m have been made.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to ensure that local authorities promote awareness of the millennium bug in their local communities. [55794]

Ms Armstrong: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister and Sir Jeremy Beecham, Chair of the Local Government Association, wrote jointly on 30 March to all council leaders to invite them to make a personal commitment to address millennium bug issues, both within their own councils and more widely across their local communities. They wrote again on 20 October inviting council leaders to sign Pledge 2000 as a public demonstration of their council's commitment to tackle the threat posed by the millennium bug.

Greater London Assembly

Mr. Fitzpatrick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the location chosen to house the Mayor and Greater London Assembly will be ready on time for the elections expected in May 2000. [56049]

Mr. Raynsford: We expect to make a final decision on the location of the Greater London Authority early in the New Year and only then will it be clear when it will be completed. We are making arrangements to provide temporary accommodation, should it be required.

A49 (Accidents)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many deaths were recorded arising from road traffic accidents on the A49 between Hereford and Ross on Wye in each of the last five years. [56033]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested is shown in the table.

Deaths in RTAs on the A49 between Hereford and Ross on Wye: 1993–1997

	Casualties
Year	Fatalities
1994	0
1995	3
1996	3
1997	0

Planning Policy

Mr. Lepper: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to review and revise PPG 6 and PPG 13; and what is the timescale for such proposals. [56262]

Mr. Raynsford: I expect to publish a consultation draft of PPG 13 on transport early next year. I have no immediate plans to revise PPG 6 on town centre and retail developments.

Building Regulations

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what is his planned timetable for the regulations which will extend Part M of the building regulations to new dwellings; [55861]

(2) when his Department will announce the transitional provisions to cover the period before and following the extension of Part M of the building regulations to new dwellings. [55862]

Mr. Raynsford [holding answer 22 October 1998]: I have today laid before Parliament—and published—Amendment Regulations that will extend Part M of the Building Regulations, covering access and facilities for disabled people, to include new dwellings. These regulations include transitional provisions. The effect of the regulations is that, from 25 October 1999, new homes will have to be built with features that make them better suited to the needs of disabled people. People will be able to invite disabled people to visit them in their own homes; and home owners will be able to remain in their own homes longer as they become less mobile as they get older.

The benefits of these changes will be very considerable—potentially more than 10 million people will benefit. In particular there will be direct benefits of increased convenience, accessibility and sociability for disabled people. The measures will also help significantly those people who are temporarily disabled through accident or injury and those with young children in prams and pushchairs.

The extension of Part M complements this Government's commitment to implement the remaining duties of Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. Part III will improve disabled people's access to goods and services and Part M will ensure better access to new dwellings. It is better and more cost effective for new homes to be designed and built with proper facilities—as already happens with new public and commercial buildings—than to rely on later piecemeal adjustments.

Private Hire Vehicles

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects the regulations under the Private Hire Vehicles (London) Act 1998 to be in place. [56261]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We intend to make regulations to enable private hire vehicle operator licensing to commence in London during the course of next year. Vehicle and driver licensing would follow as soon as practicable—it is hoped during the year 2000. Swift implementation of the Act is desirable; it is also important that we get the details right and allow sufficient time for consultation.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the impact of the Single Regeneration Budget on the business support expenditure of the TECs in each of the last three years. [56058]

Mr. Meale: There is no relationship between the public expenditure provision for the Single Regeneration Budget (SRB) in the last three years and that for Training and Enterprise Councils (TECs).

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many HSE inspectors inspect facilities registered under the regulations covering the contained use of genetically modified organisms. [56327]

Mr. Meacher: Three HSE Specialist Inspectors inspect contained use facilities throughout the UK. These Inspectors are experts in work involving genetic modification, and specifically cover biological safety and environmental issues. Other HSE Inspectors have responsibility for health and safety issues not related to work involving genetic modification.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the total number of facilities registered as using genetically modified organisms in classes IA, IB, IIB including those registered (a) before and (b) after the introduction of the contained use regulations in 1992. [56329]

Mr. Meacher: I regret that I am unable to supply the information in the form requested. Prior to the introduction of the contained use regulations work was not broken down into group I/II or type A/B. A meaningful comparison would require extensive work in searching old files at disproportionate cost.

However, I can supply information on the number of facilities notified for Group I and II work. The number of premises currently notified, including those notified prior to the current Contained Use Regulations, is 275 for Group I work and 196 for Group II work. Furthermore, 34 of these premises have notified, at some time, their intention of performing large scale work.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the HSE undertakes regular monitoring of the adequacy of containment in each class of genetically modified organisms; and if the findings are publicly available. [56331]

Mr. Meacher: HSE inspects premises undertaking activities with all types of genetically modified organisms. The monitoring of the adequacy of containment is an integral part of each HSE inspection. Effective containment relies on a combination of both physical and procedural measures, and the inspection process seeks to ensure that the control measures implemented are appropriate to the level of risk.

Information relating to environmental safety is available on request under the terms of the Environmental Information Regulations 1992.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many person hours per year HSE inspectors spend on (a) inspection of facilities registered under the regulations covering the contained use of genetically modified organisms and (b) other duties. [56328]

Mr. Meacher: In the current inspection year:

(a) A total of 1,665 person hours (225 days) are planned for active inspection of facilities registered under regulations covering contained use of genetically modified organisms.
and;

(b) A total of 2,686 person hours (363 days) will be spent on other duties related to the safe use of genetically modified organisms, including preparation of technical guidance and scrutiny of notifications.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he intends to establish the environmental stakeholders forum; what will be the membership; what the terms of reference will be; whether the agendas and minutes will be published; and if he will make a statement. [56655]

Mr. Meacher: At the House of Lords Select Committee on 21 October I announced my intention to consider the calls from both sides of the GMO debate for an environmental stakeholder's forum to discuss and advise on environmental issues raised by biotechnology which would work in parallel with the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment. The timing, membership and the terms of reference have not yet been decided, and I will be discussing these with my colleagues in other Government Departments, before consulting all interested parties on our proposals.

I envisage that this forum's membership would include representatives of conservation bodies, public interest groups, plant breeders and farmers. The terms of reference of the forum need to be clarified, but I envisage that the point of the stakeholder's forum would be to tackle the wider environmental issues by allowing those key stakeholders with an interest in GMOs to conduct a well informed debate. It is very important that there is wide public access to agendas, minutes and reports.

Rail Authority

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he proposes to create a strategic rail authority. [56323]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister announced on 30 September that a shadow Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) would lead changes to the way the privatised railway is controlled, in advance of legislation to establish the body on a statutory basis. The shadow SRA, formed by close working between the British Railways Board and the Franchising Director, will be operational by Spring 1999.

A new Chairman of the British Railways Board and a new Franchising Director will be appointed as soon as possible. Subject to legislation, the new BR Chairman and board will become the chairman and board members of the SRA. Following legislation, the new Franchising Director will become Chief Executive of the SRA.

We are committed to establishing a statutory SRA at an early opportunity.

China

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 906, if he raised the issue of the environmental impact of the Chinese Government's activities in Tibet during his recent visit to China. [56351]

Mr. Prescott: No.

Railways (Rural Lines)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he intends to take to increase the minimum train frequencies for rural lines where he deems that franchise agreements specify these at too low a level. [56322]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Changes to service levels are a matter for the Franchising Director. The Deputy Prime Minister has said that he and the Franchising Director are ready to renegotiate franchises to secure a progressive improvement in services, extra investment, and integration with other transport modes. In addition, we have made available new funds under the rail Passenger Partnership scheme which the Franchising Director can use to support new services. Revised criteria for appraising proposals for supporting new services will be published shortly.

Signposting (London)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the Mayor of London will be given (a) a specific responsibility and (b) a specific budget for the signposting of London's roads and streets. [56425]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We shall be defining a network of the most important roads in London for which the Greater London Authority will be the traffic authority. The Authority will therefore have power to place traffic signs in relation to those roads. The Government will not set the Mayor a specific budget for traffic signs. Spending on traffic signs in relation to the Authority's roads will be met from the transport budget set by the Mayor.

Planning Consent (Cumbria)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he proposes to call in the planning consent granted by South Lakeland District Council to Booth's Ltd. to build a supermarket at Kirkby Lonsdale, Cumbria. [56468]

Mr. Raynsford: I am considering the application and will make my decision as soon as possible.

EC Bus Directive

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received concerning the EC bus directive from bus operating companies; and if he will make a statement. [56301]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Coach and Passenger Transport Executive Group, which represents bus and coach operators in the UK, has made many representations, and continues to be consulted on the EC Commission proposal for a bus and coach Directive. The proposal is for an optional Directive concerning the Type Approval of new vehicles. The Government's aims, which are based as well on consultation with manufacturing industry, are concerned with maintaining the viability and safety of bus and coach operation. This policy must also reflect the UK's commitment to accessibility, as required under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995, which will also have a significant influence on future bus design.

Soap and Detergent Industry

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the Soap and Detergent Industry Association's new Code of Good Environmental Practice; and if it will receive Government support. [56299]

Mr. Meale: This is a welcome initiative, which fits well with the Government's aim to reduce the environmental impacts of consumer products through practical measures which assist "market transformation" and could form a valuable component of a sectoral sustainability strategy. We have already had discussions with the Soap and Detergent Industry Association about how we can work together to support this initiative through links to our wider public awareness campaigns and to our strategic analysis of environmental impacts. In particular, we are looking with the Soap and Detergent Industry Association at possible links between my Department's "Are You Doing Your Bit?" promotional campaign and the industry's "Wash Right" campaign.

Double-decker Buses

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards proposals in the EC Commission to make the manufacture of double-decker buses uneconomic or illegal. [56300]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I do not know of any such proposals. However, the Commission has proposed a directive on bus and coach construction which is now the subject of detailed discussion by the Member States. My Department has consulted widely with organisations such as the Coach and Passenger Transport Executive Group, which represents bus and coach operators in the UK, and the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, which represents the major UK manufacturing interests. The representations from these organisations are being taken into consideration in the current negotiations.

Roads White Paper

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the start date for each of the road schemes given approval in the Roads White Paper. [56303]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We are currently considering the construction programme for the schemes included in our Targeted Programme of Improvements listed in "A New Deal for Trunk Roads". However, subject only to any outstanding statutory procedures, all schemes will start within the next seven years.

Hereford Bypass

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has over the next four years to include the cancelled Hereford By-pass in the roads programme; and if he will make a statement. [56451]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. Under the new arrangements for transport planning set out in "A New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone" the measures that may be appropriate for Hereford are for consideration in the development of the Local Transport Plan and the draft Regional Transport Strategy.

Planning Procedures

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the average time for processing called-in planning inspector appeals between receipt of the inspector's findings and publication by the Minister's Department. [56638]

Mr. Raynsford: In the last full year for which information is available, 1 April 1997 to 31 March 1998, the average time in England to issue decisions on called-in planning applications and recovered planning appeals from receipt of the Inspector's report was 18½ weeks.

Northbrook College, Worthing

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the current status of the findings of the Inspector's inquiry into a planning application for the development of the Northbrook College site in Broadwater, Worthing, where the appeal was heard in January. [56637]

Mr. Raynsford: The Inspector's report is still being considered. We expect to issue a decision shortly.

Sellafield

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to order a full public inquiry in relation to the application for a MOX plant at Sellafield. [56286]

Mr. Meale: We expect to receive the Agency's draft determination very shortly. Requests have been received for the Secretary of State to call in the application for his own determination. These requests are under careful consideration and the Secretary of State will reach a decision as soon as he is able to do so.

Freight

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the potential change in level of take up of freight facilities grant if the contract period were reduced to a period of (a) five and (b) three years. [56631]

Ms Glenda Jackson: 19 out of the 27 Freight Facilities Grants awarded in 1997 and 1998 have been for a period of five years or less. The number of applications has greatly increased and the £30 million budget for 1997–98 was substantially taken up. The budget for 1998–99 is £40 million, reflecting the recent success of the scheme.

Driving Tests

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the income from car driving tests for each of the last five years for which figures are available. [56411]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The fee income from car driving tests for the years 1993–94 through to 1997–98 was as follows:

Year	Fee income
1993–94	38,980,000
1994–95	42,529,000
1995–96	44,997,000
1996–97	46,744,000
1997–98	37,858,000

DEFENCE

Turkey (Arms Sales)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the military equipment and its estimated value, whose sale to Turkey in the last five years has been assisted by his Department. [55617]

Mr. Spellar: The assistance provided by the Ministry of Defence to British industry is given within the context of the Government's defence export policies. The criteria for export controls were announced to Parliament by the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29. Much of the assistance is general in nature and we do not maintain detailed records of cases where MOD assistance has resulted in defence exports to individual countries and it would involve disproportionate cost to assemble information for Turkey. According to data provided by HM Customs and Excise, however, the total value of UK exports to Turkey recorded under HM Customs and Excise Tariff Codes relating to military equipment has averaged some £14 million annually over the past five years.

Royal Navy Experimental Radiation Treatment

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on Royal Navy experimental radiation treatment for civilian divers. [55368]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Royal Navy has never carried out experimental radiation treatment on civilian divers. Imaging techniques, involving low doses of short lived radio-active isotopes have been used as part of clinical investigations to determine whether any brain damage had occurred as a result of various diseases including decompression illness. Similar techniques have been in common use for many years in the nuclear medicine departments of NHS hospitals throughout the country.

Defence Nuclear Biological and Chemical Centre

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he received the land quality assessment in respect of fields next to the Defence Nuclear Chemical and Biological Centre at Winterbourne Gunner; and if he will make a statement. [54919]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 19 October 1998]: The first phase of the Land Quality Assessment for fields close to the Defence Nuclear Biological and Chemical Centre at Winterbourne Gunner was completed in September 1998. Draft conclusions have been made available to my Department and the final report on the first phase is expected soon. I have written to the hon. Member about the clearance operation at Winterbourne Gunner.

Territorial Army

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to close the TA unit in Winchester. [56507]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Decisions on the restructuring of the Territorial Army, and on the future of individual TA units and centres, have not yet been taken. I will write to the hon. Member when they are.

Nuclear Materials

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) of 31 July 1998, Official Report, column 725, what are the proposed future defence purposes to which the nuclear material recovered from WE177 warheads will be put. [55442]

Mr. George Robertson: Plutonium and Highly Enriched Uranium recovered from dismantled weapons will be held against requirements arising from our nuclear warhead and propulsion programmes.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what factors underlay his decision to withhold details of the costs of the fuelling of Trident submarine reactors and of the costs of importing highly enriched uranium for the fabrication of nuclear fuel rods for the submarine propulsion reactors. [55415]

Mr. George Robertson: The information requested on the costs of the fuelling of Trident submarine reactors could, when combined with other data already in the public domain, provide nuclear proliferators and potential opponents with an insight into the design and performance of the United Kingdom's nuclear powered submarines. This would harm UK national security and defence and, therefore, is being withheld under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information relating to defence, security and international relations. However, reflecting the new openness on nuclear matters that I announced in the Strategic Defence Review, I am prepared to confirm that the most recent procurement of highly enriched uranium for Defence purposes was made at a rate of $40m per tonne.

Sudan (Pharmaceutical Plant)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information was provided to Her Majesty's Government by the United States Administration concerning evidence of the production of chemicals useable in the manufacture of chemical weapons at the pharmaceutical plant in Sudan, bombed by the United States forces; and what steps he has taken to verify the information provided. [55420]

Mr. George Robertson: I am withholding any such information under exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will send officials from the chemical and biological weapons establishment at Porton Down to inspect the site of the Sudanese pharmaceutical factory. [55438]

Mr. George Robertson: No. We continue to encourage Sudan to accede to the Chemical Weapons Convention, which would entail an inspection programme for all relevant sites.

Courts Martial

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) Royal Air Force officers and (b) other ranks have been (i) dismissed from the service and (ii) court-martialled in each of the last five years. [55808]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Dismissal from the RAF can be awarded only by courts martial. The table shows the number of RAF personnel convicted by courts martial and the number sentenced to be dismissed over the last 5 years.

	Convictions by Courts Martial[1]		Dismissed
Year	Officers	Other ranks	Officers	Other ranks
1993	3	102	2	42
1994	2	71	1	28
1995	3	83	1	32
1996	4	60	2	19
1997	4	24	1	10
1998[2]	2	41	0	12

[1] The figures do not include cases where a sentence of dismissal awarded by the Court was subsequently mitigated or quashed
[2] Up to 20 October 1998

Radiation Exposure (Submarines)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many claims his Department has received from former civilian personnel arising from exposure to radiation while engaging with Royal Navy submarines. [55813]

Mr. Spellar: Information on claims for compensation received by my Department from former civilian employees alleging exposure to radiation while working on Royal Navy submarines has only been held centrally since 23 October 1986. Records show that, as at 21 October 1998, ninety-three claims for compensation had been received from former Ministry of Defence civilian employees.

RAF Pilots

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many RAF personnel are currently undergoing training to become pilots. [55817]

Mr. Doug Henderson: As at 1 October, a total of 434 RAF personnel were undergoing training to become pilots. In addition, there are a further 421 student pilots who are undertaking elementary flying training, as members of the University Air Squadrons, but these individuals are not on the payroll strength of the RAF.

Nuclear Costs

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 30 July 1998, Official Report, column 453, how much, in net real terms, the UK will pay the USA for nuclear spares and services which it will not need or cannot use. [55799]

Mr. George Robertson: The net amount the UK will pay the US for nuclear spares and services we do not now require will depend on the quantity of Trident missile components that the US buy back in future years. As I said in July, we expect it to amount to some £40 million. Over half of this results from commitments made before this Government took office. The decision is, however, expected to save in the region of £50 million.

A copy of the Memorandum of Understanding covering the arrangement with the US for the buy back of missile components has been placed in the Library of the House.

Army Personnel (Medical Retirement)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Army personnel have left the service on health grounds in each of the last five years. [56062]

Mr. Doug Henderson: As at 21 October 1998, the following number of Army personnel (including Gurkhas) have been medically discharged since 1993:

Year	Medical discharges
1993	836
1994	958
1995	1,103
1996	1,186
1997	1,046
1998 (as at 21 October 1998)	624

Note:
The figures do not include Army personnel who have died in service, or personnel leaving as a result of pregnancy.

Chemical Stockpiles

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what stockpiles are held of the chemical Dibenz-1,4-Oxazepine; on which sites; and for what purpose. [56354]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Dibenz-1,4-oxazepine, better known as CR, is a sensory irritant which causes temporary incapacitation. The MOD currently has approximately 260kg of CR. Some stocks are held by those units responsible for maintaining an effective counter terrorist response capability and the rest is at DERA, Porton Down for research purposes.

British Aerospace (Merger)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the strategic and procurement implications of a merger between British Aerospace and DASA; and if he will make a statement. [56421]

Mr. George Robertson: The Government have encouraged defence and aerospace companies to restructure but have always made it clear that it is for Industry to decide how to do so. Should British Aerospace and DASA propose a merger at some stage in the future it would then be subject to the normal regulatory process, to which the MOD would be asked to contribute advice in confidence.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Outer Space Act Fees

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons the Government have increased to £6,500 the prescribed fee payable on an application for a licence under its Outer Space Act 1986. [55971]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 22 October 1998]: The Outer Space Act fee was originally set at £1,000 per licence application in 1989 and has remained at that level until now. The complexity and frequency of licence applications have increased since 1989 and the fee has been increased to reflect the cost to the Government of processing each application. Companies which are regularly involved in activities regulated by the Act were consulted and I am confident that their competitive position will not be affected by this increase. The fees do not apply to educational institutions carrying out activities for teaching or research purposes.

Post Office

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact on (a) the viability of sub-post offices and (b) village economies of state pensions being paid directly into bank or building society accounts; and if he will make a statement. [55745]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The Department has made no such assessment but I can confirm that the Government remain committed to the maintenance of a nation-wide network of post offices and to a secure, convenient and cost-effective method of payment for all benefit recipients.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he has to improve (a) Post Office and (b) Royal Mail (i) efficiency and (ii) levels of service. [55820]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Any changes from the existing arrangements for improving the efficiency and quality of postal services will be announced in the context of the Government's decisions on the review of the Post Office.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the proportion of gross revenue (a) from the Post Office and (b) from the Royal Mail which goes directly to the Exchequer. [55822]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The External Finance Limit (EFL) target for 1997–98, achieved by the Post Office, was £313 million and represented 72 per cent. of post tax profits. The EFL relates to the Post Office as a whole and is not apportioned among its constituent businesses. In addition, the Post Office pays corporation tax on its profits.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what studies his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on postal services in other EU countries with particular reference to the effects of (i) total and (ii) partial privatisation. [55821]

Mr. Ian McCartney: My Department has not commissioned any specific studies of this kind. My officials have regular and frequent contact with their opposite numbers in other EU countries and beyond, and have considerable knowledge of postal structures and services in those countries, which has been reinforced with further material gathered in the course of the Post Office Review.

Patents

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry under what circumstances patents granted by the European Patent Office have the legal effect of United Kingdom patents. [56353]

Dr. Howells: The European Patent Convention, to which the United Kingdom is a party, provides that the grant by the European Patent Office of a European Patent has the equivalent legal effect to a national patent in those States which have been designated by the applicant. The Convention allows each Member State to require that, before a European Patent has legal effect in its territory, a translation into an official language of that country must be provided. Along with all the other Member States, the UK requires such a translation.

Civil Aviation Research and Technology

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about the future of the CARAD programme. [56478]

Mr. Battle: No decisions have yet been made about detailed DTI budget allocations in future years.

Working Time Directive

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the cost to the charitable sector of compliance with the provisions of the Working Time Directive, for (a) employed staff and (b) volunteers. [56480]

Mr. Ian McCartney: There was no specific assessment of the cost to the charitable sector. An assessment for the whole of British industry was made, a copy of which is held in the Library of the House.

Ariane 5 Evolution Programme

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans his Department has to contribute to the Ariane 5 Evolution Programme. [55382]

Mr. Battle: The Department of Trade and Industry has no current plans to contribute to the Ariane 5 Evolution Programme.

Space Plan

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans the Government have to update the United Kingdom Space Plan of 1996; and if he will make a statement on United Kingdom participation in future launcher activities. [55373]

Mr. Battle: A new United Kingdom Space Plan, which will address, among other topics, the United Kingdom's participation in future launcher activities is in the process of being prepared.

When the Space Plan is completed it will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Anti-microbial Disinfectants

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will take steps to ban the use of anti-microbial disinfectants, impregnated mattresses and similar household goods. [56172]

Dr. Howells: I have no plans to ban these products. Anti-microbial disinfectants are within scope of the recently adopted Biocidal Products Directive which will introduce a European harmonised authorisation scheme for such products A central aim of the directive, which is to be implemented in member States by May 2000, is to ensure a high level of protection for people and the environment.

EU Structural Funds

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the criteria for determining future qualification for assisted area status; and if he will make a statement. [55699]

Mrs. Roche: On 30 July 1998, Official Report, columns 563–64, I launched a 3 month period of public consultation on the criteria and the geographical units which should be used in drawing up the new Assisted Areas map. The consultation period finishes on 30 October and we shall listen carefully to views expressed. No decisions have yet been taken on the criteria to be used.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what studies his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the structural economic problems of British seaside resorts. [55708]

Mrs. Roche: The Department has not commissioned any studies of the structural economic problems of British seaside resorts. However, the special needs of these areas will be taken into consideration during the current review of the Assisted Areas.

Digital Television

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the likely increase in carbon dioxide emissions resulting from the introduction of digital television. [56194]

Mrs. Roche: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Blaneau Gwent (Mr. Smith) on 20 March 1998, Official Report, column 763.

New Deal

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people his Department is committed to employing during 1998 under (a) the subsidised job option and (b) the unsubsidised job option of the New Deal programme. [52581]

Dr. Howells: I have asked Chief Executives of my Department's Agencies to reply direct to my hon. Friend.

The headquarters area of the Department is planning to provide places as part of the New Deal programme later in the new year, under the subsidised job option.

Letter from John Holden to Mr. John Healey, dated 26 October 1998:

In response to your Parliamentary Question concerning employment under the New Deal programme, Companies House has no current firm plans to employ anyone under either the subsidised or the unsubsidised option.

Letter from P. R. S. Hartnack to Mr. John Healey, dated 26 October 1998:

I am replying for the Patent Office to your question to the President of the Board of Trade about the New Deal programme.

The Patent Office expects to employ twenty people this calendar year under the programme. Eleven young people joined us on 13 July 1998 under the subsidised job option and we hope one more will join us soon. We expect to fill eight places under the unsubsidised job option towards the end of next month or in early September.

Letter from Peter Joyce to Mr. John Healey, dated 26 October 1998:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply to your question about how many people The Insolvency Service is committed to employing during this calendar year under (a) the subsidised job option and (b) the unsubsidised job option of the New Deal programme.

The Insolvency Service will recruit at least two New Deal employees (subsidised) this calendar year.

Letter from Dr. Seton Bennett to Mr. John Healey, dated 26 October 1998:

The President of the Board of Trade has asked me to reply on behalf of the National Weights and Measures Laboratory to your question about the number of people NWML are committed to employ during this calendar year under (a) the subsidised job option and (b) the unsubsidised job option of the New Deal programme.

The National Weights and Measures Laboratory employs 50 staff and at present there are no plans to employ anyone under the terms of the New Deal programme in this Agency.

Letter from Ian Jones to Mr. John Healey, dated 26 October 1998:

I have been asked to reply in respect of the Employment Tribunals Service to your question of 23 July 1998 to the President of the Board of Trade asking how many people we will be employing under the New Deal programme.

The Agency has not committed itself to specific targets but will consider employing New Deal applicants should it be necessary to recruit externally in the future. At present we have restrictions in place on recruitment in some parts of the country because of the fall in numbers of tribunal applications.

CABINET OFFICE

Biotechnology and Genetic Modification Group

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when he intends to establish the ministerial group on biotechnology and genetic modification; what will be the membership; what the terms of reference will be; whether the agendas and minutes will be published; and if he will make a statement. [56654]

Mr. Kilfoyle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke) on 21 October 1998, Official Report, columns 1123–35, which set out the composition and terms of reference of the Ministerial committees and groups established to date, including the Committee on biotechnology and genetic modification. In line with the practice of successive Governments the proceedings of Cabinet Committees are not normally made public.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Pensioners

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the median weekly income excluding means-tested benefits of (a) single male pensioners, (b) single female pensioners and (c) married pensioners who are aged (i) 60 to 64, (ii) 65 to 69, (iii) 70 to 74, (iv) 75 to 79 and (v) 80 years or above, in each of the years for which the pensioner income series has been constructed, and in 1974. [55637]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 19 October 1998]: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is set out in the tables.

Pensioner units' median gross income excluding means-tested benefits, by age

1994–95	n/a	208	185	181	174
1995–96	n/a	235	198	170	158

Notes:

1. All amounts are in £s per week at July 1995 prices. They are rounded to the nearest £1, although estimates are not necessarily accurate to this level

2. All figures, and in particular figures for single male pensioners, should be treated with caution since they are based on small sample sizes

3. Estimates are for pensioner units. A pensioner unit is defined as a single (non-cohabiting) person over State Pension Age (65 years or above for men and 60 years or above for women), or a couple (married or cohabiting) where the man, defined as the head, is over State Pension Age. Estimates for pensioner couples are broken down by the age of the man

4. Estimates marked 'n/a' are not applicable. Single men and couples are only defined as pensioners if the man is aged 65 years or above

5. All estimates relate to calendar years, except the combined calendar years 1990–91 and the financial years 1994–95 and 1995–96

6. Means-tested benefits are defined as Income Support (Supplementary Benefit prior to 1988), Family Credit (Family Income Support prior to 1988), Council Tax Benefit (from 1993), Community Charge Benefit (from 1988 to 1992) and Housing Benefit

The Pensioners' Incomes Series dataset, based on the Family Expenditure Survey

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the basic pension rate for a single person in 1999–2000 if it had been uprated in line with average earnings (a) in each year since 1980, (b) in 1998 and 1999 and (c) in 1999 only. [56013]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is currently not available. In order to answer this question we need to know the increase both in the Retail Prices Index and in average earnings for the year to September 1998. While the former is available, the latter will not be available until mid December.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his current estimate of the proportion of pensioners entitled to income support who claim it; and what will be the corresponding proportion by the end of the year 2001–02 if take-up rises as assumed in his answer of 29 July 1998, Official Report, column 326. [56015]

Mr. Denham: Take-up of income support by pensioners is currently estimated to be between 61 per cent. and 70 per cent., measured by caseload. For costing purposes, we have assumed that take-up arising from the measures announced as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review will increase by about 13 percentage points by the end of 2001–02.

Note:

Estimates of current take-up are taken from Income Related Benefits Estimates of Take-Up in 1996/97. Estimates of future take-up have been based upon Income Support forecasts following the changes announced as part of the Comprehensive Spending Review, and information from the 1995/96 Family Resources Survey.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in which countries (a) United Kingdom state pensioners receive an increase in payments in line with United Kingdom residents and (b) no increases are paid. [55803]

Mr. Denham: United Kingdom State pensioners resident abroad receive pension increases in line with United Kingdom residents in countries with whom we have agreements. These are members of the European Economic Area (EEA), Barbados, Bermuda, The Channel Islands, Cyprus, Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, Israel, Jamaica, Malta, Mauritius, Philippines, Republic of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Republic of Croatia, Republic of Slovenia, Switzerland, Turkey and the USA.

United Kingdom pensioners in any other country do not receive increases.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many British citizens received United Kingdom state pensions in (a) the EU, (b) the Commonwealth and (c) other countries in the last year for which figures are available. [56064]

Mr. Denham: The number of pensioners in receipt of a United Kingdom State Pension living in (a) the EU, (b) the Commonwealth, and (c) other countries is (a) 204,150 (b) 476,701 (c) 162,640.

Mortgage Interest

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much of the income support budget is spent annually on meeting interest payments on mortgages. [55653]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

	1996–97	1997–98
Expenditure on Income Support Mortgage Interest Payments (£ million)	670	500
Overall Income Support Expenditure (£ million)	14,445	11,995
Percentage of overall Income Support Expenditure spent on Mortgage Interest Payments	4.6	4.2

Notes:

1. Estimates of annual expenditure on Income Support Mortgage Interest payments are based on 5 per cent. sample data taken from the Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiries: May 1996 to February 1998. Estimates are based on amounts of housing requirements payable to claimants with mortgage interest payments, and will therefore include amounts for ground rent and other miscellaneous housing costs, although the majority of the amount is paid for mortgage interest. This provides a more accurate reflection of the help actually provided to claimants under the housing cost rules

2. Figures for overall expenditure are consistent with those set out in the Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR) White Paper published by the Government on 14 July 1998. The figure for 1997–98 is an estimated outturn. The actual outturn expenditure figure will be available later this year

3. Unemployed claimants receiving Income Support transferred to Income Based Jobseeker's Allowance with effect from October 1996. Figures for 1996–97 include expenditure on Income Support cases up to this date. Estimated expenditure on Jobseeker's Allowance mortgage interest for the rest of 1996–97 is £99 million. Estimated annual expenditure for the year 1997–98 is £144 million

4. Expenditure figures are rounded to the nearest £5 million.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received on extending the range of mortgage interest rates to include former building societies not converted to banks for the calculation of support with mortgage interest payments; and if he will make a statement. [55703]

Angela Eagle: Information relating only to former building societies that have converted to banks is not available. We have received 16 representations from hon. Members, members of the public and national organisations concerning the inclusion of bank mortgage interest rates when calculating benefit entitlement.

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people currently receive support from his Department towards their mortgage interest payments. [55705]

Angela Eagle: In November 1997 there were approximately 351,000 people receiving help with mortgage interest payments. This is the latest available information.

Benefit Rates

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he has, in the current tax year, carried out the review of benefit rates required by section 150(1) of the Social Security Administration Act 1992; [56012]

(2) what decisions he has taken regarding the rates of benefit payable from April 1999; and when the Treasury was informed of those decisions. [56014]

Angela Eagle: We expect to announce the results of our review shortly. Officials in the Department and the Treasury have regular contact on this matter and many others.

Widow's Benefit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will ensure that widowed mother's allowance, including the increases for children, is uprated in line with prices in 1999. [56018]

Angela Eagle: The rates of all benefits, including Widowed Mother's Allowance, Child Dependency Increases and Child Benefit, are reviewed annually.

From next April, in addition to normal uprating, the standard rate of Child Benefit for an eldest child will be increased by an extra £2.50 a week.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the combined value of child dependency addition and child benefit for the child of a widowed mother (a) in cash terms, (b) in real terms and (c) as a percentage of average earnings in November 1979 and at each subsequent uprating date. [56017]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the tables.

Benefits Expenditure

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his Department's current forecast for spending on social security benefits in (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02. [56087]

Mr. Darling: The latest published forecasts of the Department's benefit expenditure for the years 1999–2000 to 2001–02 are set out in the White Paper "Modernising Public Services for Britain: Investing in Reform" (Cm 4011), table 20.1.

Notes:

1. The average earnings of full time adult employees was calculated using the New Earnings Survey and Average Earnings Index, both produced by the Office for National Statistics.

2. The Retail Prices Index (all items) was used to put Child Benefit and Widowed Mother's Allowance child dependency addition into real terms as at April 1998. This was then compared with the provisional average earnings for April 1998 to give the percentage quoted.

Housing Benefit Fraud

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to revise the draft guidance on weekly benefit savings after abandonment of a property following the publication of the notes Accommodation Related Fraud, with particular reference to the section indicating that fraud would be considered to arise if a tenant in receipt of housing benefit failed to report that they had moved. [55741]

Mr. Denham: Officials are currently working with representatives of the local authority associations to prepare revised guidance on the claiming of weekly benefit savings by local authorities. This guidance will be issued to authorities at the beginning of November.

In the particular example cited, a 75 per cent. weekly benefit saving would be appropriate where, as a result of a fraud investigation, a tenant was found to be not resident.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to allow weekly benefit savings claims if, on inquiry by an officer of a local authority, a claimant for housing benefit admits that they have omitted to provide the correct details or given incorrect details in circumstances where a designated fraud officer subsequently investigates the reason for omission and concludes that fraud was intended. [55744]

Mr. Denham: It is already the case that a weekly benefit saving can be claimed if, as a result of a fraud investigation, fraud is discovered, the Housing Benefit claim is stopped and a fraudulent overpayment occurs.

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the expected contribution by the Treasury to the National Insurance Fund for each year from 1998–99 to 2001–02. [55789]

Mr. Timms: No Treasury Grant to the National Insurance Fund is required for 1998–1999. The amounts of Grant that may be required for 1999–2000 and subsequent years will depend on decisions about the rates of the benefits paid out of the Fund and the rates and thresholds for National Insurance contributions for those years. Estimates of the Grant needed in 1999–2000 will be shown in the Report by the Government Actuary on the drafts of the Social Security Benefits Up-rating Order 1999 and the Social Security (Contributions) (Re-rating and National Insurance Fund Payments) Order 1999 which will be laid before Parliament in due course.

Pension Payments

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to increase the number of occasions each year whereby a state retirement pension can be paid from a post office other than the one designated. [56158]

Mr. Denham: There are no plans to increase the number of occasions each year that a Retirement Pension can be encashed away from a person's nominated post office.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many higher-rate tax payers are currently in receipt of Disability Living Allowance; and what is the estimated total cost of these awards. [56075]

Mr. Timms: The latest estimate is that there are around 10,000 higher rate taxpayers currently in receipt of Disability Living Allowance. This is based on survey information and is subject to a margin of error. An estimate of the total cost of these awards is not available; however, if the average receipt reflects that for Disability Living Allowance recipients as a whole, the cost will be in the region of £25 million for this year.

Pensions

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of Serps payments by his Department to contracted out pension schemes have been paid late in 1998 to date; and what is the average length of late payment. [56636]

Mr. Timms: By 1 November 1998 we will have paid about 27 per cent. of the age-related rebates we expect to make for the 1997–98 tax year. Many payments are going to be made later than this date and to reflect the delay in these payments an actuarial adjustment will be made.

Payments made at the beginning of November will be increased by 0.5 per cent. Payments will be increased by a further 0.5 per cent for each subsequent month until the expected level of payment is reached.

The average length of delay on the 1 November 1998 is one month for all cases not yet paid.

Benefits Agency

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average time taken by the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency to provide a substantive reply to letters from hon. Members writing on behalf of constituents. [55949]

Angela Eagle: This is a matter for Peter Mathison, the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Mark Fisher to Mr. David Winnick, dated 22 October 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking, what is the average time taken by the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency to provide a substantive reply to letters from hon. Members writing on behalf of constituents. As Mr. Mathison is away from the office I am replying.

The Agency aims to reply to 80 per cent. of correspondence within 20 working days. However, the average time taken to reply to letters over the last three months has been 21.78 working days. This is too long but it is due to the volume of correspondence the Agency has been receiving. Correspondence has increased by 35 per cent. over the first six months of this financial year, compared with the same period last year. Additional resources have been put in place to clear the cases faster and we fully expect an improvement in the next few weeks.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Winter Fuel Payments

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of pensioner households entitled to winter fuel payments for winter 1997–98 who have not yet been paid in full; and if he will make a statement. [55856]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Winter Fuel Payments is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Christopher Chope, dated 22 October 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what is his estimate of the number of pensioner households entitled to Winter Fuel Payments for winter 1997–98 who have not yet been paid in full.

The making of Winter Fuel Payments to almost 10 million pensioners, in over seven million households, before the end of March 1998 has been a challenging task for the Benefits Agency (BA). This was achieved whilst maintaining normal benefit business.

In excess of 9.76 million Winter Fuel Payments were made automatically by 31 March 1998. Based on official records all eligible pensioners have been issued with a payment. However, it is likely that a small number of customers have not yet been paid because the original girocheque was not cashed, or customers have not yet queried their entitlement. It is not possible to estimate how many of these cases are outstanding. If, however any eligible pensioner feels that they are entitled to an initial or further payment, they should apply to the BA for a review of their entitlement.

Thank you for the opportunity to explain the position.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Railways

Mr. Forsythe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has to expand the railway system in Northern Ireland. [55660]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Minister with responsibility for the Environment, Lord Dubs, gave approval on 7 August 1998 to the upgrading, and re-opening, of the Antrim to Bleach Green line for passenger traffic. There are no further plans to expand the railway system.

Human Rights Commission

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information she has received from the Government of the Republic of Ireland concerning the introduction of legislation in the Republic to fulfil the equality and human rights issues of the Good Friday Agreement. [55629]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Irish Government have confirmed that they will be introducing legislation to establish a Human Rights Commission with the aim of setting up the Commission in February 1999. The Framework Convention on National Minorities is expected to be ratified by Christmas. Work on the compatibility with the ECHR is being conducted by an All-Party Oireachtas Committee.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what representations from Irish Americans she received concerning the power of the proposed Human Rights Commission to initiate investigations and compel the attendance of witnesses; and in which cities and from which groups. [55630]

Mr. Paul Murphy: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has recently returned from a tour of 11 cities in the US. The focus of the tour was to promote inward investment in Northern Ireland; the powers of the proposed Human Rights Commission were not raised.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions she has had with the UN High Commission on Human Rights on the equality and human rights provisions of the Northern Ireland Bill; to what extent the Commission expressed its view that the provisions (a) met the criteria and (b) fell short of the criteria of the Principles on the Status of National Institutions (The Paris Principles) as extended by subsequent United Nations' workshops. [55633]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Officials from the Northern Ireland Office have held one meeting with officials from the UN High Commission on Human Rights as part of the Government's consultations with interested organisations and political parties on the human rights provisions of the Northern Ireland Bill. These consultations were exploratory and it would not be appropriate for me to go into detail about what was discussed.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions she has had with the Human Rights Directorate of the Council of Europe concerning the contents of the human rights and equality provisions of the Northern Ireland Bill, indicating those areas which the Directorate asked to be strengthened to enable the Human Rights Commission to initiate inquiries and compel the attendance of witnesses. [55634]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I have not had any discussions with the Council of Europe about the human rights and equality provisions of the Northern Ireland Bill. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received a letter dated 19 October from the Secretary General of the Council of Europe. The letter does not specifically ask for any of the parts of the Bill to be strengthened.

Homefirst Community Trust

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if the Social Services Inspectorate report into the case of Frederick McLernon will be taken into account in determining performance-related bonuses for senior management of Homefirst Community Trust. [56284]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Social Services Inspectorate report into the case of Frederick McLernon acknowledged that good community care policies and procedural guidelines are in place in Homefirst Community Trust but identified a number of deficiencies in the way his case was handled.

Decisions on performance-related bonuses for Senior Management in Trusts are still a matter for Trust Remuneration committees and Trust Boards but I would expect the findings of the report to be considered by Homefirst Community Trust's Board in deciding performance-related bonuses in 1998–99.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost of the production and distribution of the new Homefirst Community Trust (a) diary and (b) report. [56285]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The term "diary" is a generic description of a publication which includes not only a diary but also a copy of the Trust's annual report, a handbook for staff and a Homefirst telephone directory. The cost of production and distribution of the new diary to each of the 4,800 staff in the Trust was £21,886.50.

It is not possible to calculate separately the cost of the annual report section of the diary, as it was printed as part of the complete project. However, in order to comply with the statutory requirement to publish its annual report, the Trust made arrangements to reproduce separately that section of the diary containing its annual report. This was distributed to interested bodies and organisations at a cost of £168.

TREASURY

British Household Panel Survey

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 928, by what means hon. Members may obtain tabulations of data from the British Household Panel Survey which they themselves have specified. [56443]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Steve Webb, dated 26 October 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent pursuant parliamentary question on the British Household Panel Survey.

As I said in my previous reply, the British Household Panel Survey (BHPS) is funded by the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC) and conducted by the Institute for Social and Economic Research (formerly the ESRC Research Centre on Micro-social Change).

Specific tabulations from the BHPS are available directly from the Institute for Social and Economic Research (telephone number 01206 872957). Payment may be due for production of specific analyses.

Average Earnings

Mr. Caplin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action he plans to take to investigate the circumstances behind the two revisions to the average earnings figures released by the Office for National Statistics on 6 October and 14 October and to assess whether best practice is being employed in compiling this series. [56990]

Mr. Gordon Brown: I have written to my hon. Friend the Member for North Durham (Mr. Radice) as Chairman of the Treasury Committee setting out our plans to investigate the circumstances behind the two revisions to the average earnings figures released by the Office for National Statistics on 6 October and 14 October. A copy of my letter has been placed in the Library of the House.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the errors made by the Office for National Statistics in the July Earnings Data. [56243]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has today given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Caplin).

Cross-border Smuggling and Shopping

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the (a) retail value and (b) excise duty content of (i) alcohol products and (ii) tobacco products subject to (1) cross-border smuggling and (2) cross-border shopping for each year from 1995. [55728]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 22 October 1998]: HM Customs and Excise estimates of the retail value and the tax content (excise duty and VAT) through cross-border shopping in 1995 and 1996 and cross-Channel smuggling of alcohol and tobacco products in 1996 and 1997 are set out in the tables:

Table 1—Retail value and tax content of cross-border shopping
£ million

Product type	Retail value	Excise duty	VAT	1995 Total	Retail value	Excise duty	VAT	1996 Total
Alcohol	360	165	75	240	375	175	75	255
Tobacco	65	40	10	50	60	35	10	45
Total	430	205	85	290	435	210	85	300

Note:
Amount actually lost to the Exchequer is less (totals £230 million in 1995 and £235 million in 1996) because not all purchases in other EU states replace similar purchases in the UK

Table 2—Retail value and tax content of cross-Channel smuggling
£ million

Product type	Retail value	Excise duty	VAT	1996 Total	Retail value	Excise duty	VAT	1997 Total
Alcohol	525	180	80	260	580	180	85	260
Tobacco	875	510	130	640	915	550	135	690
Total	1,400	690	210	900	1,490	730	220	950

Notes:
Amount actually lost to the Exchequer is less (totals £835 million in 1996 and £885 million in 1997) because not all purchases in other EU states replace similar purchases in the UK
Figures in both tables have been independently rounded to £5 million. Components may not therefore sum to the totals shown

The estimates exclude any amounts for revenue lost on alcoholic drinks and tobacco products involved in diversion-type fraud, and smuggling in freight consignments or by air passengers. Customs and Excise have not published any estimates for the extent of these activities. Similarly, there were no official estimates for the extent of smuggling prior to 1996.

Interest Rates

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his policy as regards making statements about the UK interest rate levels. [55843]

Mr. Gordon Brown [holding answer 22 October 1998]: The inflation target is set by the Government. Month by month interest rate decisions are a matter for the Monetary Policy Committee.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the international agreement to reduce interest rates will be implemented (a) in the EU and (b) in Great Britain. [56162]

Ms Hewitt: The Finance Ministers and Central Bank Governors of the G7 keep in regular contact. Their statement of October 3 reaffirmed the key importance of each country in the global economy doing its part to promote recovery and financial stability. Countries face different circumstances, but several have been able to cut interest rates recently, including the USA (twice), Canada, and the UK.

Dividend Income Taxation

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Paymaster General will make a statement on the payment of tax on dividend income by low income pensioners. [56219]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government have this under consideration and will make an announcement as soon as they are in a position to do so.

Fuel Duty (School Transport)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will extend eligibility for fuel duty rebate to buses and coaches on private hire engaged in transporting children to and from school; and if he will make a statement. [56366]

Ms Hewitt: Schools services are eligible for Fuel Duty Rebate provided that they are registered as a local service with the local Traffic Commissioner and meet all the criteria of the rebate scheme, in particular that the services are available to all members of the general public. Any change in these long-standing principles, extending rebate to additional services, would entail either extra expenditure or a lower rebate overall; there are no current plans for such an extension.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Chope: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what amount of vehicle excise duty will be payable from 1 January 1999 for (a) a 40 tonne vehicle on five axles and (b) a 41 tonne vehicle on six axles; and if he will make a statement. [56365]

Ms Hewitt: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has already announced that he is reviewing the system for setting Vehicle Excise Duty (VED) rates for lorries to ensure that the environmental damage caused by lorries is reflected in their VED rates. The review is taking into account the wider environmental impacts of lorries, as well as considerations of their physical effects on the road infrastructure. In the meantime, the VED payable from 1 January 1999 for these vehicles will be the current rates of £3,210 and £1,280 respectively.

Tax Evasion

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures the Government plan to introduce to combat tax evasion. [55978]

Dawn Primarolo: A key element of the Government's aim to create a fair tax system is making sure that people pay the right amount of tax at the right time. An example of their commitment to deal with tax evasion is the new Construction Industry Scheme which will commence on 1 August 1999. Under the new scheme, only those subcontractors whose turnover is above a prescribed level and who have complied with their tax obligations on time will be entitled to gross payment for work. All other subcontractors will have to produce a registration card in order to be paid, and deductions from their pay will be made on account of tax and Class 4 National Insurance Contributions.

National Savings

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to ensure that national savings products comply with the CAT standard mark being applied to certain ISA products. [56635]

Ms Hewitt: The CAT standard is a voluntary set of requirements designed specifically for the new Individual Savings Account. Their purpose is to support savings through ISAs by encouraging minimum standards for charges, access and terms.

There is no intention that the CAT standards should apply to other forms of savings, whether those savings are provided by National Savings or anyone else. There is a huge range of savings products catering for many different needs. Many National Savings products are Bond or Certificate products which are mainly lump sum investments at fixed rates. It is wholly inappropriate to compare the CAT standards designed for cash ISAs against such products.

I am pleased to be able to confirm that National Savings plan to introduce a new savings account specifically for inclusion within an ISA which they fully expect will meet the CAT standards.

Sustainable Debt

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to abide by the sustainable debt rule over the current planning period. [56077]

Ms Hewitt: As stated in the Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report (Cm 3978), the sustainable investment rule ensures that net public debt as a proportion of GDP will be held over the economic cycle at a stable and prudent level.

Fiscal Policy

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are his current operating rules for fiscal policy. [56081]

Ms Hewitt: The Government's operating rules for fiscal policy, as set out in the Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report, are:

The golden rule—over the economic cycle the Government will borrow only to invest and not to fund current expenditure.

The sustainable investment rule—net public debt as a proportion of national income will be held over the economic cycle at a stable and prudent level.

Departmental Forecasts

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list his Department's current estimates for public sector net wealth for (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02; [56091]

(2) what are his current estimates of the cyclically adjusted budget balances in respect of the (a) current budget and (b) public sector net borrowing; [56080]

(3) what is his current estimate of the financing requirement for 1998–99. [56082]

Ms Hewitt: The latest estimates will be published in the Pre-Budget Report on 3 November.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his Department's current revised forecast for (a) output growth, (b) the GDP deflator and (c) money GDP for each of the years (i) 1998, (ii) 1999, (iii) 2000 and (iv) 2001; [56079]

(2) what is his Department's current forecast for the savings ratio arising from his revised growth forecast; [56092]

(3) what is his Department's current forecast for (a) output growth, (b) the GDP deflator and (c) money GDP for each of the financial years (i) 1998–99, (ii) 1999–2000, (iii) 2000–01 and (iv) 2001–02; [56089]

(4) what assessment he has made of the reasons for the differences between the Treasury forecast for growth and recent published forecasts of independent forecasters. [56093]

Ms Hewitt: New economic forecasts will be published as part of the Pre-Budget Report on 3 November.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list his current estimates for general Government gross debt in cash terms for each month from April 1997 to the current date. [56090]

Ms Hewitt: There are no monthly data available.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a revised Economic and Fiscal Strategy report to take account of the latest revisions to growth forecasts. [56084]

Ms Hewitt: The Chancellor of the Exchequer will publish a revised set of forecasts in the Pre-Budget Report on 3 November.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is his Department's current forecast for (a) net public sector debt and (b) general Government gross debt, in (i) 1999–2000, (ii) 2000–01 and (iii) 2001–02; [56083]

(2) what are his Department's current forecasts for (a) income tax receipts, (b) excise duties and (c) social security contributions, in (i) 1999–2000, (ii) 2000–01 and (iii) 2001–02; [56088]

(3) what are his Department's current forecasts for (a) current receipts, (b) current expenditure and (c) the current surplus or deficit in (a) 1999–2000, (ii) 2000–01 and (iii) 2001–02; [56085]

(4) what is his Department's current forecast for central Government gross debt interest in (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02; [56086]

(5) what is his Department's current forecast for (a) public sector net borrowing and (b) the Maastricht deficit measure, in (i) 1999–2000, (ii) 2000–01 and (iii) 2001–02. [56076]

Ms Hewitt: A new forecast of the public finances will be published in the Pre-Budget Report on 3 November.

Golden Rule

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if it is his policy to abide by the golden rule over the current planning period. [56078]

Ms Hewitt: As stated in the Economic and Fiscal Strategy Report (Cm 3978), the golden rule ensures that, over the economic cycle, the government will borrow only to invest and not to fund current expenditure.

Air Passenger Duty

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has received notice from DGVII of the European Commission regarding infraction proceedings being instituted against the United Kingdom over the current system of air passenger duty; what plans he has to reform the current system of air passenger duty to conform with European law; and if he will rule out extending air passenger duty to cover both the outward and inward legs of return domestic flights. [56026]

Dawn Primarolo: The European Commission has challenged the current exemption from air passenger duty that applies to the return leg of a return journey within the United Kingdom. We are considering how to respond. This will take some time and I do not expect to make any announcement before the Budget. Until then I am not prepared to speculate on what the outcome may be.

Charities

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to publish his proposals arising from his review of the taxation of charities. [56309]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government received over 3,000 replies in the first phase of the review and are determined to consider carefully all the options before launching the next phase. We intend to publish a Consultation Document as soon as possible.

Child Benefit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to use all of the proceeds from taxing child benefit at the higher rate for increases in child benefit. [56452]

Dawn Primarolo: This Government believe that every child deserves the best possible start in life. In the Budget we took action to help achieve this through the largest ever cash increases in Child Benefit (and allowances in income-related benefits), and by increasing income-related allowances for children under eleven. As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made clear in his Budget speech on 17 March 1998, Official Report, columns 1097–1112, if Child Benefit is raised in future, there is a case in principle for higher rate tax payers paying tax on it.

Tax Credits (Child Care)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if expenditure on registered childcare by a non-employed taxpayer will be eligible for a tax credit under the proposed working families tax credit. [56455]

Dawn Primarolo: The Working Families Tax Credit (WFTC) will be paid to families with at least one member working 16 hours a week or more. The childcare tax credit, which is an integral part of the WFTC, will provide extra help with the costs of eligible childcare where both partners work these hours, or where the child's parent is on their own.

VAT

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many additional small businesses would become liable for VAT if the (a) registration threshold and (b) registration threshold for businesses in the service sector were set at (i) 0, (ii) £10,000, (iii) £20,000, (iv) £30,000 and (v) £40,000; and how much extra revenue would be raised as a result in each case. [56461]

Dawn Primarolo: Reducing the VAT registration threshold to nil is estimated to yield around £100 million. The other information is not available.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when he intends to publish the outcome of the review of the VAT registration threshold; and if he will make a statement; [56466]

(2) how many representations have been received in response to the consultation document Review of VAT Registration Threshold; and if he will make a statement. [56469]

Dawn Primarolo: As at 22 October 1998, 212 representations had been received in response to the consultation document. These representations are currently being analysed and evaluated by Customs. A report on the results will be published in due course.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what rate of VAT is levied on the supply of sporting facilities by non-profit making organisations in each member state of the European Union. [56470]

Dawn Primarolo: In accordance with European law, supplies of sporting facilities by non-profit making organisations are exempt from VAT.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the loss of revenue from avoidance of VAT by those supplying sporting facilities. [56471]

Dawn Primarolo: The annual revenue loss is estimated at £5 million. If unchecked, the total loss could rise to £20 million.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the revenue which would be raised if the supply of sporting facilities by non-profit making organisations were made subject to VAT at the standard rate. [56472]

Dawn Primarolo: If VAT were to be charged at the standard rate of 17.5 per cent. on the supply of sporting facilities by non-profit making organisations, estimated annual revenue yield would be some £40 million.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he intends to reintroduce the VAT (Sports, Sports Competitions and Physical Education) Order 1998; and if he will make a statement. [56459]

Dawn Primarolo: An announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Merchant Vessels

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received concerning the liability under EU legislation of owners of British-registered merchant vessels for corporation tax on a tonnage basis; what estimate he has made of the impact on the Exchequer of changing to such a system; and what information he has collated concerning the practice of Governments of other member states in this respect. [55690]

Dawn Primarolo: We have received representations from various sources about a tonnage-based tax system for shipping. We do not have a confirmed estimate of the cost of introducing such a system to the UK. We understand that some other European states such as Greece, Norway and the Netherlands operate tonnage-based tax systems.

Gaming Machines

Mr. Amess: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many letters of objection he has received to the increase on gaming machine licensing duty. [55784]

Dawn Primarolo: Between 18 March 1998 and 20 October the Chancellor received 86 letters which objected to the increases made to Amusement Machine Licence Duty in the last Budget.

National Insurance

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received regarding the extension of income tax relief to the part of employees' national insurance contributions relating to SERPS; and if he will make a statement. [55790]

Dawn Primarolo: We have received only one representation suggesting that income tax relief be extended to the part of employees' national insurance contributions relating to SERPS. This will be considered along with the other representations we have received on the future of pension provision.

Age Concern (VAT)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reason Customs and Excise ruled that value added tax must be charged by Age Concern Essex to those receiving the home support service; when the ruling was implemented; and if he will give an instruction that VAT should not be levied. [55800]

Dawn Primarolo: Welfare services (including care provided to elderly people) have been VAT exempt when supplied by charities on a not-for-profit basis since 1986. Customs' interpretation of the application of VAT legislation is that household chores or errands do not qualify for VAT exemption unless they are provided as an incidental part of a package of medical or personal care. This ruling was given to Age Concern Essex on 24 August 1998, to be effective from that date. Customs are now reviewing their interpretation of the exemption for charity welfare services following a recent decision of the VAT and Duties Tribunal.

Exchange Rate

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the percentage change in (a) the nominal trade-weighted exchange rate and (b) the real effective exchange rate since (i) 1 May 1997 and (ii) Britain left the ERM. [56346]

Ms Hewitt: Relevant data are set out in the table. The real effective exchange rates are calculated by the OECD, and are produced only on a monthly basis, using relative movements in consumer prices.

	Nominal trade-weighted index	Real effective exchange rate
Levels:
August 1992	100.8	102.7
April 1997	99.5	98.1
August 1998	104.6	108.5
Percentage changes:
August 1992-August 1998	3.8	5.6
April 1997-August 1998	5.1	10.6

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate his Department has made of the current purchasing power parity exchange rate for sterling vis-a-vis (a) the US dollar and (b) the Deutschmark. [56244]

Ms Hewitt: Neither HM Treasury nor the Office for National Statistics produce such estimates. The OECD produces estimates of purchasing power parity exchange rates for the purpose of comparing GDP in different countries. These can be found in the monthly OECD publication "Main Economic Indicators" but they would not be appropriate for other purposes, such as assessing the competitiveness of tradeable goods.

Premium Bonds

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will reduce to £25 the lower limit for purchase of premium bonds. [56149]

Ms Hewitt: The minimum purchase for Premium Bonds was increased to £100 from £10 on 1 July 1989 because of the need to reduce the cost of administering the Premium Bonds scheme. Since that time, customer demand suggests that the £100 level is acceptable to the majority of purchasers, with the average purchase currently over £1,500. We do not therefore anticipate changing this minimum purchase limit.

Revised Growth Forecast

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his Department's revised forecast for growth in (a) 1999, (b) 2000 and (c) 2001. [55846]

Ms Hewitt: New forecasts for growth will be published on 3 November as part of the Pre-Budget Report. These will take account of developments since the Budget forecast was published in March.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Comprehensive Spending Review

9. Mr. Tom King: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from police representatives about the outcome of the comprehensive spending review. [53516]

Mr. Straw: I have received 29 representations about the allocation of funding following the Comprehensive Spending Review but none so far about the overall total for the police. Under the Comprehensive Spending Review an extra £1.24 billion will be made available to the police service in England and Wales over the next three years. Part of the additional funding for the second and third years will be dependent on the police achieving targets for efficiency improvements of 2 per cent. a year. Police representatives are being consulted about the guidance to be issued.

Mentally Disordered Offenders

21. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement concerning support for victims of mentally disordered offenders. [53530]

Mr. George Howarth: The Government are committed to improving the level of support and information provided to the victims of crimes committed by people with mental disorders.

For example, the Department of Health is preparing a leaflet, for victims and their families, outlining the care and discharge arrangements for mentally disordered offenders.

Crime Statistics

22. Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about current trends in (a) conviction rates and (b) crime rates. [53531]

Mr. Michael: The likelihood of an offender being convicted rose in 1997, and the use of cautions has declined. Comparing recorded crime with the number of defendants found guilty for indictable offences shows that in 1985 there was one defendant found guilty for every eight crimes. This rose to 18 crimes per defendant in 1993 but in 1997 dropped to 14 per defendant.

The latest Notifiable Offences Bulletin, covering April 1997 to March 1998, shows the fifth consecutive fall in crimes recorded by the police. This continuing downward trend is confirmed by the findings of the 1998 British Crime Survey, which gives a count of crime that includes crimes not reported to the police and those not recorded. This shows a fall between 1995 and 1997 in nearly all of the offence types it measures. This is the first time, since 1981, that the survey has recorded an overall fall.

Police Performance Rates

23. Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evaluation he undertakes of the relative performance of different police forces. [53532]

Mr. Michael: The Home Secretary considers the relative performance of different police forces by looking at their performance against his key policing objectives and the key performance indicators which support them, and against a wider range of performance indicators on which the Audit Commission, and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary collect data.

The success of the police in reducing crime in their area, together with performance against local targets set within the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 will be of increasing importance.

HMIC reports to the Home Secretary on the efficiency and effectiveness of police forces in England and Wales. The Inspectorate's Thematic reports, which consider the performance of a range of police forces in matters of current and public interest, are of increasing importance and usefulness.

25. Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the measures he uses to monitor and assess the performance of police authorities. [53534]

Mr. Michael: The current structure of police authorities was introduced by the previous Government in 1995. There is no formal provision for monitoring and assessing the overall performance of police authorities, but I meet the Association of Police Authorities regularly to discuss such issues. The performance of police forces themselves is monitored by a number of methods, including Audit Commission and Inspectorate of Constabulary indicators and formal inspections. The Government intend to introduce a statutory duty on local authorities to provide efficient, effective and high quality services to the public and to demonstrate that they are doing so. That duty will also apply to police authorities and will be in place from April 2000.

Crime Prevention

24. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the role of uniformed local authority patrols in crime prevention. [53533]

Mr. Michael: Intelligent use of patrol is an important part of the police function. Community schemes, including uniformed local authority patrols, can make a welcome contribution to community safety as a complement to, not a substitute for, the work of the police. Use of a distinctive uniform or dress code can help public confidence, provided it is recognised that the public must be able clearly to identify who is a uniformed constable and who is not.

Crime Detection

26. Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to promote DNA technology for crime detection. [53535]

Mr. Michael: The police are already making extensive use of DNA technology which is one of the biggest advances in solving crime. The Forensic Science Service leads the world in pioneering new DNA techniques and is working closely with the police to ensure that the technology is used effectively in crime detection. We are encouraging that work.

WRVS

27. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the chairman of the Women's Royal Voluntary Service to discuss its work. [53536]

Mr. Michael: I last met the Chairman and Members of the Council of the Women's Royal Voluntary Service (WRVS) on 26 June. My right hon. Friend and I are kept regularly informed of the work of WRVS by officials and I have used the opportunity of Volunteer Week to join WRVS volunteers in action as a way of recognising and celebrating their work.

Magistrates Courts

28. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what account he takes when allocating police funding of additional costs incurred following closures of magistrates courts. [53537]

Mr. Michael: Police funding is allocated by means of a needs-based formula which does not take into account the location or closure of magistrates' courts. To date, the police service has not sought to include such considerations as relevant factors in the funding formula. From time to time many police forces face additional costs which cannot be reflected in the formula. The Police and Magistrates' Courts Act 1994 placed on the Chief Constable the responsibility to determine the allocation of resources to meet the force's obligations, including any necessary adjustments to deployment as a result of changes in requirements for the attendance of officers at Court.

WPC Fletcher

29. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made by Scotland Yard in the case of the murder of WPC Fletcher, since the hon. Member for Linlithgow made an official visit to Assistant Commissioner David Veness. [53538]

Mr. Straw: The police review of the evidence surrounding the murder of Woman Police Constable Fletcher, which currently involves extensive overseas inquiries, is continuing. I understand from the Metropolitan Police that their inquiries are nearing completion. I expect to receive a report as soon as it is practicable after the police inquiries are completed.

Police (Greater Manchester)

30. Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on resources available to police in Greater Manchester in the forthcoming financial year. [53539]

Mr. Michael: On 21 July 1998, Official Report, column 915, my right hon. Friend announced that the police service in England and Wales will receive an additional £1.24 billion over three years from 1999–2000. Our plans allow for police expenditure to increase by 2.65 per cent. next year. No final decisions have been taken about the allocation of funding to individual police authorities for 1999–2000. We expect to announce provisional allocations towards the end of the year.

Police Funding

31. Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consideration is given when allocating funding to the costs of policing areas of the country that attract seasonal inflows of temporary visitors; and if he will make a statement. [53540]

Mr. Michael: Police grant is allocated by means of a formula which predicts police authorities' relative need to spend. The formula takes account of both the resident and daytime population in a force's area. Daytime population comprises resident population, commuters, and estimates of the numbers of overnight visitors and day visitors.

Prison Education

32. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to improve prison education. [53541]

Mr. George Howarth: The Prison Service has taken a number of steps to improve prison education. It has developed a new education policy to support the Government's wider policies aimed at improving basic and key skills. The new measures should achieve significant improvements in levels of literacy and numeracy among prisoners over the next three years.

Young Offenders

33. Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in halving the time between arrest and sentencing for young offenders. [53543]

Mr. Michael: The Government have asked all youth courts to set up fast tracking schemes for persistent young offenders. In the last 12 months the number of fast track schemes has grown from 12 to 160 in operation or planned in England and Wales. The scheme for all young offenders in North Hampshire has shown what can be achieved by cutting the average time taken from arrest to sentence from an average of 133 days to 61 days. This month we have introduced new monitoring arrangements and set demanding performance targets for all stages of proceedings up to and after trial and for all agencies. The Crime and Disorder Act 1998 includes provisions to help courts to manage cases more quickly and effectively. Several measures, based on recommendations in the Narey review, are currently being piloted and the Act will enable statutory time limits to be set in cases involving young offenders.

Policing (Shire Counties)

34. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to provide greater resources for policing in shire counties. [53544]

Mr. Michael: Resources for the police are allocated by means of a needs-based formula. I have commissioned separate external research into the relative costs of policing sparsely populated rural areas and densely populated urban areas. The results of this research will be available by the time decisions are taken on the police funding settlement for 2000–01.

Police (Disciplinary Procedures)

35. Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had about reforming police disciplinary procedures; and when he plans to implement changes. [53545]

Kate Hoey: I have regular discussions with the police staff associations and other interested parties. As my right hon. Friend announced to the House on 23 March 1998, Official Report, columns 21–36, new police discipline procedures will come into effect on 1 April 1999.

Asylum and Immigration

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers who made an application in (a) 1990, (b) 1991, (c) 1992, (d) 1993, (e) 1994, (f) 1995, (g) 1996 and (h) 1997 are awaiting a decision on their application. [53525]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A detailed breakdown of cases by year of application is not available. However, the estimated percentage figures for asylum applications awaiting an initial decision as at 31 August 1998, by year of application are:

Year	Percentage
Pre 1994	20
1994	10
1995	20
1996	10
1997	20
1998 (January to August)	20

The total number of applications was 56,020.

The estimates are rounded to the nearest 5 per cent.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been granted political asylum in the UK in each of the last five years; and from which countries they came. [55812]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information regarding the numbers of asylum seekers who have been granted asylum, for each of the years 1989 to 1997, is given in table 3.1 of the Home Office statistical bulletin "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1997", issue 14/98. Information on the numbers of asylum seekers who were not recognised as refugees but granted exceptional leave is given in table 3.2 of the same bulletin, a copy of which is available in the Library.

The following table provides the same information for the period from January to September 1998.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what estimate he has made of the amount of Immigration and Nationality Directorate casework which will be handled by the computer systems installed under his Department's contract with Siemens Business Services; [56184]

(2) pursuant to his answer of 30 July 1998, Official Report, column 387, if he has received proposals from Siemens Business Services for computerisation plans for the Immigration and Nationality Directorate; and when he expects the computerisation to be implemented; [56239]

(3) pursuant to his answer of 7 May 1998, Official Report, column 452, when the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), intends to write to the hon. Member for Hertsmere on the casework programme system; [56240]

(4) pursuant to his answer of 30 July 1998, Official Report, column 387, how long the pilot of working methods in the Integrated Casework Directorate is to last; and when the working methods will be implemented; [56238]

(5) pursuant to paragraph 8.9 of the White Paper, "Fairer, Faster, Firmer", what was the planned date for the implementation of the casework programme on 1 May 1997; and what is the present planned date for the implementation of the programme. [56183]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I shall be writing to the hon. Member shortly.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications for asylum have been received from nationals of (a) the Czech Republic and (b) Slovakia in each of the last eight quarters for which figures are available. [56188]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The requested information is given in the table.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action his Department will take to reduce the number of illegal asylum seekers entering the United Kingdom from ports of entry in Essex; and if his Department will provide financial assistance to Essex County Council Social Services Department to meet their costs in providing for these illegal immigrants. [55765]

Mr. Straw: The Government's White Paper "Fairer, Faster and Firmer—A Modern Approach to Immigration and Asylum", published on 27 July, outlines a number of measures designed to deal with the problem of illegal entry. We are liaising with the police forces most affected to ensure that those who come to light are dealt with properly. We are also working on a number of other operational measures to detect illegal entrants and process their cases more efficiently:

targeting illegal entrants in lorries before they reach the United Kingdom, liaising closely with ferry operators and our European partners; high profile deterrent operations at ports of entry;

streamlined administrative procedures; and better use of technology.

Local authority social services departments already receive special grants towards the cost of supporting asylum seekers under the National Assistance Act 1948 or the Children Act 1989. We are currently considering whether further assistance should be made available.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the number of persons claiming asylum in the United Kingdom, for each month from May 1996 to September 1998. [56630]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The information requested is given in the table.

Application[1] received for asylum in the United Kingdom, excluding dependants, by month, May 1996 to September 1998[2]

[2] Provisional data

Flona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on reducing the time taken in the administration of asylum claims; and if he will make a statement. [53511]

Mr. Straw: The average time taken to reach an initial decision in applications for asylum lodged in the United Kingdom was about 20 months during the period January to June 1998, compared with 23 months in July to December 1997. The average decision time for applications made after the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 came into force was 13 months during the period January to June 1998. Our aim is to ensure that by April 2001 most initial asylum decisions will be made within two months of receipt and that most appeals to adjudicators will be heard within a further four months.

Police Manpower

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent representations he has received on total police manpower. [53527]

Mr. Michael: My right hon. Friend receives representations from hon. Members and police authorities from time to time about police resources and manpower. Under legislation passed by the previous Government, it is for Chief Constables to determine the number of police officers in their force.

Immigration Holding Centres

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what visits have been made by the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detentions to United Kingdom immigration holding centres in each of the last three years. [55810]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention visited all our immigration detention and holding centres for the first time during the week commencing 21 September 1998.

Metropolitan Police (Civil Claims)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Metropolitan Police officers have outstanding civil claims against their employer; how many were settled in each of the last five years; and at what cost. [55823]

Kate Hoey: The Commissioner tells me that civil claims from Metropolitan Police officers are not identified separately from those made by civil staff or the public. The specific information sought cannot therefore be provided without disproportionate effort and expenditure.

There are currently 64 Employment Tribunals (ET) brought by 53 police officers (6 of whom are no longer serving within the Metropolitan Police Service) claiming discrimination. The computerisation of these records did not begin until 1995 and therefore the first year of corporate data which is readily accessible is 1996.

The data that are available for ETs are shown:

Year	Number of ET cases	Total settlement (£)	Typical settlement—in the region of: (£)
1996	8	111,000	14,000
1997	8	49,000	6,000
1998[1]	6	38,000	6,500

Wheel Clamping

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for regulating wheel clamping on private land; and if he will make a statement. [55827]

Mr. Michael: The Government intend to introduce regulation of wheelclamping on private land in the context of statutory measures to regulate the private security industry as a whole. We are committed to introducing statutory regulation of the private security industry as soon as we can but it will not be possible to bring forward early legislation, as we warned before the election. We are using this inevitable delay to work with the industry and others on the best way to provide a comprehensive, effective and streamlined system for the whole of the private security industry and we undertook a consultation exercise last year to inform this process. We are determined to develop practical proposals which protect the safety and rights of the public without introducing unnecessary bureaucracy. We hope to bring forward firm proposals later this year.

Fire Authorities (Strikes)

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many fire authorities (a) have been and (b) have not been affected by strike action in the last five years; and, for each authority affected, how many days were lost in each of the last five years. [55797]

Mr. George Howarth: Of the fifty fire authorities in England and Wales, three—Merseyside, Derbyshire and Essex—have been affected by industrial action by firefighters in the last five years.

In Merseyside, between August 1995 and May 1996, there were 32 separate strike periods: one of 75 minutes, eight of nine hours and 23 of twenty four hours.

In Derbyshire, between June and September 1996, there were a total of 11 strike periods, each of nine hours.

In Essex, between April and May 1997, there were eight strike periods: two of four hours, one of nine hours, one of 15 hours, three of 24 hours and one of 39 hours.

In Essex, between June and September 1998, there were 28 strike periods: one of eight hours, five of nine hours, seven of 15 hours, 10 of 24 hours, two of 33 hours, two of 48 hours and one of 72 hours.

Criminal Record Checks

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police forces currently charge local and health authorities for criminal record checks. [55700]

Mr. Michael: Under administrative arrangements agreed between the Home Office and the Association of Chief Police Officers, criminal record checks conducted by the police for employment vetting purposes on those who work with children and young people are provided free of charge.

Separate and distinct arrangements exist under the Data Protection Act 1984 for individuals to apply to the police for a copy of any information which the police may hold on computers about them, including details of their criminal record. The police are under a statutory obligation to provide this information and, as permitted under the Act, charge £10 for each category of information the individual wishes to access.

Grant Settlements (Seasonal Population Influxes)

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those measures which reflect the additional costs from seasonal influxes of population contained within constabulary grant settlements; and if he will make a statement. [55701]

Mr. Michael: Police grant is allocated by means of a formula which predicts police authorities' relative need to spend. The formula takes account of both the resident and daytime population in a force's area as appropriate. Daytime population includes estimates of both overnight visitors and day visitors.

Open Government

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the information given in confidence at the times of the 1901–1991 decennial censuses of population will be exempt from sections 14a and 14b of the Open Government Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. [55826]

Mr. Straw: The Code of Practice on Access to Government Information is non-statutory and cannot override statutory prohibitions on disclosure. Confidentiality of the information in decennial census returns prior to 1920 is governed by the Public Records Act 1958. Confidentiality of returns since 1920 are governed by the Census Act 1920, as amended by the Census (Confidentiality) Act 1991.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations his Department has received from hon. Members since 1993 on section 9.21 of the Open Government White Paper; if he will publish the text of the explicit non-statutory assurances of 100-year closure given by the Registrar General on the forms for the 1901–1991 censuses; and if he will make a statement about section 9.21. [55825]

Mr. Straw: Paragraph 9.21 of the 1993 White Paper "Open Government" concerns the review of closure periods for records which are not released after 30 years and lists the decennial census of population as among the records to be closed for 100 years.

The 1997 White Paper "Your Right to Know", which set out the Government's plans for a Freedom of Information (FOI) Act, proposed that the criteria used in deciding whether records should be withheld for longer than 30 years should be aligned with the proposed harm and public interest tests governing access to current records. The position of decennial census returns is not expected to change under an FOI Act.

Since 1 August, when Ministerial responsibility for FOI transferred to the Home Office, I have not received representations on this matter from any other hon. Members. I believe that the Cabinet Office (Office of Public Service) had previously received three representations, including one from the hon. Member himself.

Confidentiality assurances were given on all of the 1901–1991 census forms. Explicit references to the 100 year rule appeared on the 1981 and 1991 census forms. The text of the confidentiality assurances for 1901–1991 were as follows:

"The Return is required for carrying out the provisions of the Census Act. The contents of the Schedules will be treated as confidential; they will be published in General Abstract only, and strict care will be taken that the Returns are not used for the gratification of curiosity, or for other purposes than those of the Census".

1911

"The contents of the Schedule will be treated as strictly confidential".

The following also appeared on the reverse of the Schedule:

"The contents of the Schedule will be treated as confidential. Strict care will be taken that no information is disclosed with regard to individual persons. The returns are not to be used for proof of age, as in connection with Old Age Pensions, or for any other purpose than the preparation of Statistical Tables".

1921

"STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL"

1931

No returns survive.

1941

No Census taken.

1951

"The contents of the schedule are strictly confidential".

The following also appeared on the reverse of the schedule:

"STRICTLY CONFIDENTIAL"

1961

"The contents of the schedule are strictly confidential".

The following also appeared on a separate sheet headed NOTES and EXAMPLES:

"CONFIDENTIALITY—No information about any individual person, family or dwelling, will be given to anyone not employed on the Census".

1971

"The information you give on the form will be treated as CONFIDENTIAL and used only for compiling statistics. No information about named individuals will be passed to any other Government Department or any other authority or person. If anyone in the census organisation improperly discloses information you provide, he will be liable to prosecution. Similarly you must not disclose information which anyone (for example, a visitor or boarder) gives you to enable you to complete the form".

1981

"Your replies will be treated in STRICT CONFIDENCE. They will be used to produce statistics but your name and address will not be fed into the census computer. After the census, the forms will be locked away for 100 years before they are passed to the Public Record Office".

1991

"Your answers will be treated in strict confidence and used only to produce statistics. Names and addresses will not be put into the computer; only the postcode will be entered. The forms will be kept securely within my office and treated as confidential for 100 years.

Anyone using or disclosing Census information improperly will be liable to prosecution. For example, it would be improper for you to pass on to someone else information which you has been given in confidence by a visitor to enable you to complete the Census form".

General Pinochet

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he was notified of the presence of Augusto Pinochet in the United Kingdom during his present visit. [56235]

Mr. Straw: I first became aware of Senator Pinochet's presence in the United Kingdom from a newspaper report which I read on the afternoon of Thursday 15 October whilst on a flight between London Gatwick and Marseilles.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning (a) the proposed extradition of Augusto Pinochet and (b) the presence of Augusto Pinochet in the United Kingdom; and when he received them. [56264]

Mr. Straw: Up to the end of 23 October, the Extradition Section at the Home Office had received 17 letters written prior to Senator Pinochet's arrest on 16 October concerning his presence in the United Kingdom and around 160 letters written after 16 October concerning the request for his extradition. Up to the same date I had received three letters from Members of Parliament, including one from the hon. Member. My Department has also received a number of telephone calls.

The Extradition Section received representations from Senator Pinochet's legal representatives on 21 October.

My Principal Private Secretary received a delegation of Chilean Members of Parliament on 20 October.

Arbitrary Detentions

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what reports have been presented to him by the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detentions; [56067]

(2) when, and for what purpose the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detentions visited Haslar Immigration Holding Centre. [56060]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention visited Haslar Holding Centre on 25 September 1998, as part of their routine inspection of the United Kingdom within the Working Group's remit.

No copy of any report has yet been received by the United Kingdom.

Immigration (Minors)

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in developing criteria for taking into account compassionate factors in immigration decisions affecting minors. [56069]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have been examining recent cases to see what criteria can be developed which could apply at every stage in the caseworking process. An analysis of these recent cases is continuing.

Under-age Drinking

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning links between under-age drinking and violent behaviour in town centres. [53522]

Mr. Michael: The public, police and councillors have all indicated that alcohol-related crime and disorder are a significant problem and involve underage drinkers.

We have implemented the Confiscation of Alcohol (Young Persons) Act 1997 and will legislate to clarify the law relating to adults who buy alcohol for children and to the use of children in test purchases. The Anti-Social Behaviour Order and other provisions in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 will help with specific local problems.

The police and local authorities will be able to target local problems through the crime reduction strategies required by the Crime and Disorder Act.

Freedom of Information

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the timetable for the introduction of a Freedom of Information Bill set out by the former Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster remains unaltered. [56326]

Mr. Straw: In my letter of 29 September to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, West (Mr. Morgan), a copy of which has been placed in the Library, I said that there was still a good deal of work to be done in translating the principles in the White Paper "Your Right to Know" into legislation. I have therefore increased resources devoted to this and set in hand a programme of work to deliver a draft Freedom of Information Bill early in the New Year.

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to prepare for implementation of the proposed Freedom of Information Act. [57007]

Mr. Straw: A culture of greater openness will be crucial to the successful implementation of a Freedom of Information Act. Implementation of the Act will not be for Government alone but will need to be addressed by a wide variety of public authorities.

I am considering the best way of promoting cultural change, and I intend to set out proposals for delivering such a change in due course.

"Civil Protection"

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many copies of each edition of "Civil Protection" are produced; and at what cost to public funds. [56355]

Mr. George Howarth: 20,000 copies of each edition of "Civil Protection" are produced at a typical cost of £14,777, based on issue 43, Autumn 1997.

Data Protection

Mrs. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to bring the Data Protection Act 1998 into force. [57008]

Mr. George Howarth: We hope to do so in the second quarter of next year.

The Data Protection Act 1998 received Royal Assent on 16 July, but substantial subordinate legislation will also be needed. We issued two consultation papers about this in August. There were more than 100 responses, which we are currently considering. We will announce a firm target date for implementation as soon as we can.

Meanwhile, users of automated personal data must continue to comply with the present Data Protection Act 1984. This includes registering new processing operations and applying for renewals when existing registrations expire.

When the new Act comes into force, processing which was already underway by 23 October 1998 will become subject to the transitional regime, which for automated data will end on 23 October 2001.

New processing, which had begun on or after 24 October this year, will become subject to the new regime as soon as it is brought into force. The Data Protection Registrar has sent me a copy of the introductory guide to the Act which she has just issued and which covers these matters. I am placing a copy in the Library.

London Fire Brigade (Pathfinder Project)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department will determine the allocation of PFI credits to the pathfinder project in vehicle management for the London Fire Brigade. [56220]

Mr. George Howarth: My officials are currently in discussion with the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority about the scope and details of its proposed vehicle acquisition and management scheme. Providing the Authority comes forward with a viable and affordable scheme, which is acceptable to the Home Office, the Treasury Taskforce and the Project Review Group, I would then expect to make available supporting Private Finance Initiative credits.

Common Market Referendum

Sir Richard Body: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received concerning the preservation from destruction of material held by the security forces relating to the 1975 referendum on United Kingdom membership of the Common Market. [55326]

Mr. Straw: I have received no representations concerning the preservation of such material.

Metropolitan Police (Dogs)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will investigate the treatment of dogs by the Metropolitan Police; and if he will make a statement. [56369]

Kate Hoey: I see no need to do so. The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the training, care and licensing of dogs in the Metropolitan Police accord strictly with the Association of Chief Police Officers (Police Dog Sub-Committee) training and care manual. The Dog Training Establishment at Keston provides the relevant training for the Metropolitan Police. The Establishment has an open house policy and visitors are welcome, by appointment. In the past few weeks, for example, the Centre has accommodated visitors from the Canine Defence League and the RSPCA, together with over 20 civilian instructors from local dog training clubs. The operational use of police dogs is managed by local inspectors and sergeants.

Neuroleptic Drugs

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prescriptions for neuroleptic drugs were issued in each prison with women inmates in each of the past three years. [55682]

Mr. George Howarth: Details about prescriptions issued are not available in a form that could be used to provide the information sought and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

The Prison Service recognises that many women received into custody have complex medical histories and have very often already been prescribed neuroleptic drugs. A Prison Service health care standard on the use of medicines makes it clear that medication will be prescribed only for clinical reasons and in line with the recommendation in the 1996 report from the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs. Efforts are being made to reduce the prescribing of major and minor tranquillisers and neuroleptic drugs except where their use is clinically essential. Increasing collaboration with NHS specialist psychiatric services is bringing prescribing in prisons under the influence of NHS consultant psychiatrists. Concern about prescribing levels in prisons will continue to be addressed through improved monitoring of health care standards.

Child Safety

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 4 June 1998, Official Report, columns 304–05, to the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) if he will list the members of the working party on safeguards for children; what the working party's terms of reference are; and how he intends that it should solicit the views of interested parties. [56367]

Mr. Michael: The Interdepartmental Working Group on Preventing Unsuitable People from Working with Children and Abuse of Trust includes officials from the following Departments and organisations who attend or receive papers:

Home Office, including the Prison Service
Department for Education and Employment
Department of Health
Department for Culture, Media and Sport
Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions
Cabinet Office
Welsh Office
Ministry of Defence
Lord Chancellor's Department
Department of Trade and Industry
Charity Commission
Crown Prosecution Service
Association of Chief Police Officers
National Health Service Executive

Officials from the Scottish Office, Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Department for Health and Social Security also attend the meetings.

The group's terms of reference are:

"To consider additional safeguards to prevent those who are unsuitable from working with children in the public, private and voluntary sectors in England and Wales, including the possibility of a central register backed up by a new criminal offence to prevent those on the list applying for work with children; to consider further measures to protect 16 and 17 year olds in England and Wales who may be vulnerable to abuse by those in a position of trust in the public, private and voluntary sectors, including a possible new criminal offence; and to make recommendations.

In undertaking this work, the Working Group will draw on the consultation exercise "Sex Offenders: a Ban on Working with Children"; on recommendations made in the report of Sir William Utting's review of safeguards for children living away from home and the Government's response to this review; and on existing safeguards.

In establishing a framework for protecting children, the working group will also bear in mind the need to protect vulnerable adults, with a view to the subsequent extension of safeguards to this wider group."

The Working Group conducted a consultation exercise in August which asked organisations with an interest in this area for their views on the issues involved. It also plans to hold two seminars at the end of November with some of these organisations to look further at a range of issues.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Warrington, North (Helen Jones) of 4 June 1998,

Official Report, column 305, when the Ministerial Task Force on the Children's Safeguards Review will publish its response to the consultation exercise, Sex Offenders: A Ban on Working with Children, and to Sir William Utting's review on safeguards for children living away from home with particular reference to those recommendations dealing with choosing the right staff. [56657]

Mr. Michael: The Ministerial Task Force on the Children's Safeguards Review will publish its response to that review shortly. A separate interdepartmental working group of officials is looking at additional safeguards to prevent those who are unsuitable from working with children. This group has specifically been asked to draw on the consultation exercise "Sex Offenders: A Ban on Working with Children" and on the recommendations in Sir William Utting's report, especially those dealing with choosing the right staff. Its report is due by the end of the year.

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines have been issued by his Department to the Court Service of the Immigration Appellate Authority for receipt of appeal papers from his Department's officials after the 14 day deadline period. [56643]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Home Office has issued no guidance to the Immigration Appellate Authority about arrangements for dealing with appeals received outside the 14 day time limit for appealing.

The Lord Chancellor's Department is responsible for the administration of the Immigration Appellate Authority.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of his Department's appeals to the Immigration Appellate Authority have been accepted after expiry of the 14 day appeal period. [56644]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I regret that information regarding the number of Home Office appeals accepted by the Immigration Appellate Authority after the expiry of the 14 day appeal period is unavailable as its collection would involve disproportionate cost.

Parking Spaces (Disabled People)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were fined for misuse of orange badge parking spaces in the United Kingdom in 1997. [56632]

Mr. Michael: The information requested is not available. Prosecutions and fines for orange badge (disabled) parking space infringements cannot be separately identified in the statistics of other waiting and parking offences held centrally, nor is it likely that the police or the courts would be able to identify them separately.

Victims of Crime

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes his Department has made to (a) the amount of information available to, and (b) the protection by law for, victims of crime and vulnerable witnesses since May 1997. [54998]

Mr. Michael: We have revised the Victims of Crime leaflet, which the police hand out routinely to victims; the Witness in Court leaflet for all those called to give evidence in court; and the Information Pack for the Families of Homicide Victims. In November 1997, we issued a new leaflet called Release of Prisoners: Information for Victims of Serious Sexual or Other Violent Offences, which explains the role of the Probation Service in working with victims when a serious offender has been given a prison sentence of four years or more. The steering group overseeing revision of the Child Witness Pack, relaunched as the Young Witness Pack in June this year, was chaired by an official from the Home Office. The pack is a jointly funded initiative by Government Department, the NSPCC and Childline for use in the preparation for court of young witnesses aged 5 to 17.

The Sex Offenders Act 1997 provides a mechanism to help protect children and vulnerable adults from convicted sex offenders. It requires such offenders to register their current name and address with the police and to inform the police of any change of address or change of name. Home Office guidance has made it clear that this information is not to be left to gather dust on a file but to be used for the protection of children and vulnerable adults. The Association of Chief Police Officers and the Association of Chief Officers of Probation have co-operated with other agencies to develop best practice following the implementation of the Act. As well as acting as a deterrent to the offender and allowing appropriate measures to be put in place, registration under the Act allows the police to be informed when a sex offender moves into their area and to take appropriate steps to protect vulnerable people as necessary.

The Sex Offender Order is intended to protect the public from a convicted sex offender, however far in the past his conviction took place, if there is current concern about a danger he may pose to the public, in particular children or vulnerable adults. A court may make an order against such an offender which would contain prohibitions which he has to observe in order to prevent the likelihood of him committing offences in the future. An order also comes with it the requirement to register under the Sex Offenders Act 1997.

In June 1997 we established an inter departmental Working Group to examine the treatment of vulnerable or intimidated witnesses, including victims, in the criminal justice system. The report of the Working Group on Vulnerable or Intimidated Witnesses, Speaking up for Justice, was published for consultation by my right hon. Friend on 10 June. The consultation exercise has now been completed and we are urgently considering the responses. We are determined to take action as quickly as possible, in light of the consultation exercise, to improve the way vulnerable or intimidated witnesses are treated in the criminal justice system.

Animal Welfare (Radioactivity Tests)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for what reasons files covering (a) the effects of radioactivity tests on animals, (b) the accident at Windscale in 1957 and (c) the accident at the Atomic Weapons Establishment at Aldermaston in 1959 have been withheld from release at the Public Record Office; and what system his Department has for reviewing decisions not to release individual files. [55422]

Mr. George Howarth: We can trace no relevant records in the Home Office. Under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986, we regulate the individual researcher, the establishment in which the work is conducted, and each research project. Under the Cruelty to Animals Act 1876 which operated in the 1950s, however, only individuals and not specific projects had to be authorised. We are unable therefore to trace any information concerning the nature of work performed at that time.

It is possible that the work on radioactivity was supported by one of the Research Councils. If this is the case, the Office of Science and Technology will need more specific information in order to mount a successful search. The files of Research Councils, like those of Government Departments, are subject to the code of practice on Access to Government Information which came into effect on 4 April 1994. To the best of my knowledge, all files belonging to the Department of Trade and Industry relating to the accident at Windscale have been released to the Public Record Office.

The Department of Trade and Industry currently retains one file from 1959 relating to the accident at Aldermaston. In accordance with normal records review procedures, the Department of Trade and Industry is currently reviewing the sensitivity of this file.

File 26–2-59 EG1/173, on the accident at Aldermaston, has been located. It will be reviewed to see if it is possible to release either the entire file, or any of its contents, at this time. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence will write to my hon. Friend once the process has been completed.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Access to Work Scheme

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish the 1997 budget for the access to work scheme, indicating how much of the budget was used in that year. [56287]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. Mark Oaten, dated October 1998:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Minister of State has asked me to reply direct to your question asking him to publish the 1997 Access to Work budget indicating how much of the budget was used. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Expenditure on Access to Work in 1997–98 was £15.357m out of a budget for the programme of £19m.

I hope this is helpful.

Northern Telecom Redundancies (Paignton)

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assistance his Department has given to efforts to minimise the effects of the redundancies at the Northern Telecom proximity 1 plant in Paignton, South Devon. [55702]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Department has granted Nortel Large Scale Redundancy Status. This means employees made redundant by the company will benefit from immediate assistance by the newly established Rapid Response team for South Devon, that will include instant access to Employment Service job search programmes and training offered by PROSPER (formerly the Devon and Cornwall Training and Enterprise Council and Business Link).

The Government Office for the South West, Employment Service, PROSPER, Devon and Cornwall Development International and Torbay Council have also combined to form a local task force which is working closely with the company, to consider what further collective action needs to be taken to help the company, its employees and the local community deal with the impact of the closure.

Higher Education (Pay)

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what recommendations his Department has submitted to the Independent Review of Higher Education Pay and Conditions. [55742]

Mr. Mudie: The Department submitted evidence jointly with other interested Departments to the Committee on 30 June. This offered general principles covering the need for pay settlements to be affordable by higher education institutions as employers and for pay levels and structures to recognise the importance of improving the quality of teaching in higher education.

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will assess the advantages of establishing an independent pay review body for members of the Institute for Learning and Teaching in Higher Education. [55743]

Mr. Mudie: The arguments for and against setting up a standing pay review body for academic staff were considered by the National Committee of Inquiry into Higher Education. In the light of its report, the future framework for determining pay and conditions of service for all staff in higher education is currently under consideration by the Independent Review of Higher Education Pay and Conditions, which will no doubt take into account the implications of the establishment by the sector of the Institute for Learning and Teaching in Higher Education.

Dance and Drama

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make it his policy, in reaching conclusions on the future funding arrangements for dance and drama training, to ensure that centres of excellence are maintained both in London and in the regions of the United Kingdom. [56415]

Mr. Mudie: Ministers from DfEE and DCMS will consider proposals for the future funding of dance and drama training in November and will then decide on future policy.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects to reach conclusions on the future funding of dance and drama training; and if he will make a statement. [56416]

Mr. Mudie: Ministers in DfEE and DCMS look forward to receiving proposals for a new scheme for Dance and Drama training in November, following which decisions on the new scheme will be announced.

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the Arts Council report "Fitness for Purpose" by Edward Birk on the provision of dance and drama training; and if he will make a statement. [56414]

Mr. Mudie: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment notes the Arts Council's report "Fitness for Purpose", which is being considered along with other information and advice in developing new arrangements for dance and drama training.

Further and Higher Education

Mr. Chaytor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students progressed from HND to degree courses in 1997–98 in (a) further education institutions and (b) higher education institutions. [55661]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 19 October 1998]: The latest figures for higher education institutions (HEIs) show that in 1997–98 there were 13,453 students beginning full and part-time first degree courses in England whose highest previous qualification was an HND or HNC. The latest figures for further education institutions (FEIs) in England are for 1995–96 and show that there were 19 entrants to first degree courses whose highest qualification was an HND. Figures are not readily available for the proportions of these previously obtained HNDs/HNCs which were obtained in FE as opposed to HE institutions.

The figures may also be incomplete as those students on HND courses who switch directly to degree courses in the same institution may not always have their highest entry qualification updated accordingly.

The figures for HEIs include students who took a break in their study as well as those who proceeded directly from an HND to a degree. In addition, the HEI figures will include some first degree courses which have been franchised out to FEIs, but it is not possible to identify these separately.

HEALTH

Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made on the re-negotiation of the Pharmaceutical Price Regulation scheme; and if he will make a statement. [55620]

Mr. Milburn: We are currently holding discussions with the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry, the trade association for the pharmaceutical industry, about the future of the Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme—the system for regulating the prices of branded prescription medicines supplied to the National Health Service.

We are not proposing to make any detailed statement about changes to the PPRS until those discussions have been concluded, and until a decision about the future has been taken.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the purchasing policies of NHS hospitals in relation to drugs and the pricing policies of drugs companies in supplying NHS hospitals. [55624]

Mr. Milburn: As well as purchasing medicines on an individual basis, National Health Service hospitals in England pool their purchasing power, through geographical pharmacy contracting and purchasing groups, to meet their medicines requirements by competitive tender. For the most part, these arrangements are maintained and serviced by the NHS Supplies Authority.

The prices of branded prescription medicines are also indirectly controlled by the Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme which regulates the overall profits which companies can make from the sales of medicines to the NHS.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to investigate the practice of companies which produce branded drugs subject to price controls selling on those drugs to new companies which are exempt from such controls. [55622]

Mr. Milburn: The Pharmaceutical Price Regulation Scheme (PPRS) applies to all companies which sell branded prescription medicines to the National Health Service. It requires that any price increases should be agreed with the Department of Health. This includes any price change to a product on or subsequent to acquisition by another company and applies to all companies regardless of size.

In some recent cases, increases took place without the Department's agreement, and these are being investigated.

The current PPRS is being reviewed, and we are determined that a new scheme should ensure full compliance.

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of NHS drugs spending was attributable to (a) branded drugs, (b) branded drugs which are subject to PPRS and (c) generic drugs, and what were the actual amounts spent in each of these areas, in each of the last five years for which the information is available. [55621]

Mr. Milburn: The information requested is given in the table.

The net ingredient cost and the proportion of the total net ingredient cost of branded and generic drugs dispensed in the community, 1993 to 1997

England

Year	Net ingredient cost (£ million) Branded drugs	Generic drugs	% Branded of total	% Generic of total
1993	2,631.0	341.6	88.5	11.5
1994	2,723.8	478.3	85.1	14.9
1995	2,882.4	584.9	83.1	16.9
1996	3,120.1	660.5	82.5	17.5
1997	3,234.1	896.7	78.3	21.7

Notes:

1. All licensed branded drugs, including branded generics, are subject to the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme. Branded generics are included in the data for branded drugs
2. The data are from the prescription cost analysis system and cover all prescriptions for drugs dispensed in the community (excludes dressings and appliances), i.e. by community pharmacists, dispensing doctors, and personal administration. The classification of drugs is based on the class of drug for which the contractor is reimbursed.
3. The net ingredient cost refers to the cost of the drug before discounts and does not include any dispensing costs or fees. It does not include any adjustment for income obtained where a prescription charge is paid at the time the prescription is dispensed or where the patient has purchased a pre-payment certificate.

3M Healthcare

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has held with 3M Healthcare regarding replacement of faulty prostheses; what offers the company made to provide such replacements at its expense in the private sector; and what response he made to such offers. [55473]

Mr. Boateng: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met representatives from 3M Healthcare on 20 February 1998 and there have been regular meetings between Departmental officials and 3M Health Care since. We have welcomed and accepted a proposal from 3M Healthcare to meet the entire costs of identifying and reviewing all patients who had been implanted with a capital hip, as well as the cost of any necessary revision surgery on account of femoral loosening. Patients may choose whether to receive care in the National Health Service or the private sector, with 3M Healthcare meeting the costs in either case.

Telephone Emergency System (Improper Use)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for a national scheme of penalties for improper use of the 999 emergency system, with special reference to possible criteria for an indictable offence. [55689]

Mr. Milburn: The Telecommunications Act 1984 already covers improper use of the public telephone system, including improper use of the 999 emergency system. Those convicted of using the public telecommunication system to send messages known to be false are liable to a maximum penalty of 6 months' imprisonment and/or a fine not exceeding £5,000. There are no plans to introduce an additional national scheme of penalties.

Parkinson's Disease

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department is currently funding into the treatment and causes of Parkinson's Disease. [55782]

Ms Jowell: The Medical Research Council (MRC) spent £55.8 million during 1997/98 on neurosciences and mental health research, £2.9 million of which was spent on projects directly related to Parkinson's disease and neuro regeneration.

Through funds managed by the Department, work is currently being commissioned on: 'New Drugs for Parkinson's Disease' and 'Systematic reviews of paramedic therapies in Parkinson's Disease'.

Additionally the following projects have been supported recently:

Evaluation of a pilot targeted physiotherapy service for people with Parkinson's disease from diagnosis to end stage; outreach management of people with chronic neurological disability; and screening people with Parkinson's disease to identify those at risk of falling at Southampton University.

Heart Disease

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he is taking to promote awareness of cardiac risk in the young; and if he will make a statement. [55829]

Mr. Boateng: The British Cardiac Society are currently working with other organisations on the production of clinical guidelines on the management of cardiomyopathy and other similar conditions which affect young people. The guidance will be disseminated widely to increase awareness amongst general practitioners and other professionals involved in identifying, treating and caring for patients with cardiac conditions.

Child Migrants

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about his Department's response to the recommendations contained in the Health Committee's Third Report of 1997–98 on the Welfare of Former British Child Migrants (HC 755). [55698]

Mr. Boateng: The Department is carefully considering the recommendations in the Report, and examining the legal, financial and other issues which they raise. We will publish our response shortly.

Health Authority Grant Settlements

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those measures which reflect the additional costs from seasonal influxes of population contained within health authority grant settlements; and if he will make a statement. [55710]

Mr. Milburn: Apart from the marginal costs of initial accident and emergency treatment, all other hospital costs incurred by United Kingdom visitors are paid for by the health authority where the patient usually lives.

The costs of treating charge exempt overseas visitors are met centrally.

Hospital Waiting Lists (Cardiac Surgery)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current waiting time for urgent cardiac surgery broken down by health authority area; how many people in each area are waiting for cardiac surgery; and what proportion is considered to be in urgent need. [56024]

Mr. Boateng: Information on the number of residents of each English health authority waiting for hospital admission by specialty, including cardiothoracic surgery and cardiology, is published quarterly in Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England (Resident Based), copies of which are available in the Library. Decisions about the urgency with which patients need to be treated are taken locally by individual clinicians.

Breast Feeding

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of (a) midwives and (b) health visitors have received accredited training in the teaching of breast feeding. [56019]

Mr. Milburn: All education programmes approved by the English National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting leading to registration as a midwife or health visitor include the teaching of principles concerned with breast feeding and infant nutrition.

ENT Departments

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many associate specialist posts have been created in ENT departments in each of the last five years. [55811]

Mr. Milburn: Information about the number of associate specialist posts created each year is not collected centrally. Information about the number of associate specialists in otolaryngology (Ear, Nose and Throat), on 30 September in each of the last five years for which data are available, is shown in the table.

Number of associate specialists in otolaryngology (ENT) in the National Health Service in England as at 30 September (whole time equivalents)

Breast Screening

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice the National Screening Committee has given regarding the extension of the breast cancer screening programme to women aged 65 years and over; and if he will make a statement. [55791]

Mr. Boateng: The National Screening Committee considered the possible extension of the breast screening programme to women over the age of 65 on 22 July 1998. Their view was that the first priority must be to ensure that the existing programme can maintain a three year screening for all women.

The Committee acknowledged the promising nature of the interim results of the pilot studies for extending the screening programme to older women, and the evidence in favour of the introduction of two views at all screens. The Committee also recognised that any national roll-out of these extensions would require additional staff in an area where recruitment is becoming less easy.

In anticipation that the final results of the three pilot studies bear out the interim results, the Committee recommended that new arrangements need to be identified to address the workforce pressures on the breast screening programme. Discussions are being held with the relevant professional bodies and those involved in the screening programme to identify solutions to meet these pressures.

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what targets are in place for the maximum period between performance of a radiogram and discussion of the result with the patient affected; and if he will make a statement. [56476]

Mr. Boateng: Women aged 50 to 64 are invited for mammograms routinely every three years as part of the breast screening programme. National Health Service Breast Screening Programme guidance states that women should receive their results within two weeks. Where further investigation is necessary, women should be invited to attend a breast screening assessment centre within three weeks of the mammogram being performed.

Mammograms are also taken as part of the diagnosis of cancer in women with suspected breast cancer. The evidence based guidance Improving Outcomes in Breast Cancer published in July 1996 recommends that the results of the tests should be given to the patient within five working days.

The Government recognise the high levels of anxiety that patients can experience when waiting for diagnosis and treatment of cancer and have made available £10 million to ensure prompt access to diagnosis and high quality care for those with breast cancer. This has been used to support over 300 projects across the country, including the introduction of 'one-stop' breast clinics where women can undergo all necessary tests (including mammograms) for diagnosis of cancer at one visit and receive their results in line with published guidance.

Insulin-dependent Diabetics

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when he expects to conclude his consideration of making pen needles available on the NHS for insulin dependent diabetics; [55711]

(2) if he will make a statement about the availability of needles for diabetic pen injection systems through the NHS. [55712]

Mr. Milburn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State expects to make a decision shortly.

Drug Treatments

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he intends to use to remove inequalities based on geographical areas in the prescribing of drug treatments for life-threatening conditions. [56042]

Mr. Milburn: Our plans to address unacceptable variations in services are set out in the quality consultation document "A First Class Service". We will work with the professions to produce national service frameworks relevant to the whole of the National Health Service. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence will assess new and existing interventions for their clinical and cost-effectiveness and produce and disseminate guidance to support frontline staff. We will challenge and address unacceptable variations in the provision of clinically and cost-effective treatments which are not based on the health needs of local people. We intend to establish a new statutory body, the Commission for Health Improvement, which will provide an independent assessment of local action to improve quality and national implementation of service standards.

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the additional resources allocated to the National Health Service under the Comprehensive Spending Review is being (a) allocated to health authorities in England and Wales and (b) retained by the Government for distribution centrally. [56210]

Mr. Milburn: An announcement on health authority allocations will be made shortly.

Information regarding Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what financial assistance his Department will make available to Essex County Country Social Services Department to help them meet the costs arising from bogus asylum seekers from (a) Kosovo, (b) Somalia and (c) Sri Lanka who enter the United Kingdom at ports of entry in Essex. [55764]

Mr. Boateng: People who claim asylum at a port of entry into the country are entitled to receive social security benefits, whilst those who claim asylum once in the country are not thus entitled. There are three grants against which local authorities may submit claims for reimbursement to help them meet the costs of supporting asylum-seekers who claim asylum whilst in the country: the Asylum Seeking Adults Grant, the Persons From Abroad Children's Grant and the Unaccompanied Asylum-Seeking Children's Grant. We will set out the terms of the grants later this year. These grants are not payable in respect of those who have been refused asylum, and have exhausted their right to appeal.

We have set out our plans to change the cumbersome immigration and asylum process we inherited from the previous Government in the White Paper "Fairer, Faster and Firmer—A Modern Approach to Immigration and Asylum". These proposals will speed up the process, while ensuring greater fairness, so that genuine asylum seekers will receive a speedy and humane response, and those not entitled to asylum will be removed from the country more quickly. The support grants, and the White Paper proposals apply equally to all asylum seekers, regardless of country of origin.

Mumps, Measles and Rubella Vaccination

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the alleged association between the administration of MMR vaccine and inflammatory bowel disease. [56370]

Ms Jowell: The effects of mumps, measles and rubella (MMR) immunisation have been carefully examined by two groups of independent experts: the Joint Committee on Vaccination and Immunisation and the Committee on Safety of Medicines. In addition, following the publicity about possible adverse reactions to MMR, a group of 37 independent experts was convened by the Medical Research Council on 23 March under the chairmanship of Professor Sir John Pattison. The group examined published and unpublished research into a suggested association between MMR vaccine and inflammatory disease (Crohn's disease) and autism. The [illegible]endent experts concluded:

> The available virological and epidemiological evidence does not support a causal role for persistent measles virus infection in Crohn's disease.
> There is no evidence to indicate any link between MMR vaccination and bowel disease or autism.
>
> There is therefore no reason for a change in the current MMR vaccination policy.

Autism

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has collated on changes in the number of children diagnosed with autism over the past 10 years. [56371]

Mr. Boateng: Information about the number of children diagnosed with autism is not held centrally. It would be difficult to collect meaningful information because of the lack of a widely agreed definition of autism. There is some anecdotal evidence of increased numbers of children diagnosed with autistic spectrum disorders. This is generally thought to be the result of more accurate diagnosis. It is for the local statutory authorities to determine the needs of children with autism in their area and work together effectively to ensure that these needs are met.

Medical Records

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to cap the charges for access to medical records after changes to the Data Protection Act 1998. [56641]

Mr. Milburn: The Department is currently discussing with the Home Office the subordinate legislation needed to implement the Data Protection Act 1998, including the subject access modification order which will regulate charging for access to medical records. It is too early to say what the final charging regime will be.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimates his Department has made of the effect on the number of patients seeking access to their medical records of the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1998. [56640]

Mr. Milburn: The provisions for patient access to medical records will be contained within subordinate legislation which has not yet been finalised. However, the intention is to replicate, as closely as the Data Protection Act 1998 will allow, the existing provisions for access and the Department is aware of no evidence to suggest that the level of applications from individuals will change significantly once the new legislation is in force.

SCOTLAND

Salmon and Trout

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number and total weight of (a) salmon and (b) grilse taken by (i) anglers and (ii) commercial nets in (1) drift and (2) estuary nets for each of the last five years and for 1985, 1980 and 1975 or as much of such information as is readily available; and if he will provide the same information for fish classed (x) 1 sea winter, (y) 2 sea winter and (z) 3 sea winter fish. [55567]

Mr. Macdonald: The information is set out in the table. Drift netting has been prohibited in Scotland since 1962. Data on sea ages of salmon are classified as either one sea winter (1SW)(grilse) or multi sea winter (MSW)(salmon). The split between grilse and salmon by the fishermen is usually made on the basis of weight and may become more inaccurate as the fishing season advances.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what measures he will pursue to promote the recovery of native trout and salmon stocks in Scottish rivers. [56302]

Mr. Macdonald: The Government are well aware of the importance of salmon and native trout and the need to ensure their conservation status. For many years they have funded research by a number of bodies including the Fisheries Research Services (FRS). That commitment remains and the table lists ongoing research by the Services' Freshwater Fisheries Laboratory at Faskally. Back-up support is also being provided to the biologists employed by the various fishery trusts established on the West of Scotland.

		Estimated cost (£) for 1998–99
Monitoring	Provide an account of the status of Scottish salmon stocks	236,400
Monitoring	Provide an account of Scottish sea trout, brown trout and freshwater fish stocks	150,122
Monitoring	Provide an account of the Scottish freshwater environment as a habitat for freshwater fish	380,846
R&D	Experimental population dynamics of Atlantic salmon and brown trout	172,314
R&D	Population structuring in salmonids	283,154
R&D	Characterisation of biodiversity in the Atlantic salmon	33,635

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of jobs sustained through sea trout and salmon fishing in Scotland in each of the years 1992 to 1998 (a) directly and (b) indirectly; and if he will make a statement on the basis of these figures. [56304]

Mr. Macdonald: Information on the number of jobs associated with salmon and sea trout angling is not held centrally.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the effect of inshore coastal fish farming on native migratory sea trout and salmon populations; and if he will make a statement. [56308]

Mr. Macdonald: Stocks of Atlantic salmon and sea trout have declined in many areas of the North Atlantic. The reasons for this are believed to be many and varied but it is recognised that sea lice attracted to coastal fish farms could represent an additional burden, particularly for sea trout.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what aspects of the (a) funding and (b) administration of housing benefit will be within the responsibility of the Scottish Parliament; what plans he has to review the proposed division of responsibility over housing benefit; and if he will make a statement. [55973]

Mr. Macdonald: The Scotland Bill currently before Parliament provides that responsibility for matters related to social security policy and administration, including housing benefit, should be reserved to the UK Parliament. The Scottish Parliament will, however, be responsible for any extra costs which result from decisions by local authorities on their housing rent levels which lead to expenditure on rent rebates growing more rapidly in Scotland than in England. I have no plans to review the proposed division of responsibility over housing benefit.

Fish Farms

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from organisations and individuals concerned about the environmental damage caused by inshore coastal fish farms; if he will list those who have made representations; and if he will make a statement. [56307]

Mr. Macdonald: Representations are received from time to time. It would not be appropriate to list those concerned without their permission but they include individuals and organisations, including representatives of anglers.

The Government have made it clear that a sustainable aquaculture industry must have regard to environmental as well as social and economic considerations. To that end, the Government welcome the sea lice strategy which the industry is putting in place and endorse the guidance on environmental assessment sponsored jointly by the industry and the Crown Estate.

For their part, the Government have made clear their intention to increase the role of local authorities in the planning process for aquaculture developments and have recently released for public consultation "Interim Scheme for the Licensing of Marine Fish Farms in Scottish Waters—Policy Guidance Note and Advice Note: Marine Fish Farming and the Environment".

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total public subsidy paid to the fish farming industry in each year for the period 1992 to 1999. [56306]

Mr. Macdonald: Public subsidy amounting to £15.9 million was paid to the fish farming industry in Scotland over the period 1992 to 1998. The breakdown for each financial year is as follows:

Year	£ million
1992–93	3.28
1993–94	2.71
1994–95	2.06
1995–96	2.62
1996–97	3.53
1997–98	1.73

Figures for 1998–99 are not yet available.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of jobs sustained through inshore coastal fish farming in Scotland in each of the years 1992 to 1998 (a) directly and (b) indirectly; and if he will make a statement on the basis of these figures. [56305]

Mr. Macdonald: The number of jobs directly sustained by coastal fish farming in Scotland in each of the years 1992 to 1997 is as follows:

Year	Full-time	Part-time
1992	985	275	1,260
1993	976	248	1,224
1994	1,050	248	1,298
1995	1,104	251	1,355
1996	1,150	241	1,391
1997	1,088	207	1,295

This information is based on figures provided by the companies concerned. Information for 1998 will be published by the Scottish Office in the Scottish Fish Farm Production Survey for 1998 during the first day half of 1999. Figures for indirect employment are not available for the time series requested; however, our most recent estimates indicate that the industry supports around 6,500 jobs both indirectly and in terms of up and downstream activities. This represents an important contribution to the Scottish economy and remote rural areas in particular where most of the employment arises.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Alternative Crops

Mr. Jack: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the alternative crops that are presently being grown in the UK. [54829]

Mr. Rooker: A wide range of alternative crops are being grown in the UK. I will write to the right hon. Gentleman with the information requested.

Beef and Sheep Premiums

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for what reasons the payment of beef and sheep premiums to farmers by his Department has been subject to delay. [54860]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 19 October 1998]: There have been no delays in making beef and sheep payments to farmers. Payments have been made in accordance with the deadlines laid down in the schemes concerned and with MAFF's published targets.

The Ministry will continue to make every effort to ensure that farmers receive the payments due to them as rapidly as possible consistent with the operation of proper financial control.

Calf Processing Aid Scheme

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received in support of retaining the calf processing aid scheme beyond 30 November. [55750]

Mr. Rooker: We have received a number of representations in support of retaining the Calf Processing Aid Scheme beyond 30 November. These came mainly from organisations representing dairying interests. Representations have also been received against retaining the Scheme beyond 30 November, mainly from slaughtering and animal welfare interests.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Stevenson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Luxembourg on 19 and 20 October. [56626]

Mr. Nick Brown: I represented the United Kingdom at a meeting of the European Union Agriculture Council in Luxembourg on 19 and 20 October 1998.

The Council discussed the state of progress of negotiations on the Commission's Agenda 2000 CAP reform proposals, on which substantial technical level work has continued since May. I stressed the importance of continuing the pace of work so that the negotiations could be concluded by March 1999 in accordance with the timetable laid down at the Cardiff European Council. A further debate on this dossier will take place at the Council's November meeting with the aim of agreeing a political position for transmission to the Vienna European Council.

The Council also discussed two proposals concerning the new agrimonetary arrangements which will apply after 1 January 1999. I broadly welcomed the proposals, in particular the introduction of a regime which will be less costly for the EU budget and more transparent and workable for operators than the current system. I also welcomed an improved proposal governing the terms under which member states who are not joining the single currency on 1 January 1999 could choose to pay CAP subsidies in Euros. There was a large measure of support in Council for the proposals. However, several member states preferred final decisions to be deferred until December when the likely monetary situation as at 1 January, and therefore the impact upon farm incomes, would be clearer.

At a Danish request, the Council held a brief debate on antibiotic resistance and the use of antibiotics in farming. It will return to the issue in due course on the basis of a Commission assessment of the scientific data.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

British Overseas Territories

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to publish a White Paper on the future of the British Overseas Territories; and if he will make a statement on the citizenship of the people of St. Helena. [55785]

Ms Quin: It is expected that the White Paper on the UK Overseas Territories will be published by the end of the year.

Most people in St. Helena are British Dependent Territories Citizens. The issue of British citizenship for residents of all UK Overseas Territories who do not already have it is a complex one. It is being considered sympathetically in the context of the current Review of UK Overseas Territories and the result will be published in the White Paper.

Correspondence

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will cause a reply to be made to the hon. Member for Solihull from the Migration and Visa Unit of his Department to correspondence initiated by that hon. Member on 5 June in the matter of Asmaham J. Tahmas and Mohamad R. Ismail bearing the unit's reference GV100/45781. [55740]

Mr. Fatchett: The Migration and Visa Correspondence Unit replied to the hon. Member's representations on 22 October 1998.

Departmental Buildings (Access)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provisions are made by his Department for visitors to his Department who have physical difficulties. [56257]

Mr. Fatchett: Visitors to Department buildings who have physical difficulties are provided with assistance and guidance to ensure that, as far as possible, these difficulties do not hamper access or the conduct of their business.

An Audit of the Department's buildings was carried out earlier this year to cover the requirements of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. The Terms of Reference included examining our current access arrangements for visitors with physical difficulties.

An independent architectural adviser, specialising in disabled access arrangements, who helped us design access for disabled visitors to our Information Centre which opened earlier this year, is now working up the Audit findings into an action plan. Our Officials will be meeting the adviser shortly to discuss the way forward.

War Crimes

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what efforts SFOR have made to apprehend and arrest (a) Ratko Mladic and (b) Radovan Karazic to face trial before the International Criminal Tribunal. [56481]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: All indictees, including Karazic and Mladic, belong before the Tribunal in The Hague.

Under Dayton, the primary responsibility for transferring war crimes indictees to the Tribunal lies with the Parties. We continue to press them to fulfil these and other obligations but their performance so far is variable. For this reason SFOR continues to take action to detain indictees: of ten indictees successfully detained in Bosnia, seven have involved British forces either directly or in support. We cannot give details of specific plans or operations.

SFOR's approach has helped ensure that over half of those currently indicted have appeared in The Hague.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps have been taken to ensure that the International Criminal Tribunal is able to investigate war crimes and crimes against humanity committed in Kosovo. [56482]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: On 31 March this year, the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 1160 (1998) which urged the Prosecutor of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia to begin gathering information related to the violence in Kosovo that might fall within its jurisdiction. The Council also noted that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had an obligation to co-operate with the Tribunal.

In its Resolution 1199 (1998) adopted on 23 September, the Security Council called upon both the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the leaders of the Kosovo Albanian community to co-operate fully with the Prosecutor of the Tribunal in the investigation of possible violations of international humanitarian law within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal. The UK took the lead in drafting this resolution.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has also urged the Tribunal to investigate the massacres in Gornje Obrinje and near Vucitern in Kosovo. A team of investigators from the Tribunal has recently returned from Kosovo and the Prosecutor has publicly announced her intention to lead the next investigative mission.

Sudan (British Embassy)

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to reopen the British Embassy in Sudan; and if he will make a statement. [55972]

Mr. Fatchett: We did not break off diplomatic relations with Sudan when we withdrew UK based staff from Khartoum. We have also maintained contact with the Sudanese authorities through their Embassy here. I hope that it will not be too long before the necessary conditions are re-established for a return to normal relations with Sudan.

Falkland Islands (Fishing)

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he (a) has made and (b) intends to make following the passing of a Bill in the Argentine Senate threatening fines to fishing boats in Falkland Islands waters; and if he will make a statement. [56483]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary told the Argentine Foreign Minister on 16 October that we were aware that the Argentine Congress was considering a Bill that would purport to regulate fishing activities in Falkland waters. My right hon. Friend made clear our concerns that the adoption of such legislation risks damaging cooperation on South Atlantic issues and the bilateral relationship more generally.

The forthcoming visit of President Menem to the United Kingdom is another opportunity to register our opposition to the Bill.

Mr. Austin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Falkland Islands Government have the sole right to issue licences for fishing in Falkland Islands territorial waters; and if he will make a statement. [56484]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We are in no doubt about the Falkland Islands Government's sole right to issue licences to vessels that wish to fish in Falkland waters and to authorise fishing activities there.

Human Rights (Gambia)

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent assessment he has made of human rights abuses in The Gambia; and what impact this will have on the UK's current aid and assistance. [56334]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We are concerned that breaches of basic human rights are still occurring in The Gambia. We discussed this with colleagues at the October meeting of the Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group (CMAG). CMAG's Chairman has written to President Jammeh asking for his response to recent allegations of human rights abuses. If such abuses continue, it will inevitably lead to a review of our current aid and assistance programme.

Departmental Properties

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the properties (a) owned and (b) rented or leased by his Department in Togo, the purposes for which they are designated and the annual running costs for each property; and if he will make a statement. [56215]

Mr. Fatchett: We have no properties in Togo.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the properties (a) owned and (b) rented or leased by his Department in Nicaragua, the purposes for which they are designated and the annual running costs for each property; and if he will make a statement. [56216]

Mr. Fatchett: We have one Embassy office, one house for the Head of Mission and one staff house in Managua. All properties are leased.

Annual running costs for each property are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the properties (a) owned and (b) rented or leased by his Department in Syria, the purposes for which they are designated and the annual running costs for each property; and if he will make a statement. [56217]

Mr. Fatchett: We own one house for the Head of Mission and one staff store in Damascus. In addition we lease 17 other properties in Damascus:

1 Embassy Office

4 Garages

12 units of staff accommodation.

Annual running costs for each property are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the properties (a) owned and (b) rented or leased by his Department in Slovenia, the purposes for which they are designated and the annual running costs for each property; and if he will make a statement. [56218]

Mr. Fatchett: We have one Embassy office, one house for the Head of Mission and three staff flats in Ljubljana. All properties are leased.

Annual running costs for each property are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

General Pinochet

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultation took place between his Department and the Spanish Government prior to the issuing of the international warrant for the arrest of General Pinochet. [56280]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: There was no consultation between the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Spanish Government prior to the issuing of the request for a provisional warrant for the arrest of Senator Pinochet.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultation took place between his Department and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concerning General Pinochet prior to 18 October. [56283]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: There was no consultation between the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concerning Senator Pinochet prior to 18 October.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has received from the Chilean Government since 1 May 1997 concerning General Pinochet. [56282]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have received the following representations from the Chilean Government since 1 May 1997 concerning General Pinochet: (i) The Chilean Embassy in London contacted the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in September 1998 ahead of Senator Pinochet's visit to request the use of VIP facilities on his arrival at Heathrow Airport; (ii) The Chilean Foreign Minister, Sr. Jose Miguel Insulza, handed over a formal Note protesting the arrest of Senator Pinochet to the British Ambassador in Chile on 17 October 1998. The Chilean Embassy in London also passed a Note making the same points to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 19 October 1998. A second Note was passed to the British Embassy in Santiago on 23 October 1998; (iii) The Chilean Foreign Minister, Sr. Jose Miguel Insulza telephoned my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on 17 October 1998. The Chilean Deputy Foreign Minister, Sr. Mariano Fernandez, called on my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on Saturday 24 October.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations took place between his Department and other departments prior to the issuing of the international warrant for the arrest of General Pinochet. [56281]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: FCO officials were kept informed of events leading up to the arrest. The only consultation that took place was between the Metropolitan Police and the FCO on the technical question of whether Senator Pinochet would be entitled to diplomatic immunity.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the basis of the statement in Sir Thomas Legg's report at paragraph 4.2 that Sandline International is a company registered in the Bahamas. [56008]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Evidence supplied to the Legg Inquiry.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what occasions the British High Commission has visited the British passport holders under sentence of death in Sierra Leone for offences arising from, or relating to, the military coup. [55976]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We are aware of only one British passport holder, Mr. Hilton Fyle, presently under sentence of death. He is also a national of Sierra Leone.

A British consular official visited Mr. Fyle on 15 September 1998. He was fit and well and said that he was being treated fairly. He has regular access to a lawyer.

A British consular official plans to visit Mr. Fyle again before the end of October.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations have been made by Her Majesty's Government in respect of those sentenced to death in Sierra Leone for offences arising from, or relating to, the military coup; and if he will make a statement; [55977]

(2) on which date the Minister of State telephoned the Sierra Leone Government urging clemency for those officers sentenced to death by courts martial consequent upon their participation in the military coup; with whom he spoke; and what other direct or indirect representations urging clemency were made by Her Majesty's Government. [56279]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I spoke personally to President Kabbah on 16 October to ask him to apply clemency in respect of the courts martial sentences. Our High Commissioner in Freetown also spoke to President Kabbah on 16 October. I reiterated my points in a letter delivered to the President the following day. I also spoke to President Kabbah on 27 August to urge clemency for those sentenced to death on 25 August in the civilian trials.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Mr. Peter Penfold, during his meeting with the Foreign Secretary's Special Representative on Sierra Leone on 30 December 1996, shared his knowledge of the Blackstone deal for EO/Sandline to provide military equipment and training to the Kabbah Government. [56362]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Mr. Penfold met Mr. Flynn, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary's Special Representative to Sierra Leone, in New York in mid-January 1998. This is recorded in paragraph 5.30 of the Legg Report which states:

"On 14 and 15 January, they attended meetings together with UN delegates, including the Chairman of the UN Sanctions Committee. It does not appear that the arms embargo, or the supply of arms by UK firms to President Kabbah, surfaced in those discussions."

Mr. Penfold did not meet Mr. Flynn on 30 December 1996.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to paragraph 4.8 of the Legg report, who advised Mr. Peter Penfold to meet Branch Energy prior to him taking up his appointment as High Commissioner in Sierra Leone. [56361]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Branch Energy was identified by the FCO's African Department as one of a group of British commercial firms with business interests in Sierra Leone. As is normal practice, Mr. Penfold was recommended to contact them as part of his preposting briefing.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment has been made of the charges, evidence and conduct of the trial of the British national, Hilton Fyle, sentenced to death in Sierra Leone. [56275]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Mr. Fyle's trial and those of others have been monitored by the United Nations, other international observers and by the British High Commission in Freetown. The international observers have indicated that these civil trials were conducted fairly, under difficult circumstances. Mr. Fyle has appealed against his conviction. The appeal process, which has not yet begun, is expected to last at least one month.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what occasions Mr. Peter Penfold met (a) Mr. Tim Spicer and (b) representatives of Sandline International or its subsidiary companies during (i) his period of duties in the Caribbean and (ii) as Governor of the British Virgin Islands. [56360]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Mr. Penfold has confirmed that on no occasion did he meet Mr. Spicer or representatives of Sandline International or its subsidiary companies during his period of duties in the Caribbean or as Governor of the British Virgin Islands.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports his Department has received as to the identities and professions of those individuals executed by firing squad following the coup in Sierra Leone. [56372]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: According to information published by the Government of Sierra Leone, all the 38 persons sentenced in the court martial which began on 23 July 1998 were former members of the Sierra Leone armed forces. Those executed on 19 October were:

Corporal Tamba Gborie
Sergeant Abu Sankoh alias Zagallo
Squadron Leader Victor King
Brigadier Hassan Karim Conteh
Lieutenant Jim Kelly Jalloh
Lieutenant Jim Kelly Jalloh
Captain Idrissa Khemolai
Captain Simbo Sankoh
Colonel John Amadu Sonica Conteh
Lt. Commander Samuel Kandu Boi Gilbert
Lt. Commander Abdul Aziż Dumbuya
Lt. Colonel P. F. Foday
Josiah Boisy Pratt
Captain Abukarr Kamara
Captain Albert Johnny Moore
Major Bayoh Conteh alias Bios
Major Augustine Fannah Kamara
Major Abdul Masakama Koroma
Major Kula Samba
Lt. Colonel David Boisy Palmer
Colonel David Kobina Anderson
Colonel Abdul Karim Sesay
Colonel James Max Kanga
Colonel Sam Francis Yariemah Koroma

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what day he was notified of (a) the holding of courts martial of officers implicated in the Sierra Leone coup, (b) the verdicts on the officers and (c) the award of death sentences. [56276]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The military courts martial began on 23 July 1998. The British High Commission reported this that day. The verdicts and the sentences were handed down on 12 October 1998, and reported that day by the High Commission.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on what date Sandline International was entered on the Companies Register of the British Virgin Islands. [55974]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have not traced a company in the name of Sandline International registered in the British Virgin Islands. However, a company called Sandline Holdings was registered there on 2 July 1993.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the dates and location of Mr. Peter Penfold's service in the Caribbean subsequent to the completion of his duties as Governor of the British Virgin Islands. [55975]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Mr. Penfold completed his duties as Governor of the British Virgin Islands in 1995. He subsequently served as HMG's Special Adviser on Drugs in the Caribbean from 1995 to 1996.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by what means his Department has been able to assess the evidence submitted to, and the efficacy of the conduct of, (a) the courts martial and (b) the civil courts of Sierra Leone, in respect of hearings related to charges of treason arising from the coup. [56267]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The courts martial and the civilian trials have been monitored by the United Nations and other international observers and by the British High Commission. The international observers have indicated that the civil trials have been conducted fairly under difficult circumstances. Both we and the international observers have, however, expressed concern to the Government of Sierra Leone about the absence of a proper appeals process for the military courts martial.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if a representative of the British High Commission to Sierra Leone was in attendance at the courts martial of the officers subsequently executed for their participation in the Sierra Leone coup; [56278]

(2) if a representative of the British High Commission to Sierra Leone attended throughout the trial of British national, Hilton Fyle. [56270]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: No.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to the Legg report, if he will place in the Library a copy of the document Project Python as presented to Mr. Peter Penfold at his meeting with Mr. Spicer of Sandline on 28 January. [56359]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Project Python document referred to in the Legg report is a commercial working document belonging to Sandline International. It is not for the Government to make such a document public.

Gibraltar

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if it is Her Majesty's Government policy that there shall be no alteration to the constitutional status of Gibraltar without the consent of the people of Gibraltar. [55985]

Ms Quin: As set out in the Preamble to the 1969 Gibraltar Constitution Order, it is Her Majesty's Government's policy that there can be no alteration in Gibraltar's status as a United Kingdom's Overseas Territory without the consent of the people of Gibraltar.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on which occasions this year the Royal Gibraltar Police have intervened with (a) Spanish fishermen and (b) Spanish armed forces or law enforcement agencies in relation to infringement of Gibraltarian waters. [55979]

Ms Quin: There has been an increase in incursions into British waters around Gibraltar by Spanish fishermen since the beginning of this year. The Royal Gibraltar police has routinely requested vessels fishing illegally in British waters around Gibraltar, both Spanish and other, to refrain from doing so. In extreme cases, offenders have been arrested. Spanish military or law enforcement vessels entering British waters, unless exercising a right of innocent passage or co-operating with the Gibraltar authorities, are routinely asked to leave.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what resources have been requested by (a) the Governor and (b) the Government of Gibraltar in order to defend its territorial waters. [55980]

Ms Quin: Under the 1969 Constitution, responsibility for defence issues rests with the Governor, rather than the Government, of Gibraltar. It would not be appropriate to comment on discussions of operational defence and policing matters. The Governor has been assured that the Royal Gibraltar Police will be able to rely on whatever support is necessary to enable them to do their job effectively and safely.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives were rejected during the United Kingdom presidency of the EU by Spain consequent to the dispute over the status of Gibraltar. [55981]

Ms Quin: Before the start of the UK Presidency, Spain objected to various draft instruments in the Justice and Home Affairs field because of the terms relating to the inclusion of Gibraltar. We fully consulted the Government of Gibraltar during the ensuing negotiations during our Presidency. The Government of Gibraltar reluctantly decided that Gibraltar should be excluded from these instruments rather than participate as part of the UK legal jurisdiction, three instruments were adopted at the Justice and Home Affairs Council on 28–29 May on this basis (ie with Gibraltar excluded): Eurodac Convention, Driving Disqualifications Convention and European Judicial Network Joint Action.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he rejected the Matutes proposals on Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement. [55982]

Ms Quin: We have said that we are studying the Matutes proposals and will reply in due course. That remains the position. We have also reaffirmed that we stand firmly by the commitment in the 1969 Constitution that there can be no change in Gibraltar's status without the consent of the people of Gibraltar.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he will reply to the representation of the Gibraltar Government, submitted earlier this year in response to the Matutes proposals. [55983]

Ms Quin: There is frequent dialogue between HMG and the Government of Gibraltar. I last met with the Chief Minister of Gibraltar on 29 September. We have told the Government of Gibraltar that we are studying the Matutes proposals and will reply in due course. We have also repeatedly made it clear that there can be no change in Gibraltar's status without the consent of the people of Gibraltar.

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the infringement of Gibraltarian waters by Spanish fishermen. [55984]

Ms Quin: Since the beginning of this year, there has been an increase in incursions into British waters around Gibraltar by Spanish fishermen. We have reached an understanding with the Spanish authorities of the situation that had prevailed between 1991 (when the Gibraltar Nature Protection Ordinance was introduced) and 1997 during which Spanish fishermen respected the authority of the Police, and have been seeking to return to that situation.

Dubai

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he will make to the Government of Dubai consequent upon the decision by the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detention to designate the detention of George Atkinson as arbitrary. [56508]

Mr. Fatchett: The United Nations Working Group had not told HMG of its decision until we consulted them on 22 October. We are seeking more information from the Working Group so that we may consider what action is appropriate.

We have regularly encouraged the Government of Dubai to sign and ratify the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, as well as other UN Conventions.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 27 October 1998

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Infrastructure Project

Mr. Caplin: To ask the President of the Council when the Ernst and Young report on the Government's millennium infrastructure project will be published. [56673]

Mrs. Beckett: The report was published on 10 September, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

WALES

Multilateral Agreement on Investment

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from the Welsh Development Agency concerning the implications for its activities of the proposed Multilateral Agreement on Investment. [56156]

Mr. Hain: The Welsh Development Agency has regular discussions with the Welsh Office on a variety of issues. The implications of the Multilateral Agreement on Investment (MAI) has been discussed in that context. The Welsh Office continues to keep the Agency advised of developments on the MAI proposal.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to announce changes in the map of assisted area status; and if he will make a statement. [56493]

Mr. Hain: Announcing changes to the Assisted Areas map is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The new map must be notified to the Commission by 31 March 1999, and will come into force on 1 January 2000.

Apprentices (Deeside)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps his Department proposes to facilitate increases in apprentices on Deeside; and if he will make a statement. [56492]

Mr. Hain: The Welsh Office in collaboration with the Welsh TECs actively promotes Modern Apprenticeships to both employers and young people. However, the demand for apprentices on Deeside, as elsewhere, is determined by employers. CELTEC, the local Training and Enterprise Council, works with these employers to meet emerging needs.

Nuclear Waste

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to call in any application to store nuclear waste at Trecwn in Pembrokeshire. [56692]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: No. However, I am prepared to consider whether an individual application should be called in. As yet, I understand that no application has been made.

TREASURY

Value Added Tax

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to raise the financial threshold for service industry businesses to register for value-added tax. [56435]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise are currently undertaking a public consultation on future changes to the VAT registration threshold. Decisions on the various proposals will only be taken after careful evaluation of the representations received.

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent representations he has received concerning the impact of the strength of the pound on manufacturing industry. [56845]

Ms Hewitt: Treasury Ministers receive many representations from business organisations on a range of issues, including the exchange rate. The Government understand the difficulties caused by sterling's appreciation. The recent easing of the exchange rate should help to relieve some of the concerns of manufacturers.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes have been made to the (a) definition and (b) objectives of the public sector borrowing requirement since its inception; and what are the current objectives. [56659]

Mr. Byers: The definition of the public sector used for the public sector net cash requirement (formerly known as the public sector borrowing requirement) has always been consistent with the definition used in the national accounts prepared by the Office for National Statistics.

No changes have been made to the objectives of the public sector net cash requirement, which are to measure the cash needs of the whole public sector.

National Air Traffic Services

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to the Government's Economic and Fiscal Strategy report (Cm 3978, p.37), if it remains Government policy to sell part of National Air Traffic Services during the financial year 1999–2000; and what sale proceeds are forecast. [56689]

Ms Hewitt: It is still the Government's intention to introduce a public private partnership for NATS based on a 51 per cent. sale of shares. A consultation paper has been published. The timing of the sale will depend on the legislative timetable. It would not be appropriate to give estimates of proceeds, which are commercially sensitive, before the sale takes place.

Exports

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the value of the United Kingdom's exports to OECD countries currently in recession as defined by two successive quarters of negative growth, in each of (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000. [56693]

Ms Hewitt: Three OECD countries Japan, South Korea and New Zealand have recently had two successive quarters of negative growth. The value of UK exports of goods to these countries in 1997–98 was estimated at £5,579 million: £4,057 million for Japan; £1,100 million for South Korea, and £422 million for New Zealand. The Treasury does not publish forecasts for the value of trade with individual countries.

GDP Growth

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what account will be taken of the forecast for EU GDP growth issued by the European Commission on 21 October in his Department's forecasts for UK GDP growth in 1999; and if he will make a statement; [56768]

(2) what assessment he has made of the European Commission's forecasts of 21 October of the UK and EU rates of GDP growth; and if he will make a statement. [56767]

Ms Hewitt: New forecasts for growth will be published on 3 November as part of the Pre-Budget Report. These will take account of developments since the Budget forecast was published in March.

Unclaimed Assets

Mr. Soley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with banks, building societies and insurance companies about the amount of assets held by these organisations on behalf of people whose whereabouts are no longer known. [56944]

Ms Hewitt: None.

Mr. Soley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the amount of money held by financial institutions on behalf of individuals whose whereabouts are presently unknown. [56956]

Ms Hewitt: We have no comprehensive data on the amounts involved.

Working Families Tax Credit

Mr. Derek Twigg: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will publish details of the proposed scheme for employers to pay the working families tax credit and the disabled person's tax credit through the wage packet. [57150]

Dawn Primarolo: WFTC and DPTC will replace Family Credit (FC) and Disability Working Allowance (DWA) in October 1999 and will be administered by the Inland Revenue. From that date the Inland Revenue will process applications and pay the 26-week awards direct to all successful applicants. But from April 2000 employers will pay the tax credits to employees through the wage packet unless a couple chose to have them paid direct by the Revenue to the self-employed or non-earning partner.

The Inland Revenue has been consulting employer representatives on the design of the scheme, with the aim of minimising extra burdens on employers. The main features are as follows:

The Inland Revenue will notify employers of when to start paying a tax credit, and will give them time to adjust their payroll. The notification will tell the employer how much tax credit to pay and when to stop. In order to preserve the applicant's confidentiality the notification will refer only to 'tax credits'. It will not distinguish between WFTC and DPTC, nor will it list the various elements of the award.

Once notified when to start payments, the employer will add the amount of the tax credit (calculated using the daily rate supplied by the Revenue) to the employee's net wages for each pay period.

Employers will continue to pay the tax credits until the end of the 26-week award unless notified by the Inland Revenue to stop paying sooner. A recipient who changes jobs or leaves employment will be responsible for letting the Revenue know of these changes.

When the employer is not paying the tax credit—at the beginning of an award, or where the employee has left the employer—the Revenue will be responsible for making direct payment to the recipient, thus ensuring that there is no gap in payments.

Employers will set off the amounts of tax credit they pay against their PAYE and NIC liabilities. Employers whose liabilities are too small to cover the WFTC and DPTC due will be able to apply to the Revenue for funding.

The Inland Revenue will be providing information and support, both before and after April 2000, to help employers meet their new obligations.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Income Support (Mortgage Interest)

Mr. Love: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate he has made of the losses in respect of income support with mortgage interest arising from (a) fraud, (b) claimant error and (c) agency error in each of the last five years; what efforts are being made to reduce these losses; and if he will make a statement. [55218]

Mr. Denham: The administration of Income Support is a matter for Peter Mathison, Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Andrew Love, dated 26 October 1998:

The Secretary for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking what estimates he has made of the losses in respect of Income Support (IS) with mortgage interest from (a) fraud, (b) claimant error and (c) agency error in each of the last five years; what efforts are being made to reduce these losses.

The information is not available in the format requested. The Benefits Agency (BA) estimates of the level of fraud within major benefits are informed by the BA's Benefit Review programme.

However, the IS reviews did not separately identify losses arising from fraud where mortgage interest was included. BA's Quality Support Teams provide estimates of agency error on certain benefits including IS. Estimates relating to claimant error could only be provided at disproportionate cost. Estimates for agency error are enclosed on the attached table.

The Agency is actively looking at ways of working with mortgage lenders to prevent losses where the benefit includes mortgage interest. The vast majority of IS claimant's eligible housing costs have been paid direct to their mortgage lenders under the Mortgage Interest Direct (MID) arrangements since May 1992.

The Agency undertook a comprehensive mortgage scrutiny during 1994. The findings of the scrutiny supported the streamlining of the MID scheme. From October 1995 the MID scheme was simplified by introducing a standard interest rate (SIR) which eased the administration of the scheme and removed the reliance on customers for up to date mortgage information.

BA have introduced a number of measures to tackle fraud and incorrectness across all benefits including the introduction of a mandatory pre-payment check and a review of the poorest performing districts. Other initiatives introduced are enhancements to our computer system (relating to deductions from benefit), automating case reviews, increasing the number of pre-payment checks, funding additional training initiatives, new claim visits and targeted reviews, new checks on identity and new evidence based checks on claim details.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Estimates of Income Support mortgage interest losses due to official error

£ million

Year	Official error
April 1995—March 1996	92.46
April 1996—March 1997	33.27
April 1997—March 1998	21.10

Notes:

1. This information has been provided by the BA's Quality Support programme of visits, it is provisional and may be subject to change.
2. This information has been extracted from samples checked by the BA's Quality Support programme to provide national accuracy results in percentage and monetary accuracy terms. These results reflect the accuracy of benefit processing by BA staff, based on the documentation and information available.
3. BA monetary value of error results between 1995 and 1998 were based on samples of between 30,000 and 60,000 cases and are subject to a margin of error of plus or minus ten per cent.
4. Extracting data from the sample in respect of one type of error, substantially reduces the statistical validity of the resulting figures. The monetary values quoted for mortgage error give an indication of the scale of the over and underpayments identified in the course of the Quality Support programmes. However, these values should be treated with caution. A substantial checking exercise would be required to provide figures with greater statistical validity.
5. The information for 1995–96 is based on a twelve month sample period and includes all claimant groups including the unemployed and reflects the introduction of the Standard Interest Rate in October 1995.
6. The data for 1996–97 are based on a six month period but has been annualised to project a full year. The estimate is based on the latter half of the year following the introduction of Jobseeker's Allowance in October 1996 and does not include information relation to unemployed claimants.
7. The data for 1997–98 are based on a six month period at the start of the year and annualised to project a full year. This is because the end of year data are still being finalised.

Information (Benefits)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about his proposals to improve access to general information about benefits; and if the restoration of the freephone social security line is being considered. [56022]

Angela Eagle: Questions on Benefits Agency operational matters are the responsibility of its Chief Executive, Peter Mathison. He will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Dr. Lynne Jones, dated 26 october 1998:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about his proposals to improve access to general information about benefits and if the restoration of the freephone social security line is being considered.

The Benefits Agency is currently simplifying and refocusing its provision of benefit information. The information will focus on what customers want and need to know to claim benefit. It will give them clear sign posts about where to get more information. This work is being taken forward under the title of "Project Access". The first new leaflets are being introduced at the end of November 1998.

Our intention for the future would allow customers to obtain accurate information through various media including by post, in person, by telephone, and electronically.

There are no current plans to reintroduce the national Freeline service which would lack the information links needed to provide the individual, customer-focused advice, which is critical to our vision of an active modern service.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people have (a) applied for and (b) been awarded incapacity benefit in each of the last three years. [55935]

Mr. Timms: The information is set out in the table.

Number of claims to and awards of incapacity benefit (IB)

	New claims	IB awards[1]
1 March 1995–29 February 1996[2]	1,072,456	535,100

Benefit Integrity Project

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will exempt Huntington's disease sufferers from the benefit integrity project; and if he will make a statement. [55704]

Mr. Timms: The question of making further exemptions to the Benefit Integrity Project in cases of Neurological disease, which includes Huntington's disease, was raised at the last meeting of the Disability Benefits Forum on 23 September. We undertook to look at the case for making further amendments and we will be making an announcement in the near future.

Pensions

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what research he has undertaken into the preferred method of payment of state pensions in (a) urban areas and (b) rural areas; and what is his policy on the method of payment of state pensions. [55773]

Mr. Denham: The Department has commissioned one study of claimants' preferences with respect to methods of payment. This study is presently under way. The Government remain committed to providing a secure, convenient and cost effective method of payment for all our customers.

Benefits

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost to public funds of introducing for (a) all new claimants and (b) all claimants, a requirement to look for work for (i) all state benefits and (ii) incapacity benefit; if he will estimate the number of people who (1) would lose and (2) be denied incapacity benefit indicating their average financial loss; and if he will make a statement. [56246]

Mr. Timms: The information is not available.

Care Costs

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to review the capital threshold for long-term care cost contributions; and if he will make a statement. [55706]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

A Royal Commission has been established to carry out a fundamental review of the arrangements for providing and financing long-term care. We have no plans to reconsider the thresholds in advance of the report by the Royal Commission, which is expected at the end of the year. Under the current local authority charging rules no account is taken of capital below £10,000. For capital of between £10,000 and £16,000, an income of £1 a week is assumed for each complete £250, or part of £250, held. The capital thresholds which are applied by local authority social services departments in determining an individual's ability to contribute to long-term residential care currently match the thresholds which apply to Income Support for people in residential care. The higher threshold—above which residents qualify for neither income support nor assistance with their fees from the local authority—is currently £16,000.

SCOTLAND

Water Meters

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to require the Scottish water authorities to (a) ensure that their domestic mechanical water meters are accurate and durable, (b) assess the damage caused by particulate matter in water to their domestic water meters, (c) ensure that the domestic meters which they purchase from manufacturers have been tested using unfiltered water, (d) devise a strategy to reduce meter replacements arising from meter failure, (e) assess the viability of other forms of metering equipment and (f) evaluate the effects of increased flow through of layer particulate matter arising from the use of electro-magnetic and solid state meters. [55747]

Mr. Macdonald: The installation and replacement of water meters is a matter for the water authorities, who also keep under review any alternative metering devices as they become available. There are provisions covering the accuracy and testing of water meters installed for domestic customers by the Scottish water authorities in section 54 of the Water (Scotland) Act 1980, which also provides for customers to challenge the accuracy of meter readings. The Government are currently undertaking public consultations about whether to extend to Scotland the provisions of the Measuring Equipment (Cold-water Meters) Regulations 1988 which apply in England and Wales. We have no other plans to introduce new controls.

European Structural Funds

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what have been the annual running costs for each year since their establishment, of each of the European programme directives or partnerships for the disbursement of European structural funds; and by what means such costs are scrutinised. [56252]

Mr. Macdonald: The information set out in the table is based on claims received:

Expenditure (£)

Calendar year	Strathclyde European partnership	Eastern Scotland European partnership	Dumfries and Galloway European partnership	Highlands and Islands partnership programme
1993	365,217	—	—	—
1994	325,242	10,000	91,400	259,630
1995	400,580	398,000	155,000	371,000
1996	530,630	428,000	171,000	384,900
1997	951,840	718,353	190,500	524,000

Programme Executive budgets are approved by the respective Boards or Joint Management Boards drawn from, and with responsibility, to the various programme partnerships for the operation of the Programme Executives. The partnerships meet 50 per cent. of the costs.

Programme Executive funding is also supported at 50 per cent. from technical assistance from the European Structural Funds. The technical assistance application, and by extension, the overall budget is considered and approved by the Programme Monitoring Committee.

Expenditure and claims for technical assistance are scrutinised in accordance with recognised payment and audit procedures as laid down by the Scottish Office, the National Audit Office and the European Commission.

Prescription Charges (Cancer Treatment)

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the projected cost to the National Health Service in Scotland of extending prescription charge exemptions to include those recovering from cancer. [56165]

Mr. Galbraith: It is not possible to identify separately the cost of items prescribed and dispensed for those people recovering from cancer. The NHS prescription form does not record the medical diagnosis for which a drug has been prescribed.

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what research his Department has evaluated into the effectiveness of Tamoxifen as an anti-cancer treatment; and if he will assess the advantages of extending the exemption from prescription charges to include those who are required to use it as part of their continuing treatment. [56163]

Mr. Galbraith: The Scottish Office Department of Health has not evaluated any research into the effectiveness of Tamoxifen as an anti-cancer treatment.

The current prescription charge exemption arrangements were reviewed as part of the Government's Comprehensive Spending Review. Following the Review, all current prescription charge exemptions will be protected for the rest of the Parliament and existing patient charges will rise by no more than the rate of inflation over the next 3 years.

Extending the list of conditions giving rise to medical exemption would provide help only to those whose income is about the level for help on low income grounds. In the light of competing demands for increased NHS spending, extending the list would not be making the best use of NHS resources.

HEALTH

Breast Cancer

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the £100 million extra National Lottery funds announced by the Prime Minister to be allocated to breast cancer treatment will be used to increase the drug budget for cancer drugs. [56043]

Mr. Boateng: An extra £400 million will be made available to the new opportunities fund (NOF) between now and 2001 to be spent on cancer prevention, treatment and care; green spaces and sustainable communities; and community access to lifelong learning. A consultation paper setting out the new NOF initiatives will be published in the next few weeks before Parliamentary approval of the initiatives is sought. Decisions on funding will be taken once the consultation is completed.

Primary Care Groups

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what method of public accountability he intends to introduce to monitor the use of resources by primary health care groups. [56211]

Mr. Milburn: As a committee of the health authority, the primary care group board will be accountable through its chair to the chief executive of the health authority.

Oncologists

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he intends to take to increase the number of oncologists per head of population. [56041]

Mr. Boateng: The Specialty Workforce Advisory Group (SWAG) makes recommendations to the Department about the number of higher specialist trainees needed to meet future requirements for consultants in each specialty, including medical oncology and radiotherapy (clinical oncology). Estimates of future requirements are informed by the views of National Health Service management, the medical profession and other interested parties, who are represented on SWAG. Over the past three years SWAG has made recommendations for increases in medical oncology and radiotherapy, which will result in extra numbers of qualified candidates for consultant posts from 1999/2000 onwards.

Tobacco

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he proposes to publish the White Paper on Tobacco Control; and if he will make a statement. [56035]

Ms Jowell: We expect to publish the White Paper before the House rises for the Christmas recess. It will set out our comprehensive tobacco control strategy including the timescale for implementation of the tobacco advertising and sponsorship directive in United Kingdom law.

AIDS Support Grant

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to announce the level of AIDS support grant for the next financial year. [56765]

Ms Jowell: The level of AIDS Support Grant for the next financial year will be £15.5 million (an increase of almost 12 per cent. on 1998–99) and the planning figures for 2000–01 and 2001–02 are £16 million and £16.5 million respectively.

Health Improvement Programmes

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the main criteria for the establishment of health improvement programmes; and what progress has been made in the establishment of such programmes. [56652]

Mr. Milburn: Health improvement programmes will be the local strategies for improving health and health care. Health authorities have lead responsibility for their development. They will be expected to do this through a fully inclusive process, engaging primary care groups, National Health Service trusts, local authorities, the voluntary sector, local employers and others, users, carers and local communities. Full guidance on the new arrangements has been issued in Health Service Circular 1998/167 Local Authority Circular (98)23: "Health Improvement Programmes: Planning for Better Health and Better Health Care". Copies are available in the Library.

The first health improvement programmes (HImPs) are to cover the three year period beginning April 1999. They are to be developed through a rolling programme and the first HImPs will need to include plans for their future development.

Physiotherapy Services (West Sussex)

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made of the impact of the end of GP fundholding on the provision of physiotherapy outpatient services for patients in West Sussex. [56642]

Mr. Milburn [holding answer 26 October 1998]: The Government are committed to building on those elements of the general practitioner fundholding scheme that worked and to extending them to the whole community. Where benefits have been achieved for patients the aim will be to maintain and spread these advantages under the arrangements for shifting fundholders' responsibilities to primary care groups (PCGs) and health authorities.

Whether services, such as physiotherapy, are affordable within the resources available to a PCG will be for the PCG to decide, taking into account equality of opportunity of access to services. The West Sussex Health Authority is concerned to work with its PCGs to offer continuity in services, if at all possible. A first step will be identifying their range and cost. The health authority will then be discussing with each PCG the relative priority they will place on them.

Overhead Power Lines

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received on the dangers to health from overhead power lines. [56848]

Ms Jowell: The Department has responded to several representations during this Administration about the possible health effects of electromagnetic fields (EMFs) from power lines and the alleged health effects of EMFs generally, including 9 Parliamentary Questions and 8 letters.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Welfare to Work

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many former incapacity benefit recipients have (a) transferred to IS/JSA and (b) entered employment at the end of their claim, in each of the last three years. [55939]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The number of people who actually made a claim to unemployment benefits and the number who were placed into employment, in each of the last three operational years, is shown in the table.

	1995–96	1996–97	1997–98
Total number of new claims taken on behalf of ex-IB claimants	40,257	76,551	109,995
Total number of job placings of ex-IB claimants	920	3,535	5,323

Social Fund

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will place in the Library copies of EU Objective 3 Social Fund application forms used by other European Union member states. [55716]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Officials in the Department of Education and Employment's European Social Fund Unit have written to each member state to request a copy of their current Objective 3 application form. Copies will be placed in the Library when they are received.

GNVQ Courses

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to require the publication of GNVQ results and league tables for institutions offering GNVQ courses. [56206]

Ms Estelle Morris: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment will publish the Secondary School and College Performance Tables shortly, which will include institutions' results in relevant GNVQs.

The tables for pupils of compulsory school age will include the Part One GNVQ and Foundation and Intermediate GNVQs combined with GCSEs. The tables for 16–18 year olds will include results for Advanced level GNVQs.

Reading

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice his Department gives to education authorities on the optimum age at which to commence reading in schools; and what changes there have been in this advice in the last 10 years. [56342]

Ms Estelle Morris: The National Curriculum has always required reading to be taught from the start of compulsory schooling. The National Literacy Strategy "Framework for teaching" sets out reading objectives for each year, including Reception.

Sure Start Programme

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many staff will be employed as outreach workers to visit families under the Sure Start programme; what the cost of the staff will be; and what will be their terms of reference. [56847]

Ms Hodge: Outreach will be a key part of Sure Start and will build on existing infrastructures including those in the health and voluntary sectors. Costs will be met from within the Sure Start budget for England of £452 million over the next three years. The Government will be issuing guidance for Sure Start projects in due course. The exact arrangements for outreach work will be for local projects to decide.

School Standards and Effectiveness Unit

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many staff are currently employed in the School Standards and Effectiveness Unit; and what is the budgeted cost of publications issued by the unit in the current financial year. [56846]

Ms Estelle Morris: As of 30 September 1998 there were 137 staff employed in the Standards and Effectiveness Unit (SEU).

The total budgeted cost of SEU publications in the current financial year is £3.8 million, of which £2 million relates to the implementation of the Literacy and Numeracy Strategies in primary schools.

National Learning Targets

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans the Government have to announce new national learning targets. [57038]

Mr. Mudie: My noble Friend the Minister for Education and Employment will be announcing new National Learning Targets for England tomorrow. They will cover 16-year-olds, young people post-school, adults and organisations, in addition to the targets for 11-year-olds already announced. Copies will be placed in the Library.

Schools (Hackney)

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he has authorised the Chief Executive of OFSTED to make public statements on the future control of Hackney's schools; and if he will make a statement. [56910]

Ms Estelle Morris: Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools is free to report on the situation in any school or LEA which OFSTED has inspected.

It is for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to make decisions about the use of his powers under the new School Standards and Framework Act 1998.

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to increase resources for Hackney's schools and to raise morale among pupils and teachers. [56911]

Ms Estelle Morris: Hackney currently receives over 40 per cent. more education SSA funding per pupil than the national average. Decisions on resources for individual authorities for 1999–2000 will be announced later in the autumn. At this stage, nothing has been ruled in or out.

Before the end of the year we intend to publish a Green Paper which will set out our vision for the future of the teaching profession. The paper will detail plans for improving the status and morale of teachers by rewarding good teachers in difficult schools and providing a new structure of promotion opportunities. It will also give details of investment to support improved professional development to build on measures already in hand on training, induction and appraisal. I hope that Hackney teachers will play a full part in the consultation process.

Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions he or his officials have had with the Chief Executive of OFSTED on handing over control of Hackney's schools to a private company; and if he will make a statement. [56909]

Ms Estelle Morris: No such discussions have taken place.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Piers

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what is his policy in respect of the preservation of traditional British seaside resort piers. [55709]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Government fully support the preservation of historic seaside piers. Public funding is available from English Heritage (or the equivalent agency in Wales, Scotland or Northern Ireland) and from the National Heritage Memorial Fund and Heritage Lottery Fund. To date, the National Heritage Memorial Fund has made three awards, totalling £1.2 million, for the restoration of historic piers, and the Heritage Lottery Fund eight awards, totalling £15 million.

Medieval Villages

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he plans next to conduct a survey of deserted medieval villages in England; and if he will make a statement. [56171]

Mr. Alan Howarth: Following an earlier survey of deserted medieval settlements in England, English Heritage has identified about 2,000 such sites as possible candidates for either new or continuing statutory protection. Following further research into these sites, 104 such recommendations have so far been made to my Department and a further 50 recommendations are in preparation. Studies are continuing into the other sites.

Dance and Drama Training

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what assessment he has made of the Arts Council report "Fitness for Purpose" by Edward Birk on the provision of dance and drama training; and if he will make a statement. [56413]

Mr. Alan Howarth [holding answer 26 October 1998]: My Department and the Department for Education and Employment are working towards establishing a long term solution to the funding difficulties being experienced by students undertaking vocational studies in dance, drama and stage management. The Arts Council of England's "Fitness for Purpose" report is a helpful contribution to this debate and will inform our consideration of the issues.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Housing Development

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his oral answer of 20 October 1998, Official Report, column 1067, concerning housing development, when he last met members of the housebuilding industry to discuss future housing developments; and if he will make a statement. [56518]

Mr. Raynsford: I last met members of the housebuilding industry at the British Construction Industry Awards on 21 October 1998.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his oral answer of 20 October 1998, Official Report, column 1067, concerning housing development, if he will list the organisations which were present at the meeting on 19 October to which he referred; where the meeting was held; and if he will make a statement. [56519]

Mr. Raynsford: The meeting was the launch reception of the London Young Labour Councillor Network held in the Jubilee Room of the House of Commons, where I met representatives of the House-Builders Federation and Laing Homes.

Right to Roam

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will place in the Library the complete set of responses to his consultation document on the Right to Roam. [56363]

Mr. Meacher: Copies of responses to the consultation paper Access to the Open Countryside in England and Wales were placed in my Department's Library on 12 October, with the exception of those from respondents who asked that they should not be made available in this way. A list of non-confidential responses has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Housing (South-West)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will meet the delegation of South-West Liberal Democrat Members to discuss housing targets in the region. [55696]

Mr. Caborn: The Secretary of State has no plans to meet the delegation of hon. Members and I would refer the hon. Member to the Secretary of State's letter of 5 October to the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) concerning our approach to planning for England's housing needs.

British Rail Property

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which former British Rail sites, since the privatisation of British Rail, have been sold or leased for developments serviced by road haulage. [56343]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information is not available.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what acreage of unutilised former British Rail land has been allocated to (a) Railtrack and (b) the British Transport Property Board. [56344]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information could be compiled only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what criteria have been used to divide British Rail land between Railtrack and the British Transport Property Board. [56242]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand that when Railtrack was created in 1994 by the previous Government, it was allocated the operational land and those non-operational sites and disused sections of line which stood a realistic prospect of future railways use; BR only retained sites and sections of line which were not thought at the time to meet that criterion.

School Transport

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what alternatives to transporting children to and from school by car his Department is actively promoting. [56071]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A wide range of local initiatives to reduce car use on the journey to and from school already exist. My Department is drawing on this work to develop separate guidance on best practice for both local authorities and schools. The School Travel Advisory Group will move forward quickly to raise the profile of school travel issues and identify practical means of influencing behaviour.

Freight Haulage

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which United Kingdom freight hauliers have informed him of their intention to register their fleets outside the United Kingdom. [56646]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: There is no notification requirement for United Kingdom freight hauliers who intend to register their fleets outside the United Kingdom.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what are his Department's estimates of the number of continental European road freight vehicles carrying United Kingdom loads to United Kingdom destinations as a proportion of total road freight. [56648]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: It is estimated that 0.04 per cent. of total road freight activity in the UK is undertaken by European vehicles carrying United Kingdom loads to United Kingdom destinations.

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will monitor the effect of increasing the allowed maximum weight of lorries on British roads on the balance between rail and road freight haulage. [56159]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department will continue to monitor domestic freight transport by mode including the balance of freight between road and rail as well as other modes such as water and pipeline. The effect of heavier lorries on rail will be an important part of the review of the case for heavier lorries which we will be asking the Commission for Integrated Transport to undertake.

Social Housing

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the extent of a reduction in demand for social housing; and if he will publish the sources and nature of the evidence his Department has collated. [56277]

Mr. Raynsford: Much of the current research on low demand is small scale and based on a diverse range of definitions and methodologies, including estimates extrapolated from a small number of sample case studies. There is, therefore, a range of disparate figures on the scale and distribution of the apparent reduction in demand for social housing. Evidence from 1997 local authority Housing Investment Programme returns to my Department suggests that the incidence of vacancies in social housing is increasing, particularly in the northern regions.

My Department has recently commissioned Heriot-Watt University to carry out research that will provide robust data on the nature and extent of low demand across all tenures. The research will also identify practical solutions for tackling the complex problems connected with reduced demand. The study will report in late 1999. The research will inform the work of an Action Team set up to tackle the problems of unpopular housing as part of the new national strategy for neighbourhood renewal being brought together by the Social Exclusion Unit.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his Department's press release of 21 October 1998 in respect of genetically modified crops, (a) when the first commercial planting will take place, (b) what specific measures are to accompany any such release to prevent possible cross-contamination and (c) for what length of time the long-term monitoring arrangement for each individual release is planned to continue. [56653]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 26 October 1998]: The answer is as follows:

(a) We have reached agreement that there will be no commercial planting of insect-resistant genetically modified crops for 3 years and no commercial planting of herbicide-tolerant genetically modified crops for at least 1 year in the first instance and only then if we are satisfied that the evidence shows that they would be unlikely to pose a risk either to human health or the environment either directly or indirectly.

(b) The crops will be grown in compliance with a code of practice being drawn up by the industry body Supply Chain Initiative on Modified Agricultural Crops (SCIMAC). This includes specific measures to ensure separation between genetically modified and non-genetically modified crops to prevent cross-pollination. The exact distances will be determined on a crop by crop basis, but based on current protocols for production of certified seed.

(c) The details of the long term monitoring of the farm-scale plantings to be undertaken in 1999 have yet to be agreed with English Nature and the other conservation interests. We will review the results at the end of the first year. However, I would expect monitoring to continue for about 3 years.

Investment

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the comparative levels of investment in (a) roads and (b) railways in each member state of the European Union in the last year for which figures are available. [56759]

Ms Glenda Jackson: 1995 data published by European Conference of Ministers of Transport are given in the table.

1995 investment expenditure in million ecus

Member state	Roads	Railways
Austria	477	475
Belgium	965	699
Denmark	335	227
Finland	772	235
France	9,088	1,539
Germany	13,924	5,924
Greece	516	—
Ireland	347	35.9
Italy (1993)	6,400	1,775
Luxembourg (1994)	139	18
Netherlands	1,565	504
Portugal	654	200

Drug Driving

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proportions of drivers were found to have used (a) heroin, (b) cannabis and (c) alcohol to the breathalyser limit in the tests undertaken on drug driving in the last 12 months for which figures are available. [56505]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Substances found in drivers, by proportion, are: (a) opiates—4.4 per cent. (from existing experience approximately one-third of these can be expected to have used heroin); (b) cannabis—12.5 per cent.; (c) alcohol below the legal limit—8.8 per cent.

This information has been taken from the Department's ongoing survey into the incidence of drugs found in the bodies of road accident fatalities (drivers, riders, passengers, cyclists, pedestrians). In the survey, some drugs are classified by group only.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when his Department intends to publish proposals for changes to the law relating to compulsory purchase; and if his proposals will include a wider power for local authorities to purchase empty homes. [56701]

Mr. Raynsford: An interim report of the fundamental review of compulsory purchase and compensation will be submitted at the end of the year. This will set out recommendations as to changes which can be made in the short term to deliver increased speed, efficiency and fairness to the operation of the system, as well as outlining longer term options for changes to primary legislation. It is too early to predict what recommendations might be forthcoming, although I can confirm that the remit for the review embraces the range of local authorities' compulsory purchase powers, including those relating to housing.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate his Department has made of the increase in continental European HGVs on United Kingdom roads since the abolition of cabotage rules on 1 July. [56649]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: Estimates of the number of European HGVs on United Kingdom roads are given in Table 2 of 'Road Goods Vehicles Travelling to Mainland Europe', published by the Department, and available in the Library. Figures are not yet available for the period since 1 July. We expect little, if any, change since cabotage accounts for only 0.04 per cent. of total UK road freight activity.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate his Department has made for the costs for a 40-tonne truck and trailer operating in each EU country represented by (a) VED rates, (b) fuel duty and (c) other operating charges. [56645]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: My Department does not have the necessary information on these factors in all Member States to make such a comparison.

Any meaningful comparison of the costs of operating a 40 tonne, 5-axle, articulated lorry in all Member States would need to include a wide range of factors. As well as Vehicle Excise Duty, fuel duty and their equivalents, it would need to include tolls, road user charges and normal business and employment taxes and charges. Other important variables include fuel efficiency (some hauliers are nearly twice as fuel-efficient as others), distances travelled, loading factors, and the overheads of the haulier.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate his Department has made of the number of jobs lost in the United Kingdom road freight haulage business since May 1997. [56647]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: I regret that information for the period in question is not yet available. The latest figures, which are collected in the annual Employment Survey, relate to 1996. Statistics for 1997 will be available later this year.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his Department's estimate of the increase in the cost to United Kingdom HGV operators of each class of vehicle in respect of (a) fuel duty, (b) vehicle licence duty and (c) other environmental charges since the Budget. [56651]

Ms Glenda Jackson: [holding answer 26 October 1998]: Since the Budget, UK HGV operators have incurred increases in fuel duty of 6 per cent. above the rate of inflation, for all classes of vehicle. The last Budget did not change VED rates for HGVs, other than to introduce a £500 rebate for vehicles meeting certain emission standards, to be available from January 1999. No other relevant environmental charges were introduced in the Budget.

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate his Department has made of the proportion of United Kingdom road freight travelling exclusively on United Kingdom roads which is being commissioned by United Kingdom companies using foreign HGV operators. [56650]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: The information is not available.

A12 (Hatfield Peverel Junction)

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects the improvement scheme for the junction to the A12 at Hatfield Peverel to be carried out. [56441]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: I have asked the Chief Executive of the Highways Agency, Mr. Lawrie Haynes, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Peter Nutt to Mr. John Whittingdale, dated 27 October 1998:

The Transport Minister, Glenda Jackson, has asked the Chief Executive to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question about the A12 Hatfield Peverel Junction. I am replying in Lawrie Haynes' absence.

At this early stage it is not possible to give you an indication of when work could start. We have just commissioned consultants to look at ways of improving the A12 between Hatfield Peverel and Witham Link Road, including the A12 Hatfield Peverel junction. That work will take about eighteen months to complete. Progress thereafter will depend on the outcome of any statutory procedures which might be necessary, we will take the proposals forward as quickly as practicable. I shall ensure that you are kept informed of developments.

Foxhounds

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many foxhounds he estimates were killed or injured on railway tracks in England and Wales in each of the last five years. [56268]

Ms Glenda Jackson: No official records are kept, but based on the figures provided by the British Transport Police the number for foxhounds killed or injured on the railways in England and Wales are:

Year	Foxhounds killed or injured
1998 (to date)	18
1997	14
1996	22
1995	4
1994	18

Road Safety

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what initiatives he is taking to improve road safety in England. [56548]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government are taking a number of initiatives to improve road safety. The Integrated Transport White Paper announced that there will be new casualty reduction targets for the year 2010, which will be underpinned by a road safety strategy. The strategy will set out a range of measures for meeting the targets. In addition, my noble Friend the Minister for Roads and Road Safety last week announced the start of a comprehensive review of speed policy, promised in the White Paper.

National Air Traffic Services

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he will take to establish the value of National Air Traffic Services Ltd. prior to privatisation. [56690]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The final sale route of NATS depends crucially on the details of the public private partnership, on which we are consulting at the moment. It would not be appropriate to give an estimate of the value of the company, which is commercially sensitive, before the sale takes place.

Rail Fares

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he first evaluated the research by OPRAF published on 22 October concerning trends in fare levels for rail passengers. [56691]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My right hon. Friend received briefing on this research earlier in October.

Highways Agency

Mr. Dennis Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he proposes to undertake a periodic review of the Highways Agency. [57039]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My noble Friend the Minister for Roads and Road Safety has announced today that we are to commence a periodic review of the Highways Agency. The performance of the Agency since its launch will be evaluated and a review of the options for the best management of its functions will be undertaken. It is also an appropriate moment for a review, as we set the Agency a new aim and objectives this Summer, reflecting this Government's new vision for integrated transport in relation to the English trunk road network. The Review will build on the work done during the Integrated Transport and Roads Reviews. We hope to announce the results of the review next Spring.

Sustainable Development

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Government will respond to the reports by the UK Round Table on Sustainable Development on (a) Getting the Best out of Indicators and (b) Economic Regulators. [57286]

Mr. Meacher: The Government have today published responses to these two reports by the UK Round Table on Sustainable Development.

"Getting the Best out of Indicators" has made a valuable contribution to the Government's development of a new set of Indicators as the report focused on strategic issues relating to their use and development and gave particular regard to policy and communication. The new Government indicators will, for the first time, include economic and social aspects of sustainable development together with a small group of headline Indicators. The full set of Indicators will be launched early in the new year together with the revised UK Sustainable Development Strategy.

The report on Economic Regulators was considered very carefully in light of the consultation for "A Fair Deal for Consumers" published by DTI in March. We are pleased to have been able to respond positively to many of the Round Table's recommendations, for instance setting up a framework for regulation and issuing statutory guidance on the social and environment objectives.

The Government value the work of the Round Table in helping to take forward the Sustainable Development agenda and I wish to express my gratitude to Sir Richard Southwood and the Round Table for their continued work.

I am placing copies of both the responses in the Library.

Road Tax

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress of plans to reduce road tax for vehicles with engines of 1600 cc or less. [56036]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

In his Budget speech, on 17 March 1998, Official Report, columns 1097–112, the Chancellor announced his intention of introducing a fairer and more environmentally sensitive system of vehicle excise duty. A consultation document setting out the options for reform will be published shortly. Details of the new VED scheme will be determined as a result of that consultation.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Masters of Foxhounds

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Attorney-General (1) how many masters of foxhounds have been prosecuted for criminal damage caused by packs of foxhounds in each of the last five years; how many such prosecutions were successful; and what penalties were imposed; [56266]

(2) how many prosecutions have been brought by the CPS against masters of foxhounds for hunt trespass on railway land in each of the last five years; how many prosecutions were successful; and what penalties were imposed. [56269]

The Attorney-General: The Crown Prosecution Service holds no central records in respect of the number of masters of foxhounds prosecuted for criminal offences. The information is held on individual case files and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

DEFENCE

Chemical and Biological Weapons

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been (a) made and (b) proposed to tighten the regulations on chemical and biological weapons since May 1997. [55048]

Mr. George Robertson: The United Kingdom is a State Party to both the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention (BTWC) and the Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC). These Conventions prohibit, respectively, biological and chemical weapons. They are applied in the UK by the Biological Weapons Act 1974 and the Chemical Weapons Act 1996. The 1997 Annual Report on the operation of the Chemical Weapons Act was laid before Parliament in February 1998.

The White Paper on Strategic Export Controls, presented to Parliament by the then President of the Board of Trade on 1 July 1998, includes proposals to strengthen the Chemical Weapons Act by making it an offence "to aid, abet, counsel or procure a foreigner overseas to develop, produce or use a chemical weapon".

The White Paper also proposes that prohibitions in relation to biological weapons should be brought into line with the strengthened Chemical Weapons Act.

The UK is playing an active role in the current negotiations in Geneva on measures to strengthen the BTWC, as set out in paragraph 37–38 of Supporting Essay 5 of the Strategic Defence Review. Implementation in the UK of these measures when agreed is likely in due course to require further domestic legislation. The content of that legislation will depend on the content of the agreements reached.

Air Travel Costs

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what fees were charged to Bath Travel for the use of the facilities at the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency at Boscombe Down for a commercial flight by Concorde in August; and if those fees have been paid. [55469]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 19 October 1998]: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from John Chisholm to Mr. Robert Key, dated 27 October 1998:

I have been asked to reply to your question about fees charged to Bath Travel for the use of facilities at DERA's airfield at Boscombe Down for a commercial flight by Concorde in August of this year.

The flight, which took place on 12 August, was organised by Bath Travel, a local travel agency, acting on behalf of the tour operator, Cunard Line Ltd.

Bath Travel made no use of DERA facilities at Boscombe Down, having carried out passenger reception and baggage check prior to the arrival of the passengers at the airfield and consequently no charges were levied.

As the tour operator, Cunard Line Ltd. were charged £3,482.18 inclusive of VAT for the airfield services relating to the Concorde flight. The level of charging was determined in accordance with standard Ministry of Defence policy guidance. An invoice was raised on 21 August and payment is awaited.

I hope this is helpful.

Royal Marines

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Marines personnel have left the service on health grounds in each of the last five years. [55809]

Mr. Doug Henderson: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

RAF Pilots

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which RAF squadrons currently have a shortage of trained pilots; and what is the total extent of the shortfalls. [55816]

Mr. Doug Henderson: As at 1 September 1998, 78 established pilot posts on RAF operational squadrons were vacant, out of a total establishment of 957. The following squadrons were affected: nos 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 17, 22, 25, 27, 29, 30, 32, 33, 41, 43, 47, 51, 54, 70, 72, 78, 101, 111, 120, 202, 206, 216, 230, 617.

Nuclear Disarmament

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the World Court statement of 8 July 1996 relating to the obligation to pursue negotiations on nuclear disarmament under effective international control. [56027]

Mr. George Robertson: We have consistently made clear that we welcome the International Court of Justice's recognition of the importance of the obligations of all States under Article VI of the Non-Proliferation Treaty, including the Nuclear Weapon States' obligations on nuclear disarmament.

Star Wars

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what involvement Britain has in the continuing US SDI-star wars programme. [55788]

Mr. George Robertson: Britain's involvement in the US SDI-star wars programme (now known as Ballistic Missile Defence (BMD)) consists of research into BMD technologies where there is a common interest.

Aircraft Tyres

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the maximum recommended usage for tyres for each type of RAF aircraft; and what was the (a) mean, (b) median and (c) maximum recorded usage in each of the last three years. [56059]

Mr. Doug Henderson: No maximum recommended usage is prescribed for RAF aircraft tyres. Aircraft tyres are inspected to assess wear and damage after each flight. If the wear or damage exceeds the limits set by the tyre manufacturer, then the tyre is replaced. Detailed information about the levels of tyre usage is not held centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the annual requirement for tyres for each type of RAF aircraft; and what is the total RAF requirement for aircraft tyres. [56052]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The RAF's total estimated annual requirement for tyres, by aircraft type, is recorded in the table.

Aircraft	Number of tyres
BAe 146	35
Hercules	185
Nimrod	343
Harrier	4,561
Tornado	4,049
Puma	92
Sentry	60
Wessex	29
Canberra	23
Dominie/HS125	113
VC10	279
Bulldog	155
Hawk	728
Jaguar	500
Tucano	245
Tristar	185
Chinook	121
Jetstream	167
Sea King	255
Total	12,125

Note:
Figures include new and retreaded tyres

The number of tyres used by each aircraft type each year is not recorded centrally, and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Armed Forces Personnel (Marital Breakdown)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into a correlation between marital breakdown among armed forces personnel and the undertaking of extended spells of overseas duty. [55866]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: To the best of my knowledge my Department has not commissioned or evaluated any specific research of this nature.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of known incidences of marital breakdown in the armed forces (a) in total and (b) relative to the rate in the population as a whole in each of the last five years. [55864]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: My Department does not hold statistics of the nature requested.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures are in place to ensure that the armed forces provide counselling and support for personnel involved in marital breakdown. [55865]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: The Armed Forces attach great importance to the welfare of their people.

All three Services provide specialist welfare staff, in the UK and overseas, who offer Service personnel counselling and support on a wide range of social issues, including marital breakdown. The Royal Navy and the Army have recently set up confidential support telephone helplines for Service personnel and their dependants for all welfare related issues, whilst the Royal Air Force has a similar facility for personnel which deals with cases of racial or sexual harassment.

As part of the overall welfare provision, the Armed Forces also provide personnel and their families with advice on coping with separation while personnel are away from home on duty, and managing homecomings.

The full range of healthcare and social services provided by central and local government in the U.K., are available to the Service community; the Services seek to replicate these facilities overseas wherever practicable.

Within the U.K., Service families will be subject to the requirements of the Family Law Act 1996 when it comes into effect next year. Responsibility for implementation of this rests with the Lord Chancellor's Department. Overseas, where MOD voluntarily aims to replicate U.K. practice where possible, the Armed Forces are actively examining how the Act can be implemented in light of circumstances and conditions of service.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Terrorist Suspects (Interviews)

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken to make available audio-recording facilities for interviews with persons arrested under the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998; and if he will make a statement. [55994]

Mr. Straw: A number of steps have recently been taken with regard to the tape recording of interviews with terrorist suspects. These would therefore apply in circumstances where a suspect was being questioned in connection with the offence of being a member of a specified and proscribed organisation, as set out in section 2 of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989 (PTA) or section 30 of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, as amended by sections 1 and 2 of the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998 respectively.

In Scotland, interviews with terrorist suspects have not thus far generally been audio recorded. However, in the context of the passage of the 1998 Act, it was decided that such interviews should be tape recorded in future. Police forces in Scotland are currently considering what arrangements need to be put in place to accommodate this change in practice.

In Northern Ireland, section 53A of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996, as inserted by the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1998, makes statutory provision for police interviews with terrorist suspects to be audio recorded. Section 53A requires a draft Code of Practice to be drawn up, put out for consultation and brought into effect by Orders subject to the affirmative resolution procedure. The draft Code of Practice was published yesterday for public consultation.

In England and Wales, the police already audio record, on a voluntary basis, interviews with those arrested under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1989.

It is envisaged that interviews with suspects arrested in connection with the conspiracy provisions in sections 5–7 of the Criminal Justice (Terrorism and Conspiracy) Act 1998, but in respect of non terrorist-related offences, would be dealt with under the usual arrangements in each jurisdiction for police interviews of non-terrorist suspects. As such, where in England and Wales or Northern Ireland, the suspect is being interviewed in connection with an indictable offence (including an offence triable either way), or in Scotland an imprisonable offence, interviews would be audio recorded.

The forthcoming consultation paper on permanent United Kingdom wide counter-terrorist legislation will look at the audio recording of interviews with terrorist suspects in the context of a wider review of detention arrangements.

Metropolitan Police

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) recruitments to, (b) retirements from, (c) resignations from and (d) applications to join the Metropolitan Police there were in each month from January to October. [56241]

Kate Hoey: The Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police provided the information requested, as follows:

1998	(a) Recruits	(b) Retirements	(c) Resignations	(d) Applications to join
January	98	98	19	438
February	75	68	25	623

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is his most recent projection of the number of staff to be employed in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate in each of the next four years; [56186]

(2) what is his most recent projection of the number of immigration officers in each of the next four years. [56187]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Detailed plans, including staffing projections, for the Immigration and Nationality Directorate have still to be finalised.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff were employed in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate on 1 May 1997; and how many were employed at the most recent available date for which figures are available. [56185]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Figures for May 1997 are not readily available, but on 1 April 1997 the total number of staff employed in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate was 5,687. The current number is 5,615.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many computer systems have been installed in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate since 1 May 1997 which were not planned for on 1 May 1997; and how many have been planned for the directorate since 1 May 1997. [56169]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Immigration and Nationality Directorate's (IND) Information Technology (IT) needs over the next few years will be met mainly through the Casework Programme System. We also announced in the White Paper "Fairer, Faster and Firmer—A Modern Approach to Immigration and Asylum" that we would undertake a study of options for using IT to support the integration of pre-entry, on-entry and enforcement activity and to help modernise the labour intensive process of passenger clearance.

In addition, the following 11 major systems have been both planned and installed in IND since 1 May 1997:

File Tracking System Upgrade
E-mail External Links and enhancements
Home Office Directory 2
Operational Planning and Support Service
Corporate Desktop
Angel Square Presenting Officer Unit Desktop Support
Strategy and Legislation Team Desktop Support
Asylum and Appeals Policy Desktop Support
Asylum Support Team Desktop Support
Carriers' Liability Replacement
Immigration Service Enforcement Forgery System Internet Information Services.

The following 10 major systems have been planned in the IND since 1 May 1997, but are yet to be fully implemented:

Building and Accommodation Services Help Desk
Personnel Management Training Support System
INDIS—Intelligence Section Database
Personnel Open Learning System
Delmis—Detention Management Database
Detention Accounts Replacement
POISE Desktop in IND (Corporate Desktop Applications including Internet)
IT2000 in IND (Corporate Desktop and Business Changes for the new Millennium)
Applix Help Desk—IT Service Help Desk
Asylum Fingerprinting Bureau Replacement.

214 individual applications and small system implementations have been planned and installed since 1 May 1997; 120 have been planned since 1 May 1997 but are yet to be implemented.

Asylum Casework

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much investment in the determination of asylum casework has been made since 1 May 1997; and how much new investment has been planned since 1 May 1997. [56167]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The estimated cost to the Home Office of processing asylum applications, excluding most overheads in 1997–98, was about £14 million. In 1998–99, up to £15 million is available.

We announced in the White Paper "Fairer, Faster and Firmer—a Modern Approach to Immigration and Asylum" that the Immigration and Nationality Directorate spending limits will increase by £120 million over three years from April 1999. One of the key objectives of this investment is to speed up the handling of asylum applications. By increasing the number of asylum cases decided to 59,000 in 1999–2000, 65,000 in 2000–01, and 65,000 in 20001–02 the Government aim is (on current intake forecasts) that, by April 2001, the backlog will be cleared and decision times will be two months or less.

Extradition (Spain)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many requests the United Kingdom has received from Spain for the extradition of persons to Spain in each of the last five years; and how many have been (a) granted and (b) refused. [56254]

Mr. Straw: The information is given in the table.

Year	Number of requests sought by Spain	Requests granted	Requests refused
1993	7	1	2
1994	11	—	2
1995	8	2	—
1996	6	—	1
1997	6	—	—
Total	38	3	5

Note:
Of the 30 requests unaccounted for:
7 were withdrawn;
23 are outstanding

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many requests by the United Kingdom for the extradition of persons from Spain are currently outstanding. [56253]

Mr. Straw: The number of extradition requests to Spain outstanding is 25.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many requests by the UK for the extradition of persons from Spain have been (a) granted and (b) declined in each of the last five years. [56274]

Mr. Straw: The information is given in the table.

Year	Requests by United Kingdom	Requests granted	Requests refused
1993	7	4	—
1994	13	9	1
1995	15	6	—
1996	17	8	1
1997	8	2	—
Total	60	29	2

Of the 29 requests unaccounted for:
1 fugitive was discharged by Spanish courts;
1 fugitive returned voluntarily;
14 requests were withdrawn by the United Kingdom; and 13 remain outstanding.

Policing

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated into the targeted policing of areas; and if he will publish it. [56181]

Mr. Michael: The Home Office has carried out many studies of various aspects of targeted policing. Relevant studies carried out in the last three years are:

Combating burglary: an evaluation of three strategies (Operation Bumblebee)—published 1995.

Policing problem housing estates—published 1996.

Problem Oriented Policing: Brit Pop—published 1996.

Tackling local drug markets—published 1997.

Biting back: reducing repeat victimisation in Huddersfield—published 1997.

Tackling street robbery: an evaluation of Operation Eagle Eye—published 1998.

Most recently, we launched "Brit-Pop II: Problem Oriented Policing in practice" at the first United Kingdom National Problem Oriented Policing conference, attended by many police forces, local authorities and representatives of other organisations.

Current work—all due for publication in 1999—is set out as follows:

Reducing domestic violence in Killingbeck.

Solving residential burglary—targeting in-progress burglaries.

Preventing repeat burglary in Cambridge.

Proactive policing on Merseyside.

Policing anti-social behaviour.

Evaluation of crackdown and consolidation strategy in Boggart Hill.

Evaluation of burglary reduction in Middlesborough.

Market reduction initiative against theft in the Medway towns.

Drug markets and street prostitution.

Situational approaches to policing drug markets.

Reducing repeat bank robbery.

Illegal parking in disabled bays.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the letter of 24 August 1998 from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), if the 20 people of Albanian origin who were located in Hounslow after entering the country clandestinely remain in the United Kingdom. [56256]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Shortly after the incident on 3 July, a group of 22 ethnic Albanians from the Kosovo region of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia reported to Lunar House in Croydon, saying they had been directed there by the Hounslow police. I believe the two groups are one and the same. They applied for asylum and I understand that their applications are awaiting consideration.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many employers have been (a) investigated, (b) charged, (c) prosecuted and (d) convicted under section 8(1) of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996, to the latest convenient date. [56464]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: To date, the approach of the Immigration Service towards the enforcement of section 8 of the Asylum and Immigration Act 1996 has been that where, in the course of normal operational activity, an employer is found to have breached section 8, they will be advised of its provisions and issued with a warning letter. Among other things, this warns them that, if they continue to offend, consideration will be given to prosecution. There is no central record of the number of such letters which have been issued: and there have been no prosecutions to date.

This will continue to be our normal approach. However, as we made clear in the White Paper "Fairer, Faster and Firmer—A Modern Approach to Immigration and Asylum", where there is evidence of organised racketeering and the exploitation of vulnerable groups of overseas workers, we will encourage the early referral of the case to the prosecuting authorities.

Handguns

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offences involving (a) airguns, (b) handguns and (c) shotguns were committed in the period (i) 12 months prior to the imposition of the ban on the ownership of handguns and (ii) 12 months following the imposition of the ban. [56175]

Mr. Michael: The readily available information relates to the period nine months before and nine months after the prohibition of the larger calibre handguns (those in excess of .22 calibre) on 1 July 1997. (All handguns were prohibited from 1 February 1998.)

543 notifiable offences were recorded by the police in which shotguns were reported to have been used in the period 1 October 1996 to 30 June 1997, and 420 in the period 1 July 1997 to 31 March 1998.

The figures for handguns were 2,200 and 1,951 respectively.

Similar information is not available centrally for air weapon offences, as only annual returns are made by police forces.

Prisoners (Drug Prescriptions)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what levels of dose of (a) Largactil, (b) chloral hydrate, (c) tranquillisers and (d) other neuroleptic drugs are given to women prisoners on (a) admission to prison and (b) discharge from prison. [56056]

Mr. George Howarth: The dose of medication required in any particular case is a matter for the responsible prison doctor to decide in the light of the diagnosis, the assessed clinical needs of the patient and the guidance provided by the British National Formulary.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recommendations are laid down by his Department for the prescribing of (a) Largactil, (b) tranquillisers, (c) chloral hydrate and (d) neuroleptic drugs to prisoners. [56054]

Mr. George Howarth: Prison Service Health Care Standard 9 provides general guidance about prescribing practices, which must comply with legal requirements and conform to relevant professional codes. In prescribing particular drugs, prison doctors would be guided by the assessed clinical need and the information provided by the British National Formulary.

Holloway Prison

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the disturbance by prisoners in HMP Holloway on 13 August; and what action he is taking to avoid a re-occurrence. [56055]

Mr. George Howarth: There has been a series of incidents at Holloway prison in recent months which were connected to the non-issue of medication to prisoners. Clearly, there are concerns about the failure to provide medication. As a result, the governor has instituted an inquiry which will be conducted by the deputy governor, with the assistance of a senior nursing adviser from Prison Service headquarters. This inquiry commenced today.

Emma Humphries

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what drugs were prescribed for the late Emma Humphries during her years in prison; and for what periods they were prescribed. [56053]

Mr. George Howarth: Medical information about individual prisoners is confidential and rights of access are given only to those eligible under the provisions of the Access to Health Records Act 1990. It would not therefore be appropriate to publish the information sought.

Deportations

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners currently in the United Kingdom are expected to be deported on completion of their prison sentence; and how many of these had deportation orders added to their sentence without the recommendation of a court. [56063]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Reliable information on those persons currently serving a prison sentence who may be liable to, or are subject to, deportation action can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The available information, relating to persons recommended for deportation by a court, and to persons issued with notices of intention to deport on grounds conducive to the public good following conviction for a criminal offence, is given in the table.

Deportation recommended by a court [1] or on grounds conducive to the public good [2] following conviction for a criminal offence, 1994–1998 [3]

	Number of persons
	1994	1995	1996	1997 [4]	1998 [4,5]
Court recommendations made[1]	350	390	370	360	170
Notices of intention to deport—on grounds conducive to the public good following a criminal conviction[2]	120	80	120	90	50

Essex Police Authority

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much additional finance will be allocated to the Essex Police Authority when it becomes responsible for areas of the county currently served by the Metropolitan Police. [56151]

Mr. Michael: The change to the boundaries of the Metropolitan Police District will result in a re-allocation of grant between Essex Police and the Metropolitan Police from 2000–01, but it is too early to give an estimate of the amounts involved. I discussed this point with the outer London Metropolitan Police Group last week. There are complex issues of detail arising from the transfer and my officials will be discussing these issues carefully with both the Metropolitan Police and the relevant county forces during the coming months.

Police grant is allocated according to a formula which reflects the relative policing needs of different areas. The formula is built up from a number of components. We are considering the implications of the changes to the boundaries for the distribution of police grant under the formula.

Immigration

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases involving organised immigration racketeering his Department has referred for prosecution in each year since 1990; and with what results. [56465]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Immigration Service and the police work closely together to investigate cases of suspected immigration racketeering. However, it is for the police to decide whether or not to refer a case to the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS) and for the CPS to decide whether or not a prosecution should be brought.

Under Section 25(1) of the Immigration Act 1971, it is an offence to secure or facilitate the entry of illegal entrants to the United Kingdom. The table shows the numbers of prosecutions and convictions in England and Wales under this section since 1990.

Number of defendants prosecuted at magistrate's courts and convicted at all courts for offences [1] under Section 25(1) of the Immigration Act 1971 as amended [2], 1990–1997 [3] England and Wales

	Prosecutions	Convictions
1990	46	32
1991	73	47
1992	63	56
1993	33	28
1994	124	38

City Status

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the next award of city status will be made. [57155]

Mr. Straw: Her Majesty has expressed the intention of marking both the Millennium and the 50th Anniversary of Her Accession to the Throne by grants of city status. Towns which have expressed an interest in this honour will be contacted in due course and invited to submit formal applications.

Ministerial Engagements

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list his engagements and the engagements of his ministerial team on Wednesday 21 October. [56849]

Mr. Straw: I had two meetings in the Home Office in the morning and then went to the House for three more meetings and to attend Prime Minister's Questions. I remained in the House for the Report and Third Reading of the Human Rights Bill.

The Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), held a number of meetings in the Home Office, spoke at a Crime and Disorder seminar and at a Foreign Press Association Conference on Youth Crime, and was with me during one of my meetings in the House.

The Minister of State, my noble Friend Lord Williams, had meetings in the Welsh Office, the Home Office, Millbank, the House of Commons and the House of Lords.

The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), joined me for meetings on the Human Rights Bill and attended the report and third reading in the House. He also had a hospital appointment in preparation for an official visit to Africa next week.

The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, North and Sefton, East (Mr. Howarth), spent the day in Sheffield visiting the Fire Service.

The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), held meetings in the Home Office for most of the day, and joined me for one of my meetings in the House.

General Pinochet

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he received regarding Augusto Pinochet prior to his arrival in the United Kingdom for his current visit; and when he received such representations. [56234]

Mr. Straw: I received no such representations.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what requests his Department received for Augusto Pinochet to be interviewed; when he received such requests; and what factors he will take into account in responding to such requests. [56263]

Mr. Straw: Requests made by judicial and law enforcement authorities overseas for persons in the United Kingdom to be interviewed on a voluntary basis in connection with criminal investigations or proceedings are made through the United Kingdom Central Bureau of Interpol (Interpol London) at the National Criminal Intelligence Service and executed directly by the police or other law enforcement agencies. Where such requests are made directly to the Home Office they are referred to the police to execute.

The 5th Central Magistrate's Court in Madrid contacted the Metropolitan Police via Interpol on 14 October.

Requests made by courts overseas for statements to be made on oath or to be conducted before a judicial authority in England and Wales are made directly or indirectly to the Home Office. The Secretary of State may, if he thinks fit, nominate a court in England and Wales under section 4 of the Criminal Justice (International Co-operation) Act 1990 to receive such of the evidence requested as the court considers appropriate for the purpose of executing the request.

On 19 October, Interpol London received a request for Augusto Pinochet to make a statement. The request was made under the 1959 European Convention for Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters, for which the Home Secretary is the designated United Kingdom Central Authority.

As the Secretary of State I will consider whether the request is for evidence to be taken before a court in England and Wales and one for which the exercise of his powers under section 4 of the 1990 Act would be appropriate. If the Secretary of State considers the request is not one for which the nomination of the court would be appropriate, or the requesting authority clarifies that a voluntary statement would be sufficient for its purpose, the request will be passed to the Metropolitan Police to execute.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times Augusto Pinochet visited the United Kingdom since 1 May 1997, prior to his present visit; and when he was notified of each such visit. [56237]

Mr. Straw: In reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on 22 October 1998, Official Report, column 1206 about visits made by Senator Pinochet to the United Kingdom in the last five years, I explained that I understood that there had been five such visits, including the current only. I set out the dates on which I understood he had made the other four visits as: February and June 1994; October 1995; and October 1996. In answering the question, I took account of all the information available within my Department at the time.

I regret that it is now clear that, although my answer properly reflected my—and my Department's—understanding of Senator Pinochet's visits to the United Kingdom during the period in question, it did not take account of one further visit made by Senator Pinochet in the period since 1 May 1997, which had not been brought to the attention of the Home Office. I would therefore like to take this opportunity to clarify the position for the benefit of the House.

I can confirm that Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials have, since my answer, informed officials in the Home Office that, in addition to those visits made prior to 1 May 1997 of which the Home Office had been made aware, Senator Pinochet had also visited the United Kingdom in September 1997. There is, however, no Home Office record of that visit. A landing card should have been completed, as for any other visit, but these are not retained by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate in the case of routine visits.

Had I been aware of this visit I would, of course, have included a reference to it in my reply to the earlier question.

I have written to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North to express my regret for this inaccuracy. A copy of my letter has been place in the Library.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has made concerning Augusto Pinochet; and when he made them. [56271]

Mr. Straw: I have made no such representations.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he was notified of the intention of Augusto Pinochet to travel to the United Kingdom to make his current visit. [56236]

Mr. Straw: Neither I nor my Department was notified in advance of Senator Pinochet's intention to travel to the United Kingdom. As a Chilean national, Senator Pinochet does not require a visa to visit the United Kingdom.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he plans to take in respect of the proposed extradition of Augusto Pinochet. [56265]

Mr. Straw: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), on 22 October 1998, Official Report, column 1205.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he received from the Spanish authorities on the possible issue of a warrant for the arrest of Augusto Pinochet prior to the issue of such a warrant; and when. [56853]

Mr. Straw: I received no such representations.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he was informed of Augusto Pinochet's planned date of departure from the United Kingdom on his most recent visit; and if he passed that information to (a) the authorities of another country and (b) another body. [56854]

Mr. Straw: I was not informed of Senator Pinochet's planned date of departure from the United Kingdom on his most recent visit.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the public statements made by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry concerning the arrest of General Pinochet in London represent Government policy. [56694]

Mr. Straw: The arrest of Senator Pinochet is not a matter of Government policy. The decision to issue a provisional warrant is for the Bow Street Magistrate, under section 8(1)(b) of the Extradition Act 1989, in response to a request from an extradition partner.

Foreign Visitors

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions he has declined the request of a visiting group of MPs from another country for a meeting with a minister from his Department. [56851]

Mr. Straw: Whenever requests for meetings are received from Members of Parliament of another country, I and my colleagues and officials in my Department do our best to fulfil them. On some occasions this unfortunately proves not to be possible. For example, on Tuesday 20 October my office was asked by the Chilean Embassy if I was available to see a delegation of Chilean Opposition Parliamentarians to take receipt of a letter. My office said that I was not available but that my Private Secretary could take receipt of the letter. I have written further to the hon. Member about this matter. My Department does not, however, keep records for visits from MPs from other countries which are declined.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the occasions on which he or a member of his ministerial team have met Members of Parliament from another country in the course of their visit to the United Kingdom. [56850]

Mr. Straw: No central record is kept of meetings held with Members of Parliament from other countries. The list cannot therefore be guaranteed to be comprehensive.

Speed Cameras

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of (a) the effectiveness and (b) the cost-effectiveness of speed cameras as (i) a deterrent to speeding and (ii) a means of reducing accidents. [56547]

Mr. Michael: The Home Office study, "Cost Benefit Analysis of Traffic Light and Speed Cameras", which was published in August 1996, has shown that the use of speed cameras is cost effective and highly successful in detecting offences. It is also successful in modifying the behaviour of drivers and reducing road casualties. A copy of the Study has been placed in the Library.

The Government are committed to improving road safety and strongly support the police service in their use of enforcement technology. We are reviewing the current funding arrangements for these cameras to see what more might be done.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Defence Exhibitions

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list (a) the value of financial support provided to United Kingdom companies attending, (b) those Ministers and other Government officials who attended and the cost of their attendance and (c) any other costs incurred by his Department in connection with (i) IMDEX Asia 97, (ii) Paris Air Show 1997, (iii) IDEF 97, (iv) IMDEX 97, (v) the Underwater Defence Technology Conference and Exhibition, (vi) the International Defence and Security Technology Fair, Brno, Czech Republic, (vii) the 3rd International Civil and Military Aerospace Exhibition, Prague and (viii) the 3rd Central European Defence Equipment and Aviation Exhibition and Conference, Budapest. [54165]

Mr. Wilson: The financial support provided by my Department under the Trade Fair Support Scheme (TFSS) to companies attending the Paris Air Show 97 and IDEF 97 is as follows:

Event	Companies supported	Total funding (£)
Paris Air Show 97	38	133,187
IDEF 97	8	67,850

No support was provided under the Trade Fair Support Scheme for any of the other events listed.

The then President of the Board of Trade, the Minister for Energy and Industry and the Permanent Secretary attended the Paris Air Show 97; in addition 22 DTI Officials also attended at an approximate total cost of £12,000. My Department has been unable to identify a record of any DTI Ministers or Officials attending any of the other listed events.

Massachusetts (Burma Law)

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the EU pursuing a complaint at the World Trade Organisation against the US Government over the State of Massachusetts' Burma Law. [53664]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 31 July 1998]: The UK and EU consider that the Massachusetts Burma Selective Purchase Law breaks the United States' obligations under the World Trade Organisation's Government Procurement Agreement. On 8 September, after lengthy efforts to resolve the problem informally, the EU (and Japan) requested a formal WTO Panel. This request was agreed at the meeting of the Dispute Settlement Body on 21 October.

Millennium Experience

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the sponsors who are committed by written agreements to supporting the Millennium Experience, indicating in each case (a) the zones or activities concerned, (b) the amount of sponsorship and (c) the penalty laid down for non-performance of the agreement. [55678]

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the total sponsorship guaranteed unconditionally to each zone of the Millennium Experience under written agreement, indicating the companies or organisations concerned, the zone they have agreed to sponsor and the value of the sponsorship. [56681]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) has announced that the following companies have committed sponsorship to zones of the Dome and national programme strands at Board level:

Zone	National programme	Sponsor
Learn	Tesco Schoolnet 2000	Tesco
Work	UK Skills 2000	Manpower
Communicate	FutureTalk	BT
National Identity (part sponsor)	Children's Promise/ Voices of Promise	Marks & Spencer

Additionally BSkyB are sponsoring Babydome and both they and the sponsors listed above are Official Sponsors giving a sponsorship value of £12m each to the Millennium Experience project. Other sponsors announced and committed at Board level are: the Corporation of London; BA; BAA; GEC; BAe; Camelot; and Thames Water. The total commitment across the Official and other sponsors, already announced, is just over £100m. A further £60m of sponsorship is the subject of detailed negotiation. In addition, discussions between the NMEC and many other companies about further sponsorship opportunities are underway.

The normal process of full and final negotiations between the NMEC and the committed sponsors is progressing. The scope and nature of each contract will differ according to a number of factors—including the zone, the associated national programme, and the value and type of sponsorship. To reveal details of individual aspects of the contracts under discussion with the individual sponsors would run contrary to the strict confidentiality the sponsors have sought and would harm the NMEC's negotiating position on sponsorship generally.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many meetings he has attended in the course of his official duties at which there has been discussion of sponsorship of the Millennium Experience; how many of these meetings included lobbying organisations; and what contribution he made to these discussions. [55688]

Mr. Mandelson: I have not attended any meetings in the course of my official duties as Secretary of State for Trade and Industry at which sponsorship of the Millennium Experience was discussed. The New Millennium Experience Company are responsible for procuring sponsorship for the new project and they keep me regularly informed of progress.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what performance targets regarding (a) time and (b) budget have been set for the delivery of the Millennium Experience; and what penalties will be incurred by directors, executives, and employees of the New Millennium Experience Company in the event of failure to meet those targets. [55687]

Mr. Mandelson: The two overriding time and budget targets are: that the Millennium Dome is completely ready for opening by 31 December 1999; and that the entire project (including the Dome and the national programme of events and activities) is delivered within the £758 million budget. More detailed targets across the different programmes of the project are agreed between the New Millennium Experience Company and the Millennium Commission as part of the planning process. The Company published their Corporate Plan for 1997–98 to 2000–01 in early August, copies of which were placed in the Libraries of the House. The consequences for individuals of failure to meet targets is a matter for the NMEC and its Board.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the sponsorship of the Spirit Zone of the Millennium Experience. [55679]

Mr. Mandelson: The Millennium Experience project overall is progressing well, and that includes the Spirit Zone. The development of the zone design and storyline is on track and being taken forward in full consultation with the Lambeth Group. Positive discussions with a number of potential sponsors are also underway.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps the Government have taken to ensure that the electricity supply will not be disrupted by the millennium bug. [55793]

Mr. Battle: The electricity industry has made extensive preparations over several years to ensure that the millennium bug does not disrupt normal service. This work is continuing. My Department, the Director General of Electricity Supply and Action 2000 are monitoring these preparations and are discussing with the industry what more needs to be done to provide an independent assessment of progress, of what has been completed and of what more needs to be done. The Department and the Director General are also discussing with the industry the timing and nature of statements needed to reassure consumers that any potential problems are being tackled effectively.

Euro Fact Sheets

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many information packs inviting businesses to order fact sheets on preparation for the launch of the euro have been sent out; and how many businesses have requested those fact sheets. [55795]

Mr. Mandelson: In September, my noble Friend Lord Simon sent letters to 1.6 million small and medium sized businesses inviting them to find out what the introduction of the euro on 1 January next year would mean for them. The letter invited firms to send for a set of the "business preparations for the euro" fact sheets prepared by the Treasury's Euro Preparations Unit (EPU). In addition to this, the DTI has sent to exporters and business organisations more than 140,000 leaflets on the euro which direct businesses to the fact sheets for further information. To date, more than 220,000 fact sheet packs have been asked for by UK businesses and intermediaries.

British Petroleum

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has made to British Petroleum concerning the Company's internal investigation into arms sales and military activity in Colombia. [56258]

Mrs. Roche: No representation has been made to British Petroleum concerning the Company's internal investigation into arms sales and military activity in Colombia. The British Government believe that this matter is best dealt with by BP and the Colombian Government.

Multilateral Agreement on Investment

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement about progress in negotiating the Multilateral Agreement on Investment. [56321]

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the Government's present policy towards the Multilateral Agreement on Investment. [56539]

Mr. Wilson: The French Government announced, on 14 October, their decision to withdraw from the MAI negotiations. Together with our partners in the OECD, we are considering the full implications for the Agreement. The intention of MAI negotiators had been to present an Agreement to Ministers for signature in May 1999, but this now seems most unlikely. The Government—together with our EU partners—remain committed in the longer term to promoting negotiations on investment through the WTO and to the development of a liberal, rules-based framework for international investment that takes full account of social, environmental and development issues.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from regional development agencies concerning the implications for their activities of the proposed Multilateral Agreement on Investment. [56152]

Mr. Wilson: None.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list forthcoming intergovernmental meetings at which his Department will be represented to discuss the Multilateral Agreement on Investment. [56155]

Mr. Wilson: No dates have been set for any further meetings of the MAI Negotiating Group. I understand that the OECD Secretariat plan to organise a meeting in December for consultations between MAI negotiating parties. I also understand that the Austrian Presidency may call a meeting at EU level in November.

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by what means he consults the Governments of developing countries in respect of the Multilateral Agreement on Investment. [56154]

Mr. Wilson: The OECD Secretariat have organised a number of "outreach" sessions to developing countries during the course of the MAI negotiations. UK government officials have participated actively in a number of these sessions. In addition, the Department for International Development has ongoing bilateral discussions with a number of developing countries on investment-related issues.

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to announce the new map for RSA. [55960]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: Regional Selective Assistance is available in the assisted areas. Following the introduction of new European Commission guidelines on national regional aid, the Government is required to submit to the European Commission by 31 March 1999 proposals for designating new assisted areas. Once the proposals are agreed, the Government will announce the new map.

Working Time Regulations

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received from agencies and others involved in temporary placements concerning the working time regulations. [55957]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: The Department has received many representations from agencies, both in the form of responses to the consultation on the draft Working Time Regulations, other correspondence and meetings with officials. These responses were taken into account in drafting the final Regulations.

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect on the average cost of employing temporary employees of the working time regulations. [55956]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: There was no specific assessment of the cost of employing temporary workers. An assessment for the whole of British industry was made, a copy of which is held in the Library of the House.

Inward Investment

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry who has responsibility for setting the level of grant offered to inward investors in (a) England, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales and (d) Northern Ireland; and what arrangements ensure that they are not competing for the same business. [55963]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: Decisions on the level of Regional Selective Assistance (RSA) grant to be offered to a potential inward investor are taken once a single site in the UK has been chosen. Responsibility for final decisions rests with me, as the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, if the site is in England, with the Secretary of State for Scotland if the site is in Scotland, and with the Secretary of State for Wales if the site is in Wales. The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland is responsible for the final decision on the level of Selective Financial Assistance to be offered to a potential inward investor if the site is in Northern Ireland.

The Invest in Britain Bureau chairs the Committee on Overseas Promotion, part of whose role is to monitor rules agreed by Departments to avoid wasteful competition between the inward investment agencies of Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland, and the English regions.

Assisted Areas

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has for the extent of the coverage of the assisted areas map. [55959]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: Under new European Guidelines on regional aid published in March, the proportion of Great Britain's working population covered by the assisted areas (currently some 34%) must be reduced; the maximum reduction is 25%. The actual figure will depend on statistics to be produced by Eurostat and the Commission will inform us of the outcome by the end of the year.

Regional Aid

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultations he plans to undertake with those regions from which he proposes to withdraw regional aid. [55958]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: The Government published a consultation document seeking views on the basis for the new map in July. A copy was sent to the right hon. Gentlemen.

Lord Sainsbury of Turville

Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 1050, and the recommendations in the Fifth report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life concerning blind trusts, if an alternative arrangement to the blind trust for Lord Sainsbury's shareholdings will be made. [56377]

Mr. Mandelson: No. The blind trust for Lord Sainsbury's shareholdings was set up in accordance with the guidance in the Ministerial Code as one of the means of avoiding actual or potential conflicts of interest between a Minister's public responsibilities and private interests. The recommendations in the Fifth Report of the Committee on Standards in Public Life do not require any changes in blind trusts of this type.

BSkyB and Manchester United

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 1037, if he will stand aside in his regulatory role in respect of the takeover by BSkyB of Manchester United; and if he will make a statement. [56006]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: As in all cases I have carefully considered whether there is any reason why I should stand aside from a decision on whether the proposed acquisition by BSkyB of Manchester United should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, and have discussed it with officials. I have decided that there is no reason for me to stand aside.

Dounreay

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to publish the UKAEA initial response to the Dounreay Safety Audit. [55851]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 22 October 1998]: UKAEA plan to publish their response and action plan on 30 November 1998, the date for submitting it to the regulators for discussion. HSE/SEPA acknowledge in their report that it will take some time to deal with the recommendations. HSE/SEPA intends to keep the public informed of progress against the action plan by publishing reports from time to time and also through the normal quarterly reports to the Dounreay Local Liaison Committee.

Motor Car and Telecommunications Industries

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people are employed in the UK in (a) the motor car industry, and (b) the telecommunications industry, broadly defined. [56510]

Mr. Battle: The information available is as follows. Unless otherwise stated, figures relate to Great Britain.

Thousand

Standard Industrial Classification (1992)	Description	September 1996	June 1998
	Motor car industry (including major component industries)
SIC(92)25.11	Manufacture of rubber tyres and tubes	14.7	n/a

Water Charging

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 907, what response the Director General of Electricity Supply has given to his letter concerning the use of pre-payment meters to recover water debts. [56412]

Mr. Battle: The Director General of Electricity Supply will be writing direct to my hon. Friend, with a copy to me, shortly.

Aerospace Industry

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what sums are expected to be paid to the Government in sales levies to recoup launch investment by (a) British Aerospace, (b) Rolls-Royce and (c) other UK aerospace companies in each of the next 10 years; and if he will make a statement. [56479]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 26 October 1998]: Launch investment returns depend on the level of sales of the various aerospace products in which the Government have previously invested. We are expecting to receive, in total, over £100m in levies in each of the next ten years from a number of aerospace companies. Information about possible levies from individual companies is commercially confidential.

Science Budget

Mr. Pollard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will announce the allocation of the Science Budget; and if he will make a statement. [56842]

Mr. Mandelson: As a result of the Comprehensive Spending Review, the Science Budget was increased by £700 million over the next three years. This is solid evidence that science is a major priority for the Government. Of these additional funds, £300 million is the Science Budget contribution to a ground breaking £600 million partnership with the Wellcome Trust to upgrade university research laboratories and equipment. I am most grateful to the Trustees of the Trust for their contribution, and also their further contribution of £110 million towards the cost of a new high intensity X-ray source. Over the period of these allocations, £35 million of the Science Budget has been reserved for this DIAMOND project. A further £20 million of the additional money for the Science Budget is earmarked for the Science Budget's contribution to "University Challenge", a joint project to provide seed corn funding to enable universities to exploit ideas emerging from their research.

After receiving advice from action from the Director General of Research Councils, I have decided that the Science Budget should be allocated as follows:

£ million

Supermarket Monopolies

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with the Director General of Fair Trading relating to potential monopolistic behaviour amongst the four leading supermarkets. [56356]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 26 October 1998]: Since taking up current Ministerial posts, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not met the Director General of Fair Trading, whilst I have met him twice. My right hon. Friend and I are aware of the Office of Fair Trading investigation into the profitability of the major supermarkets in the grocery sector. The Director General exercises his powers independently of Ministers. I have not raised the matter of potential monopolistic behaviour amongst the four leading supermarkets with him.

Fuel Cell Technology

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assistance he is giving to the development of fuel cell technology as a means of powering vehicles. [56729]

Mr. Battle: Fuel cells and reformers are supported by the Department's Advanced Fuel Cells Programme covering both transport and stationary applications. Since 1992, the programme has supported over 92 projects with a total value of about £34m, including industry contributions. Current work in the transport area includes a bus design studies project to evaluate fuel processing and fuel options for urban bus applications, and the programme is in negotiation with a leading UK bus manufacturer to develop and test the first UK fuel cell powered urban bus. Future support for fuel cells is being considered as part of the Government's review of policy for new and renewable energy.

In addition, the Foresight Vehicle acts to co-ordinate publicly funded automotive R&D in the UK. Under the Department's supporting Foresight Vehicle LINK Programme up to £11.5 million is being made available, to be matched by industry, for research into system technologies for future vehicles. Proposals are currently being sought in the area of hybrid, electric and alternatively fuelled vehicles which includes technologies for onboard storage of gas and development of fuel cell electric vehicle powertrain systems.

The DTI's LINK Applied Catalysis and Catalytic Processes programme is providing a grant of £227k over two years to a consortium developing a low cost hydrogen generator for cars to support fuel cell deployment.

In addition, the EPSRC has been supporting basic and applied research in its "directed" fuel cells programme for the past 4 years. It has funded 26 projects totalling £3.7m. Fuel Cells are expected to form part of its £3.5m p.a. Renewable and New Energy Technologies Programme which is due to be launched next year.

South Africa

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action his Department is taking to encourage bilateral trade with South Africa. [54308]

Mr. Wilson: A three year trade and investment promotion campaign was launched in May this year promoting partnerships between business and government in the two markets. At the launch, an Investment Promotion and Protection Agreement (IPPA) was ratified and the Export Credits Guarantee Department (ECGD) announced its intention to enter into a co-operation agreement with counterparts in South Africa to establish co-financing mechanisms to support joint UK/South Africa projects in other parts of Southern Africa. The agreement was subsequently signed in September. An Internet based Gateway search engine was launched to assist smaller enterprises to research the South African market and a pilot study was launched to look at the scope for promoting partnerships between smaller enterprises, including South African enterprises operated by previously disadvantaged groups. Visits by ministers included an outward investment mission to Johannesburg and Durban led by the Minister for Small Firms, Trade and Industry in July, followed by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's visit to Johannesburg in September to co-host the first Partnership Week under the campaign with the South African Minister for Trade and Industry. Workshops on privatisation, design and tourism were extremely well attended by South African business and government officials alike. Ministers have also hosted several visits by South African central and provincial government ministers and VIPs. Underpinning these visits are eight trade missions to both markets, and six sector based initiatives involving workshops and follow-up missions planned for the year ending March 1999. The British and South African Departments of Trade and Industry are working together on trade and investment promotion, including hosting inward missions from South Africa to train new entrants on trade promotion, human resource and policy issues.

Electricity Imports

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions he has had with large energy users about the implications of current reductions in supply availability arising in part from French nuclear outages for future energy costs. [56773]

Mr. Battle: The impact on electricity prices of possible reductions in imports of electricity from France over the coming winter has been raised with my officials. It is not yet clear whether the current reductions in imports will persist and what the impact on pool prices will be if they do.

Ariane 5

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the potential benefits to those British industries which work in the fields of structures, propulsion and avionics, of participation in the Ariane 5 Evolution Programme. [55383]

Mr. Battle: The British National Space Centre has considered the views of the United Kingdom space industry on the likely benefits to the United Kingdom of participation in Ariane 5 Programmes. There are no current plans to join the Ariane 5 Evolution Programme.

PRIME MINISTER

Cabinet Committees

Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish an updated list of Ministerial Committees of the Cabinet. [55929]

The Prime Minister [pursuant to his reply, 21 October 1998, c. 1123–35]: The Minister of Transport was inadvertently omitted from the composition of the Ministerial Committee on Economic Affairs. The correct composition for this committee is as follows:

Ministerial Committee on Economic Affairs (EA)

Composition

Chancellor of the Exchequer (Chair)

Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions

Secretary of State for the Home Department

Secretary of State for Education and Employment

President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons

Minister for the Cabinet Office

Secretary of State for Scotland

Secretary of State for Health

Parliamentary Secretary, Treasury and Chief Whip

Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport

Secretary of State for Northern Ireland

Secretary of State for Wales

Secretary of State for Social Security

Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food

Secretary of State for Trade and Industry

Chief Secretary, Treasury

Minister of Transport

Minister of State, Cabinet Office

Other Ministers are invited to attend for items in which they have a departmental interest. The Chief Scientific Adviser attends for issues relating to science and technology.

Terms of Reference

"To consider issues relating to the Government's economic policies".

Mr. Cash: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the allocation of European matters to Cabinet committees and Ministerial sub-committees in the period since 1992, listing changes in that allocation and the reasons for them. [57020]

The Prime Minister: The composition and terms of reference of Cabinet Committees and their Ministerial Sub-Committees were first published by the previous Government on 19 May 1992, Official Report, columns 110–18. Since then updated details of these Committees have been published periodically, most recently on 21 October 1998, Official Report, columns 1123–35, when I announced the details of the Ministerial Committees which I have established to date. European Union matters will be considered by these committees from time to time. The principal Committee for considering questions relating to the United Kingdom's membership of the European Union is the Ministerial Sub-Committee on European Issues which is chaired by the Foreign Secretary and which reports to the Ministerial Committee on Defence and Overseas Policy.

China

Mr. Collins: To ask the Prime Minister what were his priorities for his recent visit to China; and which Chinese Ministers he met. [56428]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 26 October 1998]: My visit was intended to mark a new chapter in the United Kingdom's relations with China following the successful handover of Hong Kong. As set out in our joint statement, we agreed to enhance co-operation in areas of bilateral, regional and global interest including financial issues, trade and investment and environmental protection, and encourage closer cultural and educational contacts. At the same time, we shall continue to pursue our bilateral dialogue on human rights. In addition to my meetings with the Chinese President and Premier, I met the Vice Premier (Mr. Li Lanqing), the Vice Foreign Minister (Mr. Wangfan), the Minister of Foreign Trade (Mr. Shi Guangsheng), the Minister of Civil Aviation (Mr. Liu Jianseng) and the Vice Minister of Justice (Miss Liu Yang).

Sudan

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 915, on the US air raid on Sudan, what was the volume of the soil sample acquired clandestinely at the Al Shifa plant; and what steps were taken to establish that (a) it came from the Al Shifa plant and (b) it was untampered with before laboratory tests by American staff. [56774]

The Prime Minister: It is established practice under Section 1(c) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information not to disclose or discuss information received in confidence from foreign Governments.

Minister of State, Cabinet Office

Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Prime Minister, to which Cabinet committees the Minister of State at the Cabinet Office has been appointed; and if he will make a statement. [56696]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke) on 21 October 1998, Official Report, columns 1123–35.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Middle East

18. Mrs. McKenna: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the future role of the European Union in the middle east peace process. [54302]

22. Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the future role of Her Majesty's Government in the middle east peace process. [54306]

28. Dr. Vis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the future role of Her Majesty's Government in the middle east peace process. [54315]

36. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the middle east peace process. [54323]

Mr. Fatchett: I welcome the Wye River memorandum signed in Washington last week. I pay particular tribute to President Clinton whose personal engagement was crucial to success of these talks. We now need to see swift implementation of the agreement, accompanied by progress on the outstanding issues and a successful start to the final status negotiations, to maintain forward movement in the peace process. The EU is ready to sustain the momentum generated at Wye by helping with implementation, and will be discussing with the US how best to integrate its contribution into the next stages.

23. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet the Israeli Prime Minister to discuss the middle east peace process; and if he will make a statement. [54309]

Mr. Fatchett: My right hon. Friend has no current plans to meet Prime Minister Netanyahu. I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave today to my hon. Friend the Member for Cumbernauld and Kilsyth (Mrs. McKenna).

European Union

19. Mr. Ruffley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made towards European Union enlargement; and if he will make a statement. [54303]

Mr. Robin Cook: Britain negotiated the launch of the enlargement process during our Presidency and progress in the accession talks has been good. We expect that next month we can move from the screening process to substantive negotiations with six of the candidate countries.

Last week I visited two other candidate countries—Bulgaria and Romania—whose governments both expressed their warm appreciation of Britain's support for the enlargement of the European Union.

Gibraltar

21. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the progress of talks between Spain and the United Kingdom about Gibraltar. [54305]

Ms Quin: We continue to discuss Gibraltar with Spain as agreed in the Brussels Communique of 27 November 1984. We expect to hold a further meeting early next year.

Institute of Export

24. Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet the Institute of Export to discuss the trade promotion role of his Department. [54310]

Mr. Fatchett: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary at present has no plans to do so. In my role as FCO Minister responsible for trade promotion, I met the Institute's Director General (Ian Campbell) in June at the "Open for Business" presentation which I hosted for MPs and business representatives.

Lockerbie

25. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made in seeking to resolve the issue of a trial of alleged perpetrators of the Lockerbie bombing. [54311]

Mr. Robin Cook: I refer the hon. Member to the oral answer given to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), 27 October 1998, Official Report, column 152.

Entry Visas

26. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received regarding entry visas to the United Kingdom. [54313]

Mr. Fatchett: Since 1 January 1998 we have received 7,756 letters from Members about entry clearance matters.

Iran (Ballistic Missiles)

27. Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact of the proliferation of ballistic missiles in Iran on the balance of power in the middle east. [54314]

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact of the proliferation of ballistic missiles in Iran on the balance of power in the Middle East. [54307]

Mr. Fatchett: We were extremely concerned by Iran's flight test of its Shahab 3 ballistic missile in July. The acquisition of this system, with an approximate range of 1300 km, threatens the stability of the whole of the Middle East. We assess that the Shahab 3 is still in its development phase and, consequently, Iran will not be able to deploy the system in the immediate future. Whilst we understand Iran's legitimate security concerns, we have repeatedly urged the Iranian authorities to refrain from developing ballistic missiles. It is in nobody's interest for an arms race to develop in this already volatile region.

The UK, as a founder member of the Missile Technology Control Regime (MTCR), works with its partners to halt the proliferation of ballistic missiles programmes of concern. The MTCR has done much to deny, amongst others, the Iranian ballistic missile programme, key technologies and equipment.

United States

29. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent representations he has received on the United Kingdom's relations with the USA. [54316]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We receive numerous representations about individual aspects of our relations with the United States; but we have received none recently about the overall state of our relations in general.

St. Helena

30. Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the status of residents of the island of St. Helena. [54317]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Most residents of St. Helena are British Dependent Territories Citizens. The issue of British citizenship for residents of all UK Overseas Territories who do not already have it is a complex one. It is being considered sympathetically in the current Review of UK Overseas Territories and the result will be published in the White Paper.

Caribbean

31. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has held with his counterparts in the European Union relating to policy in the Caribbean. [54318]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has regular meetings with his EU counterparts, including on Caribbean issues. In June these included an EU mandate for the re-negotiation of the Lomé Convention. In February, he and Ministerial colleagues held discussions at the UK/Caribbean Forum in Nassau.

European Commission

32. Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects the European Union to reform the European Commission in respect of the number of members represented on it. [54319]

Ms Quin: The Protocol on the Institutions with the Prospect of Enlargement of the European Union, attached to the Amsterdam Treaty, sets out a framework for tackling institutional issues not resolved at Amsterdam. It foresees agreement on the number of Commissioners before the first enlargement of the Union.

At the Cardiff European Council, Heads of State and Government agreed that, once the Amsterdam Treaty had entered into force, an early decision would be required on how and when to tackle these issues.

Colombia

33. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to meet the new Government of Colombia to discuss United Kingdom relations with that country. [54320]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I have just returned from a visit to Colombia where I met several members of the new government including President Pastrana and the Foreign Minister, with whom I discussed a wide range of subjects of bilateral interest.

Agenda 2000

34. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the timetable for adopting Agenda 2000 with regard to enlargement. [54321]

Ms Quin: The Cardiff European Council agreed to adopt the Agenda 2000 proposals by June 1999. The reform of key policies is essential if enlargement is to be successful. The accession process is making good progress. The date of the first accessions will depend on the speed and success of the applicants' continuing preparations.

Indonesia

35. Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on his Department's role in promoting political reform in Indonesia. [54322]

Mr. Fatchett: We have welcomed the reforms announced in Indonesia since President Habibie came to power, particularly the announcement of elections next year. To show our commitment to the process of political reform, I visited Jakarta on 8 October and met President Habibie, members of his Cabinet and leading Opposition figures. I announced that Britain was ready to give practical assistance to help Indonesia hold free and fair elections.

Kosovo

37. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what initiatives he has taken to end political violence in Kosovo. [54324]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary gave in an oral answer today to the hon. Member for Taunton (Jackie Ballard), 27 October 1998, Official Report, column 139.

Drugs

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on progress made by his Department's special representative on international drugs issues in reducing the supply of drugs to Britain. [54289]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Special Representative identified the source and transit countries which pose the greatest threat to this country and has focused our international anti-drugs effort where it has the greatest impact on supply to the UK. A recent example of such targeted spending was announced by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary in Bulgaria on 20 October: we are providing a package of training worth £37,500 to help the Bulgarian law enforcement agencies to develop their anti-narcotics capabilities. In the financial year 1998–99 we expect to spend about £6 million on anti-drugs projects.

Sierra Leone

Ms Corston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the Sierra Leone donors conference. [54294]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I attended the United Nations Special Conference on Sierra Leone in New York on 30 July. It focused on the need for reconciliation and the restoration of democracy following the brutal rule of the military junta. Britain is leading the way in this. At the Conference, I announced a Department for International Development pledge of £6.5 million over two years to support the Government of Sierra Leone's Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration plan. In total, Britain has committed over £20 million for the rehabilitation and reconstruction of Sierra Leone since March 1998.

Camilla Carr and Jon James

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the welfare of Camilla Carr and Jon James. [54304]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Camilla Carr and Jon James are in remarkably good health after their long and traumatic ordeal. They have displayed admirable resilience and strength of character. They have now returned home, where they are continuing their recovery with the support of family and friends. The Foreign Office remains in regular contact.

Overseas Visits (Advisers)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the overseas visits between 1 July and 19 October on which Ministers have been accompanied by special advisers and, for each trip, (a) the name of the adviser, (b) the class and cost of travel booked for the adviser, (c) the class of travel actually used by the adviser and (d) the accommodation and ancillary costs for the adviser. [55998]

Mr. Robin Cook [holding answer 22 October 1998]: I was accompanied by my Special Adviser, Mr. David Clark, when he travelled to Brussels for meetings, including calls on the NATO Secretary General Sonana and SACEUR General Wesley Clark to discuss Kosovo. My party travelled on an RAF 125 official aircraft. The cost to the FCO budget for Mr. Clark was £229.

Since the visit was completed in a day, no accommodation costs were incurred.

Argentina

Mr. McWalter: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there have been any new exceptions to the arms embargo on Argentina. [57153]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have recently granted two exceptions to the embargo. The first was in respect of the sale of a further 24 nuclear, biological and chemical (NBC) protections suits and 8 pairs of boots for use by the Argentine contingent of the UN task force in Kuwait. The second exception was in respect of the export of 745 shotgun cartridges to an Argentine sporting goods retailer for sport and hunting use. These decisions represent exceptions but not changes to the embargo.

General Pinochet

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department informed the Spanish authorities that General Pinochet was visiting the United Kingdom in October 1997. [57011]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: No.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information his Department provided to the Spanish authorities about General Pinochet's intention to leave the United Kingdom on 20 October; when this information was provided; and by whom. [57010]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We provided no information to the Spanish authorities of any plan for Senator Pinochet to leave the UK.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information his Department provided to Amnesty International about General Pinochet's travel arrangements prior to 17 October. [57012]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: No information was passed to Amnesty International by the FCO about Senator Pinochet's travel arrangements.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when his Department was informed, and by whom, that General Pinochet was leaving the United Kingdom on 20 October. [57016]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials were informed on 15 October by the Chilean Embassy that consideration was being given to Senator Pinochet leaving the UK on 20 October.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department (a) arranged for and (b) paid for the use of a VIP suite at the airport for the visits of General Pinochet to the United Kingdom in (i) October 1997 and (ii) September 1998. [57014]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The VIP suite in each case was put at the disposal of Senator Pinochet, and paid for by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office as usual.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when his Department was informed that General Pinochet was visiting the United Kingdom during October 1997. [57013]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We were notified on 17 September 1997.

Foreign Visitors

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what status is afforded by his Department to foreign visitors travelling to the United Kingdom under special resolutions of the Chilean Foreign Affairs Ministry. [57009]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: None. Special arrangements are made according to the status of a visitor, e.g. Heads of State, Royalty, government ministers, heads of armed forces, chief justices, governors of central banks and heads of diplomatic missions and international organisations.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what guidelines are set by his Department for the reception of foreign members of parliament visiting the United Kingdom. [57015]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Members of foreign parliaments visiting the UK are treated like any other visitor on arrival unless they form part of the suite of a visiting VIP guest for whom special arrangements have been made, or are entitled to special facilities as result of past functions.

India

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on United Kingdom relations with India. [54284]

Mr. Fatchett: We have warm relations with India. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary met the Deputy Chairman of India's National Planning Commission, Jaswant Singh, on 2 October. I expect to visit India again in November.

Immigration and Visa Unit

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of hon. Members' correspondence received by the Immigration and Visa Unit was replied to within 15 working days, for the last month for which figures are available; and what were the corresponding figures for each of the preceding 12 months. [56226]

Mr. Fatchett: Statistics for the period October 1997 to September 1998 are given in the table.

Cyprus

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken by the UK to press the Turkish authorities to implement the UN and Security Council resolutions relating to Cyprus and the restoration of human rights. [56777]

Ms Quin: We are committed to using the UK's unique position—as a Guarantor Power, a Permanent Member of the United Nations Security Council and as a member of the European Union—in strong support of the UN Secretary-General's efforts to achieve a comprehensive political settlement in Cyprus in line with UN Security Council resolutions.

We therefore warmly welcome the UN Secretary-General's recent announcement of a UN process of contact between the parties aimed at reducing tensions and promoting progress towards a political settlement. We firmly support this process and urge all parties to co-operate with the UN in a constructive and flexible manner.

We also fully endorse the steps taken through the Good Offices of the UN Secretary-General to address human rights issues in Cyprus and urge all concerned to co-operate in support of these.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken by the UK to press the Turkish authorities to disclose the fate of Greek Cypriots who have been missing since the invasion of 1974. [56776]

Ms Quin: We have the greatest sympathy for all Cypriots who have lost members of their family over the past 30 years or more. We fully support the steps taken through the Good Offices of the UN Secretary-General to address human rights issues in Cyprus. We strongly endorse the efforts of the UN Committee on Missing Persons set up in 1981 to establish the fate of Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots listed as missing from 1963 to 1975, and continue to urge all concerned to co-operate fully with it. We welcome the exchange carried out in January and April 1998 through the UN by the two communities of information on the fate of the missing and encourage the parties to make further progress on this important issue.

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken by the UK to seek the withdrawal of Turkish troops from the occupied areas of Cyprus. [56775]

Ms Quin: We believe that the key to assuring the lasting security of all Cypriots is through a comprehensive political settlement. We fully support the UN Secretary-General's efforts to this end and urge all parties to co-operate in a constructive and flexible manner. We recognise eventual demilitarisation as an important objective in this context and encourage the Secretary-General to continue to promote efforts in this direction. UN Security Council Resolution 1178 of 29 June 1998 called upon all concerned to commit themselves to a reduction in defence spending and a reduction in the number of foreign troops in the Republic of Cyprus.

Service Standards

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the performance of the main departments and agencies against the six service standards for central Government. [55135]

Dr. Jack Cunningham [pursuant to his reply, 31 July 1998, c. 647–48]: I regret that a previous reply was misleading in two respects. It showed the percentage of letters from members of the public replied to within the target date by the Ministry of Defence as 96 per cent. when it should have read 86 per cent. The total volume of letters received by the Department for Social Security read 32,618 when it should have read 32,168. The table shows the performance of all Departments and their Agencies with these amendments made.

[1] Correspondence received between 1 November 1997 and 31 March 1998

[2] Figures relate to correspondence addressed to Ministers

[3] Correspondence addressed to Ministers, e-mailed to the MOD web site, and mail on defence issues received by other departments between 1 August 1997 and 31 March 1998

[4] As a result of the large increase in correspondence after the General Election it was often impossible for letters to be passed to the answering division within 15 days. Consequently many parts of the Department have interpreted the target as being a response within 15 days of receipt in the responding division, rather than from when the letter was actually received in the Department

[5] The number of letters received by the Central Correspondence Unit from members of the public, and the percentage of letters meeting the target, was taken from a statistically monitored sample

[6] Includes all Home Office agencies except the Prison Service

[7] This is the number of items of post received by the Department's network of offices

[8] Holding replies are not counted in order to maximise the incentive to issue full replies quickly

[9] Includes all Northern Ireland departments' agencies except the Prison Service, and the CSA(NI) and SSA(NI) whose performance is shown separately

[10] In addition 17,151 letters were received from DSS HQ but were passed on to the Department's executive agencies for reply and are therefore included in the agencies' return

[11] Total volumes are not recorded. Performance is calculated through a sample, which in 1997–98 was just under 25,000 letters

[12] Total volume not known. The performance against target was calculated by evaluating 4,000 letters sent out by a research company. In the same period some 780 letters were received addressed to Ministers—80.6 per cent. of these were cleared within 15 days

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Salmon

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the number and total weight of (a) salmon and (b) grilse taken by (i) anglers and (ii) commercial nets in (1) drift and (2) estuary nets for each of the last five years and for 1985, 1980 and 1975 or as much of such information as is readily available; and if he will provide the same information for fish classed (x) 1 sea winter, (y) 2 sea winter and (z) 3 sea winter fish. [55569]

Mr. Morley: Available information for England and Wales is given in the table. All figures relate to salmon and grilse although the estimated proportion of grilse in rod catches for the period 1993–97 has also been included. It is not possible to provide any further reliable data on catches broken down by age-class.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what powers he has to prohibit the distribution or sale within the United Kingdom of genetically modified plant products for animal or human foodstuffs; and what proposals have been made by the Commission of the European Community for further regulations or directives permitting their growing or sale. [55693]

Mr. Rooker: Following EU approval under Council Directive 90/220/EEC on the Deliberate Release of Genetically Modified Organisms into the Environment or the Council Regulation 258/97 on Novel Foods and Novel Food Ingredients, the sale of such products can be temporarily prohibited by a Member State if new scientific evidence is provided which demonstrates that human health or the environment is likely to be endangered. Such evidence must then be examined and accepted by other EU Member States before any such prohibition can be made permanent. Moreover, under the Food Safety Act 1990, the distribution and sale of genetically modified food, or food products derived from animals fed on genetically modified materials, could be prohibited if there was an imminent risk of injury to human health.

A Commission proposal for a Council Regulation on Novel Feeds, including genetically modified materials fed to animals, is expected by the end of the year. Discussions are also taking place on a revision of Directive 90/220/EEC with a view towards providing improved procedures for the regulation of genetically modified organisms, particularly a timetable for approval, whilst providing a framework necessary to address the concerns of public and industry.

Calf Processing Aid Scheme

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what the total cost of the calf processing aid scheme has been in the United Kingdom in each year to date. [55947]

Mr. Rooker: Expenditure on payments to operators in the UK for each financial year to date has been as follows:

Year	£ million
1996–97	51
1997–98	53
1998–99 (to 30 September)	21

Agrimonetary Compensatory Amounts

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is (a) the maximum permissible and (b) the actual or anticipated total of agrimonetary compensatory amounts paid out in 1997–98 and 1998–99. [55945]

Mr. Rooker: It is not possible to split the agrimonetary compensatory amounts into periods as specified in the question. The total amount that was available to the UK over the period in question is around £958 million, half of which could be reclaimed from the EU budget. This is broken down in the table. The bulk of this compensation was generated by green pound revaluations in 1997.

On 18 December 1997 we announced our intention to access some £85 million of this aid. Payment of this compensation has now been made, with £72.5 million of the aid resulting from the four revaluations of 1997 being paid to suckler cow producers, and £12.5 million being paid to sheep producers to compensate for the drop in their 1998 SAPS payments.

This aid has provided substantial additional assistance to the livestock sector. As we indicated at the time, it was an exceptional response to exceptional circumstances.

Nevertheless, recognising the difficulties being faced by the industry we are maintaining close contact with the farming unions and other interested organisations and keeping the situation under review.

Horses

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the European Union classification of horses as food-producing animals. [55806]

Mr. Rooker: I have received representations from the British Equine Veterinary Association, the Federation of Veterinarians of Europe and individual horse owners. Under European law, the horse is classified as a food producing animal. However, the Government have been guided by a statement by European Commission officials that, if a horse is not destined for human consumption, maximum residue limits are not required. It would of course be a requirement that the product should be clearly marked as not to be used on any horse that might be intended for human consumption.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the numbers and types of veterinary medicines used for horses which do not currently have a maximum residual limit; and what estimate he has made of the proportion which will not have a submitted MRL by 1 January 2000. [55807]

Mr. Rooker: There are 244 veterinary medicinal products authorised for use in horses in the United Kingdom containing a variety of active ingredients. 197 active ingredients for use in horses have been evaluated under the MRL Regulations. Under European law, the horse is classified as a food producing animal. However, the Government have been guided by a statement by European Commission officials that, if a horse is not destined for human consumption, maximum residue limits are not required.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which drugs used to support blood pressure during anaesthesia used in the United Kingdom for horses do not currently have a submitted maximum residual level; how many he expects to have a MRL by 1 January; and how many presently have a submitted MRL. [55804]

Mr. Rooker: There is no veterinary medicinal product authorised in the United Kingdom to support blood pressure during anaesthesia of horses. Applications for authorisation should be submitted to the Veterinary Medicines Directorate and would be assessed against statutory criteria for safety, quality and efficacy.

Farm Subsidies

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will give a breakdown of the £2 billion provided in 1997–98 to support British agriculture. [55749]

Mr. Rooker: Full details of the financial support for agriculture in 1997–98 can be found in the MAFF/Intervention Board 1998 Departmental Report to Parliament, a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

Organic Farming

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food by what means his Department intends to promote the take-up of the new arrangements in support of farmers switching to organic farming. [55751]

Mr. Morley: At the end of July, we announced proposals for a new Organic Aid with substantial improvements in the rate of aid for conversion of most types of land. The proposals are subject to the approval of the European Commission but it is hoped that the new scheme will be able to begin early next year.

The enhanced rates should in themselves encourage take up of the scheme. But the scheme will be actively promoted and the Government are already giving extra resources to the Organic Conversion Information Service, which provides free advice for those considering farming organically.

Pigs

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on which day he wrote to the Ministry of Defence to ask it to look at the sources from which they buy pork and other pig meat products. [56364]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 26 October 1998]: Immediately following my attendance at the Adjournment Debate on the pig industry in the House on 29 July 1998, Official Report, columns 346–354, I spoke to colleagues at the Ministry of Defence about their sourcing policies. Inter-departmental discussions at Ministerial and official level followed over the summer, culminating in my writing to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Defence Procurement on 23 September to confirm arrangements for the sourcing for the Armed Forces of pork and other pigmeat products.

Fisheries Council

Mr. Quinn: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Fisheries Council held in Luxembourg on 22 October. [57154]

Mr. Morley: I represented the United Kingdom at the meeting of the Fisheries Council in Luxembourg on 22 October together with the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Scottish Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald).

Major progress was made towards agreeing measures to amend the fisheries control regulation paving the way for their formal adoption by the end of the year. The proposals are aimed at strengthening control arrangements throughout the fisheries sector, including the more effective monitoring of third country vessels operating in Community waters, improved transparency of enforcement activity, a stronger role for Commission inspectors, and increased co-operation among Member States. Importantly, I was able to secure agreement that Member States may apply national designated port controls to all vessels landing into their territory along with more rigorous Community requirements for vessels landing abroad where designated port arrangements do not operate.

Political agreement was reached on supplementary measures which may be introduced in those Member States affected by the decision at the June Fisheries Council to phase out the use of high seas drift nets. Such measures must be confined to fishermen who suffer a real loss as a result of the drift net ban. They are additional to the options already available under existing structural provisions. A decision will be taken on implementation in the UK after consultations with the fishermen concerned.

The Council had an exchange of views on the future of structural policies in the fisheries sector in the context of proposals tabled by the Commission in March for reform of the EU Structural Funds within the framework of Agenda 2000. Discussion focused in particular on the need for simplification of procedures and for an appropriate balance between measures to achieve restructuring of national fleets and those specific to regional programmes. The Presidency will be reporting these concerns to the General Affairs Council, which is responsible for taking decisions on the Agenda 2000 framework. However, the Fisheries Council will itself return to the subject in the context of a further proposal expected from the European Commission shortly which will set out the detailed proposals for fisheries structural measures.

Tuberculosis

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to improve the collection of information about tuberculosis risk factors from cattle breakdown farms. [57228]

Mr. Rooker: During November the Ministry will be carrying out a pilot study using new survey forms designed to collect information on cattle movements, husbandry practices, wildlife on farms, and the local environment from farms which have suffered TB incidents, and from others which will act as controls. Comments on the forms are being invited from the farming and scientific communities and the public.

In December we will review the forms, and from January we intend to use them to gain information following all TB breakdowns. The information collected will be analysed alongside other data on local weather conditions and patterns of badger activity to determine which factors seem to be associated with a higher TB risk. These factors can then be investigated more closely.

Comprehensive Spending Review

Ms Keeble: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the implications of the Comprehensive Spending Review for his Department's expenditure plans for the next three years. [57156]

Mr. Nick Brown: I explained in broad terms the outcome of the Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR) for MAFF in my written statement to the House on 29 July 1998, Official Report, columns 341–45. Since then my officials have been translating the baselines for current, capital and ring-fenced BSE expenditure into budgets for the Department's individual programmes of activity. This process is complicated by the need to revise the programme structure to fit the Department's new aim and objectives. A detailed breakdown of planned expenditure will be published in MAFF's 1999 Departmental Report.

In the meantime I am setting out the key financial implications of the CSR for MAFF.

Current: running costs

The settlement includes £360.4 million in 1999–2000, £358.7 million in 2000–01 and £349.6 million in 2001–02 for MAFF's gross running costs, a change of £+5.2/+3.5/-5.6 million from the Department's 1998–99 running cost ceiling. Using the Treasury's

GDP deflator, this represents a year-on-year cut in real terms of 1.1/2.9/4.9 per cent. and a cumulative reduction compared with the 1998–99 baseline of 1.1/4.0/8.7 per cent. Included in the Departmental running costs baseline for the next three years is an additional £20.5/29.6/22.1 million for new work (including implementation of the Krebs report, food safety and modernising the administration of CAP payments). That means that the amount available for existing work is £339.9/329.1/327.5 million, a reduction of £15.3/26.1/27.7 million compared with the baseline for 1998–99.

This is a challenging target which will require the Department to find significant savings to cope with price increases, pay awards and other demands over the period. A thorough review of running cost baselines throughout the Department is currently in progress in order to ensure that resources are directed where they are most needed.

As part of the CSR settlement on running costs, MAFF is required to agree with Treasury a set of service delivery targets and an aggregate efficiency target. This work is in hand and will form part of the Department's Public Service Agreement, a new feature of the post-CSR arrangements which will set out in a single published document the Department's aims and objectives, resources, targets and efficiency plans for the three years 1999–2000 to 2001–02.

Current: scheme

Scheme expenditure (or programme expenditure as it is also known) includes non-CAP support and compensation payments to farmers (for example, under the agri-environment schemes) and MAFF's payments for work undertaken on its behalf by its Executive Agencies.

The plans allow for additional funding over and above the 1998–99 baseline in the following areas:

(i) food safety—a total of £3.9 million (plus £8.4 million in running costs—included in the Departmental running cost figures above) over the next three years to support work on protecting the public which will transfer to the Food Standards Agency, when established, and to help rebuild public confidence in the safety of the food supply;

(ii) animal health—an extra £4.4/4.6/4.4 million for implementing the Krebs Report on badgers and bovine tuberculosis, additional TB testing and on-farm surveillance work related to foodborne zoonoses;

(iii) countryside—an extra £7.6/14.3/19.5 million to fund improvements and enhancements to the agri-environment schemes as described in the Minister's statement on 29 July 1998, Official Report, column 349, including extra funds to enhance the payment rates under the Organic Aid scheme. In addition the sum available for new Countryside Stewardship agreements in 1999 will be raised by £1.0 million to £7.5 million.

(iv) export promotion—£0.6/1.0/1.0 million to restore sums transferred from Food from Britain's core funding in 1996 to support the Sector Challenge scheme.

Since the CSR settlement on scheme expenditure is insufficient to meet all the requirements for additional funding, the Department's plans allow for the following offsetting savings:

(i) £0.0/-2.4/-3.5 million from the closure of the Nitrate Sensitive Areas scheme;

(ii) £-0.4/-0.9/-1.5 million from the closure of the Postgraduate Agricultural and Food Studentships Scheme to new applicants; and;

(iii) £-1.0/-2.0/-3.0 million as a result of seeking to transfer to industry the responsibility for funding some of the MAFF research from which industry benefits directly.

In addition to the Department's expenditure plans assume the transfer to industry of the cost of milk testing for brucellosis and Enzootic Bovine Leukosis in 2000 and extending the range of chargeable work for the inspection of plant imports.

Capital

The Department's capital spending plans allow for the following increases in funding compared with the current baseline:

(i) flood defence—an extra £5.0/8.0/10.0 million in grant aid for flood and coastal defences;

(ii) marine research vessel—additional provision of £0.4/11.5/11.6 million for the commissioning of a new vessel to replace the two aging vessels currently operated by the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science (CEFAS);

(iii) CAP administration—£2.6/3.4/1.5 million (plus an extra £15.5 million in running costs over the three years—included in the Departmental running cost figures above) to modernise the administration of CAP payments to farmers by setting up a new integrated IT system, incorporating a Geographical Information System;

(iv) Objective 5(b)—£12.4/13.3/0.3 million for legally binding commitments that must be met in respect of payments under the EU's rural development programme in Objective 5(b) areas;

(v) fishing vessel decommissioning—new provision totalling £10.5 million over the three years towards restructuring of the fishing fleet, to complement the effort control arrangements already introduced.

Under the new public expenditure arrangements MAFF, like other departments, is required to produce a Departmental Investment Strategy (DIS) setting out how its capital resources will be spent and managed over the next three years. The DIS will cover all aspects of the Department's capital budget, including planned expenditure on buildings and IT and the disposal of assets. On the latter the CSR settlement incorporates certain assumptions about assets disposal. These include the sale of the Covent Garden Market site in 2000–01, subject to the passage of enabling primary legislation, and the sale of the MAFF office site at Tolworth also in 2000–01.

BSE

Over the next three years the baseline for ring-fenced BSE expenditure by MAFF and the Intervention Board will fall by £194/223/230 million compared with 1998–99. This reduction assumes that there will be savings on the Over Thirty Month Scheme as a result of green rate adjustments, that the costs of some of the control measures will be recovered from the industry through charges and that the Calf Processing Aid Scheme will close. I am reviewing with colleagues the precise timing of some of these savings in the light of representations I have received from the NFU about the state of the UK farming industry.

Despite the continued fall in the number of BSE cases overall expenditure remains high (£460–500 million a year) because of the precautionary measures that remain in place.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Child Abduction

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list the improvements he wishes to see in the operation of the 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, and if he will make a statement. [56680]

Mr. Hoon: The Government are generally satisfied with the legal principles underlying the operation of the Convention, which provides for the return of children who have been wrongfully removed from, or wrongfully retained away from, their country of habitual residence. There is always scope for improvement through better coordination and cooperation among contracting states. Discussions on specific problems take place regularly with other contracting states through judicial and administrative channels. Proposals put forward at the Third Meeting of the Special Commission of the Hague Conference are set out in their report published in August 1997.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will place in the Library all information available to him about (a) the deliberations of the Special Commission to review the 1980 Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction which took place in March 1997 and (b) the Special Commission's conclusions. [56686]

Mr. Hoon: The Permanent Bureau of the Hague Conference published a report on the March 1997 Third Special Commission on the 1980 Hague Child Abduction Convention in August 1997. Copies will be placed in the Library as soon as possible. A bibliography on this Convention is available on the Internet at web site http://www.hcch.net.

Court Service Charter

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if, for each of the last five years, he will give the number of complaints made under the Court Service Charter, the percentage of complaints upheld and the average and total amount of compensation paid to complainants. [56020]

Mr. Hoon: The Court Service became an executive agency of the Lord Chancellor's Department in April 1995. This information, specific to the Court Service, cannot be provided prior to this date. In addition, for the first year (April 1995-March 1996) there was no central system in place to measure the information required. This could therefore be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

For the financial year April 1996-March 1997, there were 1,100 justified claims for compensation and the total amount paid out was £404,095.11, an average of £367 per claim. For the financial year April 1997-March 1998 there were 1,033 justified claims for compensation. The total amount paid out during that period was £610,328.52, an average of £590 per claim. It should be noted that one payment alone in this period totalled more than £110,806.35.

Information on the total number of complaints made under the Court Service Charter is not available centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Visual Amenity (Planning Regulations)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans the Government have to review the planning regulations in respect of visual amenity and the impact of (a) mobile telephone aerials, (b) windmills and (c) electricity pylons. [56345]

Mr. Raynsford: None. I am satisfied that the existing framework of regulation and guidance is adequate.

Overseas Visits (Advisers)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the overseas visits between 1 July and 19 October on which Ministers have been accompanied by special advisers and, for each trip, (a) the name of the adviser, (b) the class and cost of travel booked for the adviser, (c) the class of travel actually used by the adviser and (d) the accommodation and ancillary costs for the adviser. [55999]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 22 October 1998]: The Ministerial Code requires Ministers always to make efficient and cost effective travel arrangements. In line with the practice of successive Administrations, civil servants (including Special Advisers) accompanying Ministers on overseas visits are entitled to use the same class of travel as the Minister they are accompanying to facilitate briefings and discussions. Ministers in this Department were accompanied by a Special Adviser on 4 overseas visits to Hong Kong and China, Portugal, Japan and Singapore, and Vienna. They were also accompanied by a total of 10 civil servants at a total cost of to date £67,431. Some invoices are still awaited for the Japan and Vienna trips.

European Structural Funds

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what have been the annual running costs for each year since their establishment of each of the regional committees or bodies for the disbursement of European structural funds; and by what means such costs are scrutinised. [56251]

Mr. Meale: In England the Government Office for the Regions provide the Chair and secretariat to the Programme Monitoring Committees (PMCs) responsible for the disbursement of funds for Objective 1, 2 and 5b programmes and most Community Initiatives, under the European Structural Funds. The current programmes have been running since 1994 and are worth approximately £400 million/year. The table shows the total outturn costs for Government Offices of managing those funds for which they are responsible, on an annual basis since 1995–96. Figures for 1994–95 are not available in this format. This table includes the costs of managing the regional allocations of DfEE national programmes, but not those administered by MAFF. It also does not include the cost of secondees from Programme partners to the Government Offices, or the expenses of the partnership representatives who form the membership of the PMCs.

The running costs of Government Offices, including expenditure incurred in managing European programmes, are subject to monitoring from the Government Office Central Unit and the three parent Departments (DETR, DfEE and DTI). A programme of audits is also carried out by the Departments' internal auditors.

Energy-efficient Lighting

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he has taken to encourage the use of energy-efficient lighting in accommodation occupied by his Department. [56193]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Property managers are asked to install energy efficient lighting, control systems and sensors to help meet DETR's target to cut energy use by 20 per cent. by March 2000 compared to March 1991. Lighting systems in new buildings use 50 per cent. less energy. Schemes are promoted to replace inefficient lighting systems in older buildings. For example, the Government Office for London has recently installed new lighting to cut energy use by 16 per cent. A new energy strategy is being drawn up to audit all buildings in DETR and to promote further measures to cut energy use. This will include more investment in energy efficient lighting systems.

Nuclear Fuel Flasks

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the numbers of nuclear fuel flasks originating in (a) France, (b) Germany and (c) Switzerland, which have been allowed into the United Kingdom and have levels of loose contamination in excess of levels normally found on flasks of United Kingdom origin. [56352]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: During the period from September 1996 to date, no nuclear fuel shipments entering the United Kingdom from Germany and Switzerland revealed loose contamination in excess of the regulatory levels. However, one flask shipment from Germany and one from Switzerland showed loose contamination at Dunkirk, whilst en-route to the United Kingdom. In both cases the contamination was removed to below the regulatory level before entering the UK and the flasks were found clean on arrival at Sellafield. France does not usually send spent fuel to the United Kingdom.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of recent tests in Germany on genetically modified maize in respect of cross-pollination with natural maize; and if he will make a statement. [56509]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 26 October 1998]: I have not seen the results of the German tests on maize. I will ask officials to investigate and will respond in due course.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what percentages of total carbon dioxide emissions in the United Kingdom arise from (a) power generation, (b) industrial production and (c) transport. [56828]

Mr. Meale: Power generation, industrial production and transport accounted respectively for about 27 per cent., 26 per cent. and 21 per cent. of total UK emissions of carbon dioxide in 1996, the most recent year for which final data are available. Provisional data for 1997 indicate that the percentage shares for the same three categories were 26 per cent., 26 per cent. and 22 per cent. respectively.

Telecommunications

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the future capacity of electronic communication to reduce transport need. [56731]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Over 1 million people already use telecommunications to work from home for at least part of their working week, cutting the number of commuter journeys they make. Given the rate of technological progress, the number of people working in this way is expected to increase in the future.

As the Integrated White Paper stated, this Government support the use of telecommunications to reduce travel and hope that companies will actively consider the possibilities in drawing up green transport plans. The environmental benefits will generally be greatest if teleworking is targeted at people who would otherwise do significant amounts of car travel. There will also be greater benefits if reduced commuter traffic is not replaced by more car journeys from the home, as could happen if improved telecommunications encourage people to shift from urban to rural areas, prompting less sustainable travel patterns overall.

Ministerial Vehicles

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the engine capacity of each vehicle used on official duties by Ministers in his Department. [56546]

Mr. Prescott [holding answer 26 October 1998]: My Department has Supply and Service Agreements with the Government Car and Despatch Agency for 9 vehicles for Ministers. Seven of the cars have engine capacities of 2 litres, the others being 4 litres and 2.7 litres respectively.

Cyclists

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will introduce a winter campaign to encourage cyclists to wear reflective strips on their clothing; and if he will make a statement. [56720]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department has this week made available new promotional material for young cyclists explaining the importance of being visible to traffic by using lights and reflectors and appropriate clothing—bright or fluorescent by day and reflective at night. As part of the promotion we have produced 750,000 leaflets incorporating reflective stickers. They are available free through local authority road safety officers. The Highway Code and Highway Code for Young Road Users also give advice on this issue to pedestrians and cyclists of all ages.

Aviation Fuels

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will assess the advantages of introducing a global levy on aviation fuels for investment in sustainable development. [56514]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government support, in principle, the introduction of a tax on aviation fuel at an international level and will continue to pursue, within the International Civil Aviation Organisation, the potential for market based options such as a global levy on aviation fuel.

Greenhouse Gases

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the current trend in UK emissions of greenhouse gases; and what estimate he has made of the level of such emissions in 2010 relative to those in 1990. [56513]

Mr. Meale: Total emissions of greenhouse gases from the UK have fallen from 215 million tonnes carbon equivalent in 1990 to 204 million tonnes carbon equivalent in 1996, the latest year for which figures are available.

Assuming existing policies and measures, total greenhouse gas emissions are expected to fall by approximately 10 per cent. from 1990 to 2010. Earlier this week, my Department launched a consultation document on additional policy options for meeting its climate change targets.

Kyoto Agreement

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the actions taken by the Government since the Kyoto agreement to ensure that the UK meets its emissions reductions targets; and what assessment he has made of the actions taken by the US Government to reduce their country's CO_2 emissions. [56512]

Mr. Meale: On 26 October the Government launched a consultation paper which lists the steps we have already taken and sets out in detail further options on how the UK could reduce its emissions of greenhouse gases. It aims to stimulate a national debate about how the UK can meet both the legally binding Kyoto target to cut emissions to 12.5 per cent. below 1990 levels by 2008 to 2012 and our domestic goal of a 20 per cent. cut in carbon dioxide emissions by 2010.

Our newclimate change programme will include measures to improve energy efficiency by business and in the home; reduce transport emissions; and increase the proportion of electricity generated from renewable sources and combined heat and power schemes.

Through our Washington Embassy and other contacts we receive regular reports of action taken and proposed, by the US Government to reduce their carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gas emissions. A recent US Administration report ("The Kyoto Protocol and the President's Policies to Address Climate Change: Administration Economic Analysis", July 1998) assessing the economic implications of their Kyoto target concluded that there was a strong rationale for action because of the dangers of climate change, and that the costs of doing so were likely to be modest.

Leylandii

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has reached a conclusion on the most appropriate method of enabling local planning authorities to control the impact of Leylandii and other fast growing conifers. [56417]

Mr. Meale: We are continuing to consider carefully whether Government intervention in relation to problems caused by these plants is necessary. We will announce our conclusions in due course.

We are separately, with the support of the horticultural industry, local government and consumer interests, drawing up a voluntary code of good practice on the sale, use and maintenance of such plants for domestic hedges. It will include guidance to garden centres, nurseries and other outlets on how to give purchasers practical information about their growth potential and the work needed to maintain them. The provision of better advice and information to consumers under this code should help to ensure that we do not store up more problems for the future.

Planning Applications

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions after what period of time he takes action to obtain essential information which he has judged to be missing from planning applications which he has called in for determination. [56438]

Mr. Raynsford: This will depend on the individual circumstances of each application. Action is normally taken as soon as it becomes apparent that the relevant information is required in support of an application.

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to reach a decision on the planning application made by Michael Knighton and Carlisle AFC for a mixed leisure and recreational development, which was called in on 8 January 1997. [56439]

Mr. Raynsford: The application in question has been withdrawn and so is no longer before the Secretary of State for determination.

British Waterways

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to make a decision about the future status of British Waterways; what options he is considering; and if he will make a statement. [56566]

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to consult interested individuals and organisations regarding the future role and status of British Waterways; [56434]

(2) what representations he has received regarding British Waterways becoming a trust; and if he will make a statement; [56433]

(3) what plans he has for the future status of the British Waterways Board; and if he will make a statement. [56431]

Mr. Meale: The Government have been considering a range of possible options for the future of British Waterways (BW). These include the option, proposed by the British Waterways Board, of establishing a statutory, charitable trust in the private sector. Other options include retaining BW in the public sector while developing BW's access to private sector finance and expertise.

Following BW's publication of its trust proposal, I have received a number of representations on the subject from employee representatives, waterway organisations and members of the public. No decisions have yet been taken. Once we have reached a view on the preferred option, we will inform Parliament and discuss it with interested parties.

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the Government's planned contribution to British Waterways in (i) 1997–98, (ii) 1998–99 and (iii) 1999–2000. [56432]

Mr. Meale: The amount of grant-in-aid to British Waterways over this period is as follows:

Year	£ million
1997–98	51.890
1998–99	52.690
1999–2000	Not yet advised

New Forest

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food regarding the number of broadleaf trees currently being felled in the New Forest; and if he will publish his Department's correspondence with the Ministry of Agriculture regarding the revision of the Ministers Mandate. [56504]

Mr. Meale: The Forestry Commission is responsible for managing the Crown lands of the New Forest and it does so in accordance with the Minister's Mandate. As far as I am aware, there have been no discussions or correspondence between my Department and either the Forestry Commission or the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food about the revision of the Mandate or the felling of broadleaf trees in the New Forest.

Transport Co-ordination

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to paragraph 3.68 of the Government's White Paper, A New Deal for Transport, when he proposes to issue general guidance on the application of prohibitions in proposed competition legislation to facilitate co-operation between operators in respect of connecting services, co-ordinating timetables and integrating networks; and if he will make a statement. [56688]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 27 October 1998]: The responsibility for issuing general guidance on the application of the prohibitions on anti-competitive agreements and the abuse of market power lies with the Director General of Fair Trading under Clause 52 of the Competition Bill, which will receive Royal Assent shortly.

Rural Mobile Shops

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what grants from his Department are available for the providers of rural mobile shops; and if he will make a statement. [56556]

Mr. Meale: The Department does not provide grants for rural mobile or permanent shops (although there may be scope for such funding within part of a wider regeneration scheme funded through the Single Regeneration Budget). The Government's agency, the Rural Development Commission, can provide grants for rural mobile shops, particularly where a fixed shop is not viable. However, the Commission's priority is to support fixed shops which, in general, provide a more complete service for the community.

Rail Freight

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) with which parties his Department has been having discussions on a Euro-gauge freight rail system from the Channel Tunnel to Scotland; [56310]

(2) what is his policy towards the proposed piggy-back rail-freight scheme; and if he will make a statement. [56312]

Ms Glenda Jackson: For some months, Railtrack has been working on an application for grant assistance for a major rail freight upgrade. In drawing up its application the company has had lengthy discussions with my officials. We expect to receive a grant application shortly. It will be treated on its merits.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is his policy towards the proposed central railway rail-freight scheme; and if he will make a statement. [56311]

Dr. Reid: Ministers have seen only the consultation documents which Central Railway has recently issued. The Government have therefore not taken a view on the scheme.

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) by what year he estimates on present projections the Channel Tunnel's rail-freight carrying capacity will be fully utilised; [56313]

(2) by what percentage he estimates the volume of rail-freight going through the Channel Tunnel would be increased if the Channel Tunnel's rail-freight capacity was fully utilised. [56314]

Ms Glenda Jackson: English Welsh & Scottish Railway (EWS) acquired the Railfreight Distribution business from the BR Board in 1997 and now operates freight services through the Tunnel. EWS estimates that, given the current mix of Eurostar, Le Shuttle and freight trains, the share of Eurotunnel capacity allocated to the national railways for freight trans will be fully utilised in ten years. The company also estimates that at that point in time, volumes will have more than doubled.

Area-based Initiatives

Mr. Singh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what arrangements the Government are making to ensure effective co-ordination of its area-based initiatives. [57389]

Mr. Prescott: The Government are committed to tackling social exclusion, reducing inequality and promoting regeneration and development. To help meet this commitment they have, in their first 18 months, launched specific area-based programmes and initiatives including Health Action Zones, the New Deal for Communities, Employment Zones and Education Action Zones.

These area-based programmes have their own distinct goals. But they share key characteristics. They are targeted on areas and communities where there is a need for priority action; they aim to support new, cross-cutting approaches; they promote genuine local partnerships with stronger local involvement; and they encourage greater flexibility and responsiveness in the operation of public spending programmes.

I am announcing today measures to ensure that area-based initiatives at neighbourhood, local, regional and national level are co-ordinated so that they serve local people as effectively as possible.

The Cabinet Office and my Department have circulated a guidance note to all Departments. The guidance note

- outlines the strategy for co-ordination of initiatives;
- defines the common characteristics of many area-based initiatives; and
- sets out the arrangements for handling proposed new area based initiatives and extensions to existing ones.

Copies of the guidance note have been placed in the Library of the House.

My Department is commissioning research on the mapping of these initiatives and on options for streamlining their accountability and funding. These projects will help us gain a better understanding of the interactions between area-based initiatives.

An interdepartmental support unit is being established in my Department to carry out day-to-day exchanges of information, advise on future initiatives and support their monitoring and evaluation.

In six key locations, which represent a cross-section of types of area and where there is a range of initiatives, the Government will build on experience and support the development of models of best practice in managing and co-ordinating initiatives. They will explore what lessons can be learnt, both about the way in which individual initiatives are delivered, and about their relationship to main public spending programmes. The proposed areas are: Newcastle; Plymouth; South Yorkshire; East London (Hackney, Newham and Tower Hamlets); West Cumbria and Sandwell. The Government will be contacting key interests in those areas, including local communities to discuss how to take forward these studies and define the target areas more closely.

The Government support the Local Government Association (LGA) New Commitment to Regeneration Initiative which is seeking a more co-ordinated and flexible approach to regeneration in 22 pathfinder areas through the preparation of comprehensive regeneration strategies for their areas. In these areas the implementation of area-based initiatives will take account of the emerging pathfinder strategies. The progress of the LGA New Commitment will be monitored at regular Central/Local Partnership meetings between the LGA and the Government.

The Government will continue to support the City Pride initiatives in Birmingham, London and Manchester through which local partnerships are pursuing a shared strategic vision of their areas.

Government Offices for the Regions and, in due course and subject to legislation, Regional Development Agencies will play a key part at regional level in the co-ordination of area-based initiatives.

In line with the Social Exclusion Unit report "Bringing Britain Together: a national strategy for neighbourhood renewal" an action team, led by my Department, will report by April 1999 on how to build on existing area-based initiatives and Local Government reform so that in the long term broad based strategies to prevent and tackle social exclusion become the norm, and good practice is disseminated and acted on. This will include development of more effective ways of disseminating information about the wider context within which regeneration programmes and initiatives operate.

The Government will keep these arrangements under review and reflect the outcome of relevant research and studies in the future development and operation of their programmes and initiatives.

Environmental Impact Assessment Directive

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received in the light of the consultation paper, Draft Town and Country Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) (England and Wales) Regulations 1998, implementing the requirements of the amended Environmental Impact Assessment Directive (97/11/EC); and if he will make a statement. [57391]

Mr. Caborn: The consultation paper on the draft Town and Country Planning (Assessment of Environmental Effects) (England and Wales) Regulations 1998 was issued on 21 July 1998. To date, 105 responses have been received from business, local government and environmental organisations, as well as members of the public. A list of the responses has been placed in the library of the House and copies of all the responses have been placed in the DETR library. The Government are considering these responses and the Regulations will come into force on 14 March 1999.

Unauthorised Camping

Mr. Pearson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will publish good practice advice for local authorities and the police on managing unauthorised camping; and if he will make a statement. [57089]

Mr. Raynsford: This Department and the Home Office have worked together to produce joint good practice guidance for local authorities and the police on managing unauthorised camping, based on research carried out by the University of Birmingham. I will be launching the guidance, and the associated research report, on 29 October at a conference organised by the National Association of Gypsy and Traveller Officers in Coventry.

Copies of the good practice guidance and the report will be placed in the libraries of both Houses.

SCOTLAND

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received on genetically modified food. [56712]

Mr. Galbraith: In the last year, on this matter, The Scottish Office has dealt with 84 cases of Ministerial correspondence; in addition, a further 69 cases have been dealt with by officials.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Chelmsford Jobcentre

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the number of notified job vacancies at Chelmsford Jobcentre for each of the last 12 months for which figures are available. [56551]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Richard Foster to Mr. Simon Burns, dated 28 October 1998:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your question in which you asked for information about the numbers of notified job vacancies at Chelmsford Jobcentre for each of the last 12 months. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to Leigh Lewis as Chief Executive of the Employment Service. I am replying in his absence.

Vacancies notified to this Jobcentre were as follows:

October 1997: 587

November 1997: 782

December 1997: 584

January 1998: 248

February 1998: 591

March 1998: 549

April 1998: 483

May 1998: 505

June 1998: 540

July 1998: 871

August 1998: 738

September 1998: 791

I hope this is helpful.

Special Learning Needs

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment by what means he monitors the ability of providers of vocational and other courses for people with disabilities to cope with their special learning needs. [56962]

Mr. Mudie: All provision funded by the Further Education Funding Council is monitored by the Council's Inspectorate. Provision funded by Training and Enterprise Councils is similarly monitored by the Training Standards Council. Both organisations have regard to the arrangements made for people with special learning needs when carrying out their inspections. Their reports are published.

EU Children's Comic

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what has been the total cost to public funds to date in connection with the EU children's comic entitled "The Raspberry Ice Cream War". [56764]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Publication of "The Raspberry Ice Cream War" is funded by the European Commission. No details of its costs are available.

PRIME MINISTER

Community Hospitals

Q11. Dr. Harris: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on community hospitals. [54801]

The Prime Minister: As I said in the House before the summer break, the Government recognise the important role that community hospitals can play in delivering locally based patient care. However, they must meet the same high-quality standards, and fairness and efficiency tests, as any other hospitals.

Euro

Mr. Cash: To ask the Prime Minister (1) how much the Government have (a) spent and (b) propose to spend in relation to the euro by way of (i) direct mail shots, (ii) pamphlets and information circulars, (iii) advertising on radio and television and (iv) schools information. [56939]

(2) what moneys have been (a) spent and (b) allocated by Her Majesty's Government towards circulating literature relating to the euro and to the preparation for the euro and to promoting awareness of the implications of the euro. [57006]

The Prime Minister: The single European currency will be introduced in 11 countries in Europe on 1 January 1999. The eurozone will form a market of nearly 300 million customers, and will account for about one-fifth of the world economy. It is by far the most important marketplace for UK business, accounting for around 50 per cent. of our total exports.

The Government's communication campaign on the euro is aimed at ensuring UK businesses, especially small and medium firms, are aware of the implications of the introduction of the single currency from 1 January 1999 and have the information they need to prepare.

To meet this objective, the Treasury Euro Preparations Unit received Summer Supplementary Estimate provision of £7.5 million for 1998–99. Spend to date has been approximately £0.5 million for direct mailing to 1.6 million UK SMEs, £0.5 million for the printing of factsheets and flyers, and £3.8 million for the costs of radio and television advertising. These figures do not include VAT or postage.

Additionally, the Euro Preparations Unit (EPU) has advertised in the national and regional press, organised regional seminars and training programmes, and produced a number of publications. No information packs have yet been produced specifically for schools. We will look to do so in the future when it is appropriate.

Decisions on any further spending will be based on an assessment of the effectiveness of the current campaign.

Tibet

Mr. Collins: To ask the Prime Minister if he raised the Chinese occupation of Tibet with his hosts during his recent visit to China. [56550]

The Prime Minister: In my meetings with Chinese leaders, I raised the issue of Tibet and urged China to enter into talks with the Dalai Lama without pre-conditions in order to seek a lasting solution.

Cuba

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the members of the Government who have met members of the Government of Cuba since 2 May 1997, separately identifying those who have met President Fidel Castro. [57030]

The Prime Minister: The following members of the Government have met with members of the Government of Cuba since 2 May 1997:

The Baroness Symons of Vernham Dean

Tony Lloyd MP

George Foulkes MP

George Howarth MP

Jeff Rooker MP.

President Fidel Castro was one of the Heads of Government I met briefly in the margins of the commemoration of the 50th Anniversary of the GATT in Geneva in May.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Welfare Reform

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a summary of responses to the Green Paper on Welfare Reform. [56021]

Mr. Darling: Consultation on the Welfare Reform Green Paper ended on 31 July, and over 1,050 responses have been received. Half of the responses came from organisations—including both national bodies and local groups, and academic bodies. Most of the remaining responses came from individuals. Seventy hon. Members also submitted responses, many from their constituents.

This has been a useful consultation on the principles that should underpin the Government's plans for welfare reform. The Green Paper set out a clear philosophy for the welfare state. "Work for those who can, security for those who cannot" is the foundation of our programme. It has received overwhelming support. The public's response demonstrates first a widespread recognition of the need for welfare reform, and secondly, endorsement of our approach.

Today I announced the publication of three documents, "Principles into Practice", "The Gateway to Work" and "Support for Disabled People", which mark the next stage of reform, containing detailed proposals for turning those principles into practice.

A list of the organisations and academic bodies who responded has been placed in the Library. Due to their number and size it has not been possible to accommodate responses in the library. However, copies of the list and specific responses are available on request from the Department of Social Security, by contacting the Welfare Reform Unit, 5th Floor, The Adelphi, 1–11 John Adam St., London WC2N 6HT.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his definition of loss in the context of his policy that welfare reform will not lead to losses for existing recipients; and what steps he has taken to ensure that no reform to date has lead to such a loss; [56676]

(2) if his policy of ensuring that no current recipients of social security benefits lose as a result of the Government's welfare reform programme takes into account real terms losses from non-indexation of benefits. [56515]

Mr. Darling [holding answer 26 October 1998]: We are today announcing reforms for people of working age. Details of how they will affect existing recipients of Social Security benefits are in the documents "Principles into Practice", "The Gateway to Work" and "Support for Disabled People" being published today. We are also announcing today details of the review of benefit rates.

Income Support

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will review the capital limits for income support. [56023]

Angela Eagle: We have no plans to change these limits at present. However, we continue to review the benefit rules as part of our commitment to modernise the Social Security system.

Incapacity Benefit

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people currently claim (a) short-term and (b) long-term incapacity benefit; [55934]

(2) what proportion of incapacity benefit claimants currently receive the long-term rate; [55938]

(3) what proportion of current claimants of incapacity benefit are aged (a) 25 to 35, (b) 35 to 45, (c) 45 to 55 and (d) 55 to 65 years. [55940]

Mr. Timms: At 31 May 1998, there were 1,644,640 Incapacity Benefit recipients. Of these, 102,400 received short-term lower rate, 99,180 short-term higher rate and 1,443,060, 87.7 per cent. long-term rate.

Of the 1,644,640 recipients, 1,545,560 were aged over 25 and under 65. The breakdown is set out in the table.

Age at 31 May 1998	Recipients	Percentage
All ages	1,644,640	100
25 to 34	145,500	9
35 to 44	252,220	15
45 to 54	464,420	28
55 to 64[1]	683,420	42

[1] Includes 25,220 women over pension age

Note:

The figures are taken from a 5 per cent. scan of the computer and exclude a small number of cases not on the system.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate his Department has made of the number of those currently receiving incapacity benefit who are capable of employment. [55933]

Mr. Timms: In order to qualify for Incapacity Benefit, a person must be assessed as "incapable of work" either for their own occupation or under the All Work Test. This does not mean that people who satisfy the All Work Test are unable to do any work at all: it simply establishes that their incapacity is such that it would be unreasonable to expect them to seek work as a condition for getting benefit. In practice, many people who satisfy the All Work Test may be capable of doing some work given the right help and support: survey evidence shows that around two million disabled people already work and over one million more would like to do so if they were given the right assistance.

We intend to change the All Work Test so that, as well as assessing people's incapacity in order to determine their benefit entitlement, it also provides information about their capacities. Together with a wider assessment of employability, this information can then be used to provide the help and support which disabled people need if they are to seek to return to work and increase their independence.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of current claimants have been in receipt of incapacity benefit for (a) under six months, (b) six to 12 months, (c) one to two years and (d) over two years. [55941]

Mr. Timms: The information is set out in the table.

Recipients of incapacity benefit at 31 March 1997

	Recipients	Percentage
All durations	1,797,900	100
Under 6 months	170,900	10
6 months to 1 year	114,700	6
1 to 2 years	164,900	9
2 years and over	1,347,400	75

1 per cent. sample of claimants

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate his Department has made of the savings from means-testing incapacity benefit for the first two years of all new claims. [55937]

Mr. Timms: No such estimate has been made.

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy not to reduce benefits for those claiming incapacity benefit, who are deemed fit for work, who reject a job or training place; and if he will make a statement. [56248]

Mr. Timms: It is a condition for receiving Incapacity Benefit that a person is assessed as "incapable of work" either for their own occupation or under the All Work Test. People who do not satisfy the appropriate test may claim Jobseeker's Allowance if they satisfy the basic labour market entitlement conditions for the receipt of that benefit; that a person must be available for, and actively seeking, work and have a Jobseeker's Agreement which remains in force.

Jobseekers who refuse an offer of employment or a place on a prescribed training scheme without good cause are liable to a benefit sanction. It is recognised that those with health problems can be at a disadvantage in the labour market, and people may therefore restrict their availability for work in any way providing the restrictions are reasonable in the light of their physical or mental condition. Any agreed restrictions on a jobseeker's availability must be taken into account when considering a question of good cause.

Child Care

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what estimate is provided by his Department's Family Resources Survey of the number of children aged 0 to 11 years whose childcare during the hours of parental employment is provided primarily by a grandparent or other non-parental family member. [56403]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the form requested. However, the 1996–97 Family Resources Survey, the latest available, shows that about 1.4 million of children aged under 11, where at least one parent is in regular paid work, receive regular childcare from a relative.

Note:

1. Figures are rounded to the nearest 100,000
2. The quoted figure may include some of those children who are regularly looked after by a non working parent.

Lone Parents

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many lone parents who are in receipt of state benefits live in the West Chelmsford parliamentary constituency; how many are receiving help under the New Deal for Lone Parents; and how many have gone into employment since receiving that help. [56406]

Angela Eagle: The information requested is not held by parliamentary constituency.

Income Support statistics can be broken down by local authority district. These show that, as at February 1998, there were 1,000 lone parents receiving Income Support in the district covered by Chelmsford Borough Council.

Lone parents are free to visit whichever Jobcentre they find most convenient; it is likely that those living in the West Chelmsford constituency will use the Chelmsford Jobcentre. Between 6 April and 23 October 1998, when the New Deal for Lone Parents was available for those making a new or repeat claim for Income Support, 64 lone parents attended an initial interview at the Chelmsford Jobcentre. Of these, 54 decided to take advantage of the service offered under the New Deal for Lone Parents. 19 have since taken up employment.

From 26 October 1998, the New Deal for Lone Parents has been extended to all lone parents on Income Support, including those whose claim was established before April 1998.

Note:

Income Support Quarterly Statistical Inquiry; sample size 5 per cent.; figures rounded to the nearest 1,000.

Widow's Benefits

Mr. Swinney: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost to public funds of introducing means testing for widow's benefit, and extending the benefit to male claimants; if he will estimate the number of people who would lose benefit under such a system, indicating their average financial loss; and if he will make a statement. [56247]

Angela Eagle: The information requested is not available. Estimates would depend on the form of means testing to be applied.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what evidence is provided by his Department's Family Resources Survey on the earnings levels of those receiving widow's benefits. [55663]

Angela Eagle: The Family Resources Survey (FRS) collects information on the earnings and other income of widows together with information on the income of other members of their households.

In 1996–97, the FRS sample included 140 widows who were in receipt of widows' benefits (widowed mother's allowance and widow's pension) and who also had earnings. The average weekly gross earnings of these widows at the time of interview was around £160 and the median gross earnings of this group was about £110 per week.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Workplace Drug Monitoring

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what his policy is regarding drug and alcohol testing in the workplace. [56732]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have no proposals to require random testing in the workplace for alcohol or drugs. The Government encourage individual employers to act in accordance with guidance issued by the Health and Safety Executive: "Drug Misuse at Work", issued earlier this year, and "Don't Mix it" issued in 1996. I am placing copies in the Library of the House.

Raves

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have died at rave events in the last five years; and how many of those deaths were as a direct result of attending the event. [56905]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Brian Cotter, dated 28 October 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent Parliamentary question on deaths at rave events.

Data on the number of deaths that take place at specific venues, such as raves, are not routinely collected at death registration. However, in some cases the coroner may mention on the death certificate that a death occurred at a rave. The number of deaths where the term 'rave' was mentioned on the death certificate is given in the table below for 1994–97. Equivalent data for deaths which occurred prior to 1994 could only be supplied at disproportionate cost.

Number of deaths in England and Wales known to be associated with raves, 1994–97

Year	Number of deaths
1994	1
1995	1
1996	1
1997	2

Voting System Commission

Mr. Stuart Bell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the report of the Independent Commission on the Voting System will be published. [57390]

Mr. Straw: The report of the Independent Commission on the Voting System will be published tomorrow at 11am. At that time, copies will be available in the Vote Office.

My right hon. Friend the President of the Council hopes to find time for an early debate in the House of Commons.

Party Conferences

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to make public funds available to pay for the cost of producing and distributing photographic security passes for the 1998 Conservative, Labour and Liberal Democrat party conferences. [56781]

Mr. Straw: The Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994 provides for the Secretary of State, with the consent of the Treasury, to pay grants toward the security costs of qualifying political parties' annual Party Conferences.

We have yet to receive applications in respect of grants for security passes for the 1998 annual Party Conferences.

Police Budgets (Traffic Expenditure)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of police budgets was spent on traffic (a) in Gloucestershire and (b) nationally in the last year for which figures are available. [56567]

Mr. Boateng: This information is not collected centrally. The allocation of resources to different functions is an operational matter for individual chief constables.

Traffic policing does not necessarily occur independently of other police duties, and the number of officers deployed to the traffic division is not indicative of the money spent on traffic policing. A large part of traffic officers' time is spent dealing with ordinary crime. It is an advantage that traffic officers deal with matters unrelated to traffic and that beat officers will also deal with traffic offences, thus contributing to more efficient ways of policing.

Speed Cameras

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what advice is issued to police forces about the siting of speed cameras, with particular reference to those which are not accompanied by warning signs; and what proportion of speed cameras do not have accompanying warning signs. [56553]

Mr. Boateng: Guidance on the siting of speed cameras has been issued to chief constables in the Home Office Circular: "The Use of Automatic Detection Devices for Road Traffic Law Enforcement (38/1992)" and to highway authorities in the then Department of Transport Circular: "Use of Technology for Traffic Enforcement: Guidance on Deployment (Roads 1/92)". Further guidance on camera signing has been issued to highway authorities in the then Department of Transport Circular: "Traffic Signal and Speed Camera Signing (Roads 1/95)". Copies of these documents have been placed in the Library.

Decisions on the siting of fixed speed cameras and the provision of warning signs are for local highway authorities to determine, in consultation with chief officers of police. The devices are deployed at accident hotspots or in areas where excessive speed is known to contribute to dangerous driving conditions. The provision of camera warning signs is recommended but is not mandatory. They are intended to identify the presence of cameras within a particular area rather than individual sites, as that would restrict the effect of the cameras to those sites.

Details of the proportion of speed cameras which are not accompanied by warning signs are not recorded centrally.

Electoral Registers

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to restrict the sale of electoral registers; if he will consider allowing individuals to have their names removed from lists which are sold to certain organisations; and if he will make a statement. [56562]

Mr. George Howarth: The sale of the electoral register is one of the issues currently under review by the Working Party on Electoral Procedures, which I chair. We are considering a range of options, which include allowing individuals' details to be excluded from the register which is sold on for commercial use.

Criminal Information (Housing Associations)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to allow the police to provide the names of convicted criminals to housing associations. [56564]

Mr. Boateng: The police have a common law power to disclose information where necessary for the prevention or detection of crime, and would doubtless use this to disclose information to housing associations where they judged it to be necessary.

Section 115 of the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 clarified the position with regard to the disclosure of information and, following that, the Home Office and Data Protection Registrar have issued a joint Statement setting out how this should properly be done.

The guidance on information sharing, including the joint Statement, is included in the Home Office's "Guidance on Statutory Crime and Disorder Partnerships", a copy of which has been placed in the Library. It is also available via the Home Office website at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/cdact/actgch5.htm

Firearms Compensation

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to pay the compensation to former owners of firearms who surrendered them under Option C. [56558]

Mr. Boateng: Over 7,300 claimants have already received compensation totalling £9.3 million under Option C of the large calibre handgun compensation scheme and the voluntary surrender scheme for small calibre pistols. In addition around 750 offers of payment totalling £770,000 are awaiting acceptance by the claimant.

Processing these Option C claims, especially those from firearms dealers, has been difficult, mainly because the evidence of value provided in support of the claims has often proved on examination to be insufficient, resulting in the need for further inquiries, while there has been a need to identify and eliminate a large number of ineligible items surrendered for compensation under the heading of ancillary equipment. This has tended to slow the rate of progress on Option C claims, but it has also enabled Firearms Compensation Section (FCS) staff to build up their expertise in resolving the difficulties presented by these claims.

We are now using this core of experienced staff as the basis for expanding the number of examining teams to 17, which, when fully staffed, should increase the overall staff numbers in the FCS to 115, more than double the original complement. The first tranche of 20 new staff took up post on 26 October 1988, and the expansion will continue as rapidly as possible, subject to the need to maintain standards of scrutiny.

This major expansion of the Section should help to increase the processing rate substantially and reduce waiting time. It could not have been carried out any sooner because of the need to ensure a consistency of approach in the examination of the Option C claims, both in the interests of claimants and to ensure that payments are properly made in accordance with the terms of the compensation scheme.

This action is in addition to the measures the then Minister of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), outlined in his reply to a written question from the hon. Member for Richmond Park (Dr. Tonge), on 30 July 1998, Official Report, column 393. The target is still to complete most Option C payments by the end of the year, and the remaining payments as soon as possible thereafter. We will continue to do all we can to shorten the timescale for completion of the work if at all possible.

Progress is also being made with the Option A and B claims, submitted during February under the statutory surrender scheme for small calibre pistols. Over 5,700 claims have been paid, over half the total received, and the remainder should be completed by the end of the year. Until the Option C claims under this scheme have been examined in detail, it is not possible to give a firm date for their completion. Work on these claims will begin as soon as the overall work position permits.

I can understand the impatience felt by compensation claimants who are anxious to receive their payments as quickly as possible. However, there is also a need to ensure that all claims are properly scrutinised to guard against fraud and ensure that payments are correctly made. The Government also wish to bring this matter to a conclusion as quickly as possible and we have taken the steps I have outlined to help achieve this.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his most recent estimate of (a) the administrative costs and (b) the cost of compensation payments arising from the ban on the ownership of handguns. [56174]

Mr. Boateng: Our current estimate of the cost of the compensation schemes for large-calibre handguns and small-calibre pistols remains at around £128 million, of which about £8 million is in respect of police and Home Office administration costs. The compensation figure is subject to revision as further claims under Option C of the schemes are examined.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his policy towards those from Kosovo seeking asylum. [56563]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: All claims for asylum from citizens of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, including those from the province of Kosovo, are considered on their merits within the terms of the 1951 United Nations Convention relating to the Status of Refugees and its 1967 Protocol. Consideration takes into account the latest information and advice on the country situation from a range of sources, including the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. Where an application for asylum is refused, consideration is given to granting leave to remain exceptionally outside the Immigration Rules on humanitarian grounds. We have not recently returned to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia any ethnic Albanians who have been refused asylum here.

Applications and decisions for the period January to September 1998 inclusive are set out in the table. The statistical return does not differentiate between citizens of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia by ethnicity.

[3] Includes Third Country decisions (Refused on the grounds that the applicant had arrived from a safe third country)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum cases were awaiting decision (a) on 1 May 1997 and (b) at the latest date for which figures are available. [56166]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: As at 30 April 1997, there were 54,020 applications for asylum in the United Kingdom, excluding dependants, awaiting an initial decision. The figure fell to 50,950 in March 1998. As at the end of September 1998, it stood at 57,545.

This partly reflects increases in asylum applications from the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Sri Lanka, Afghanistan and the Slovak Republic.

Illegal Entry

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many incidents of clandestine illegal entry have been reported to his Department (a) in each of the last five years and (b) in the most recent period for which figures are available; [56191]

(2) how many illegal entrants have been removed from the United Kingdom in (a) each of the last five years and (b) the most recent period for which figures are available. [56189]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Information on illegal entrants removed from the United Kingdom between 1 January 1993 and 30 June 1998 are given in Table 1.

In addition to clandestine illegal entrants detected directly by the Immigration Service, the Immigration and Nationality Directorate also receives notification of "self-confessed" clandestine entry and referrals of instances of possible clandestine entry and often involving groups of people, from other sources, such as the police. Regrettably, there is no central record of the numbers of such referrals received. The available information, which relates to the numbers of clandestine entrants on whom notice of illegal entry was served between 1 January 1994 and 30 June 1998, is given in Table 2.

Table 1. Persons removed[1] from the United Kingdom as a result of illegal entry action[2], 1993–98[3,4,5]

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to the letter of 24 August 1998 from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. O'Brien), in how many cases of clandestine illegal entry the individuals concerned have been referred to a place where their circumstances can be assessed and any applications processed according to the most recent figures which are available. [56173]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: As I explained in my letter of 24 August to the hon. Member, it is the normal practice of the Immigration Service to respond to incidents where immigration offenders are detected, although there will be occasions when immigration staff are already deployed dealing with other incidents and we are unable to respond immediately.

The Immigration Service is consulting the police forces most affected to ensure that incidents are dealt with properly. In areas where it is necessary, we hope to have a standard agreement in place in the next few months between the police and the Immigration Service which will provide a clear mechanism for dealing with clandestine entrants.

Local immigration offices have not, hitherto, been required to keep records of the number of requests to attend to which they have been unable to respond and this information has not been collected centrally. They have now been asked to collect and submit this information.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what arrangements are in place for the police to deal with cases of clandestine illegal entry where immigration officers are unable to attend. [56190]

Mr. Boateng: The Immigration Service endeavours to respond to all incidents involving clandestine entrants. As a result of the considerable rise in clandestine entry this year, there are occasions where resources are stretched so that the Immigration Service is unable to respond immediately. On such occasions, the Immigration Service tries to ensure that the individuals concerned are referred to a place where their circumstances can be assessed and any applications processed. The Immigration Service is consulting the police forces most affected to ensure that incidents are dealt with properly. In areas where it is necessary, we hope to have a standard agreement in place shortly between the police and the Immigration Service to provide a clear mechanism for dealing with clandestine entrants.

Targeted Policing

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he expects targeted policing of areas to be implemented in respect of (a) the initial 20 areas and (b) other areas; [56180]

(2) what criteria will be used to select areas to be made subject to targeted policing. [56182]

Mr. Boateng: We are currently considering specific criteria on which the money to be made available for the projects forming the targeted policing element of the Crime Reduction Programme will be allocated. We will certainly be adopting an evidence-based approach to targeted action and expecting careful evaluation of the outcome of each project which is supported.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how much additional funding is to be made available to police authorities in areas containing targeted policing initiatives; [56178]

(2) what estimate he has made of the number of additional police officers required to implement targeted policing of areas. [56177]

Mr. Boateng: The value of targeting policing effort at identified problems as part of a strategy to reduce crime and disorder is that it enables chief officers to decide how to deploy their resources most effectively to that end. A pre-requisite is that the strategy should be evidence-based, that is based on an analysis of the local crime and associated problems and that policing tactics are adopted in the light of the analysis. The crime and disorder audits required by the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 support this approach. Equally, our approach is output-driven and we will expect careful evaluation to demonstrate the extent to which crime is reduced as a result of any strategy and how that fits with the locally agreed targets for crime reduction. Experience around the country shows that targeted policing does not require additional police officers or other resources to be successful. However, to help forces develop this approach to crime reduction, we are making over £30 million available over the next three years for targeted policing projects as part of the crime reduction strategy.

This funding is in addition to the extra £1.24 billion which will be available to police authorities in England and Wales over the next three years under the Government's spending plans announced in the summer. This settlement, along with savings from the 2 per cent. year on year efficiency improvements which police forces will be asked to achieve, will help to ensure that more resources are focused on the front line against crime.

Senator Pinochet

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultation took place between the Metropolitan Police and his Department prior to the arrest of Senator Pinochet of Chile; and when. [57029]

Mr. Straw: Ministers and civil servants in the Home Office were kept informed by the Metropolitan Police of events leading up to Senator Pinochet's arrest on 16 October.

The decision to issue a provisional warrant for the arrest of Senator Pinochet was taken by the Bow Street Magistrate under section 8(1)(b) of the Extradition Act 1989 in response to a request from an extradition partner.

Trans-sexuals

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps his Department has taken to co-ordinate a review of the issues relating to the legal status of trans-sexual persons; and if he will make a statement. [56460]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Matters of concern to trans-sexuals are the responsibility of a number of Government Departments. The Government are considering how best to take forward the issues raised by the recent judgment by the European Court of Human Rights in the case of two British trans-sexuals, Horsham and Sheffield.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the names of those people he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May 1997, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed and whether they receive remuneration. [56791]

Mr. Straw: I will write to my hon. Friend with the information as soon as possible. A copy will be placed in the Library.

TREASURY

Gaming and Betting Duty

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Government's estimate of the gaming and betting duty forgone as a result of betting over the Internet. [57229]

Dawn Primarolo: No estimate of the gaming and betting duty forgone as a result of betting over the Internet is available.

Tourism (VAT)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to reduce the level of VAT for the tourism industry; and if he will make a statement regarding his policy on the taxation of tourism. [56552]

Dawn Primarolo: We have no plans for a reduced rate of VAT for tourism. Customs are, however, carefully studying a report by the British Tourist Authority on the scope for a reduced rate in this area.

Abortions

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how many abortions were performed in England and Wales on women resident in Northern Ireland by weeks gestation in the last five years for which figures are available; [56936]

(2) what is the total number of abortions carried out on residents of Northern Ireland in England and Wales since 1970; [56938]

(3) how many abortions were performed in England and Wales for each of the statutory grounds of the Abortion Act 1967 as amended on women resident in Northern Ireland in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [56937]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Crispin Blunt, dated 28 October 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary questions on abortions.

The information on how many abortions were performed in England and Wales for each of the statutory grounds on women resident in Northern Ireland requested is shown in the following table.

ONS Monitor AB 98/3, 1997

All figures for 1997 are provisional, and relate to notifications received by 19 May 1998. They are published in ONS Monitor AB 98/3 Legal abortions in England and Wales 1997, but are liable to change very slightly when final annual 1997 data are published in the Abortions Annual Reference Volume series AB No 24 in December 1998.

Dr. Vis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many abortions were carried out on Barnet residents in 1997; how many of these were carried out in NHS hospitals; how many were paid for by the NHS; how many were carried out by agency arrangement and paid for by the NHS; and how many were carried out in the private sector (a) inside and (b) outside Barnet. [56904]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Dr. Rudi Vis, dated 28 October 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your Parliamentary question on abortions in Barnet.

Provisional results indicate that there were 1,674 abortions performed on residents of Barnet Health Authority (HA) in 1997. Of these, 993 abortions were performed in NHS hospitals: 861 were paid for by the NHS and 132 were carried out by agency arrangement and paid for by the NHS.

Of the 681 abortions performed on non-NHS premises, 5 were terminated in Barnet HA and 676 were terminated outside Barnet HA.

Figures for 1997 are provisional, and relate to notifications received by 19 May 1998. They are published in ONS Monitor AB 98/3 Legal abortions in England and Wales 1997, but are liable to change very slightly when final annual 1997 data are published in the Abortions Annual Reference Volume series AB No 24 in December 1998.

Drug Deaths

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many deaths in each of the last three years have been attributed to the use of (a) co-proxamol, (b) paracetamol and (c) paracetamol in combination with drugs other than dextropropoxphene. [56545]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 28 October 1998:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your parliamentary question on how many deaths in each of the last three years have been attributed to the use of (a) co-proxamol, (b) paracetamol and (c) paracetamol in combination with drugs other than dextropropoxyphene. The information requested is shown in the table below.

Deaths attributable to co-proxamol and paracetamol in England and Wales, 1995–97

	1995	1996	1997
Co-proxamol	171	176	188
Paracetamol	324	279	335
Paracetamol with drugs other than dextropropoxyphene	75	56	62

Often a number of drugs are listed on the death certificate. If, for example, both paracetamol and co-proxamol are mentioned, the death will occur twice in the table, once under paracetamol and once under co-proxamol.

The figures for deaths where paracetamol or co-proxamol were mentioned on the death certificate include deaths attributed to these substances in combination with other drugs. Where two or more substances are listed together, the contribution, if any, of each to the death is unknown. Even where one substance is listed alone there may well be other factors with an important bearing on the death.

Moreover, coroners do not always record all specific drugs associated with a death on the death certificate. Therefore, with the information available from death registration, it is only possible to give an approximation of the number of deaths associated with or directly due to these substances.

CABINET OFFICE

Green and White Papers

Mr. Levitt: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will make more readily available to the public a full list of current green and white papers together with the relevant timescales for consultation. [56161]

Mr. Kilfoyle: Most green and white papers are published as Command Papers, full details of which are included in the Daily List of Publications issued by The Stationery Office Limited and which is available in printed form and via their Internet Web Site at the following address: (http://www.national-publishing.co.uk/d_listfr.html)

A complete list also appears on the UK Official Publications Bibliographic database (http://www.ukop/co.uk) which is published jointly by The Stationery Office Limited and Chadwyck-Healey Ltd.

Following publication of the Service First Unit's guidance How to conduct written consultation exercises, all consultation documents should also now be published in full on the Internet with information provided as to where responses should be sent and the deadline for these to be received. Officials from my Department are currently considering the practicality of creating a single entry point on the Internet which would provide an index and links to all Command Papers wherever they might appear on the Internet.

Workplace Drug Monitoring

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proposals he has for random testing in the workplace for (a) alcohol and (b) drugs; and in respect of which workplaces. [56498]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The Government have no proposals to require random testing in the workplace for alcohol or drugs. The Government encourage individual employers to act in accordance with guidance issued by the Health and Safety Executive: "Drug Misuse at Work", issued earlier this year and "Don't Mix it" issued in 1996. I am placing copies in the library of the House.

WALES

Manufacturing Industry

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what new measures he proposes to assist manufacturing industry; and if he will make a statement. [56490]

Mr. Hain: The Government inherited an economy displaying pressures which have led to boom-bust instability in the past. As a result, the economy needed to slow to a more sustainable rate. The Government recognise the concerns of manufacturers and exporters about the pound. They are pursuing policies to deliver long-term economic stability, the essential platform for encouraging high levels of growth and employment in the manufacturing industry, as in the whole economy. In Wales, our New Economic Agenda, Pathway to Prosperity sets out a programme for manufacturing industry in Wales to achieve world class standards.

Welsh Highland Railway

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what advice he has received from the Countryside Council for Wales with regard to the proposed rebuilding of the Welsh Highland Railway through Snowdonia, with particular reference to (a) the impact on the site of special scientific interest at the Aberglaslyn Pass and (b) the visual impact of signs required by the Railway Inspectorate. [56927]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The decision in this case will be taken by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions who has received a representation from the Countryside Council for Wales on the proposed Welsh Highland Railway Order. The CCW did not object to the project in principle but raised a number of issues for consideration by the Secretary of State, including a recommendation that no planting or seeding should be carried out on the exposures at the Aberglaslyn SSSI. They did not comment on the visual impact of signs but other parties raised this issue and it was considered by the Inspector at the public local inquiry into the scheme.

I understand that my right hon. Friend has received the Inspector's Report and is considering it.

Salmon

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number and total weight of (a) salmon and (b) grilse taken by (i) anglers and (ii) commercial nets in (1) drift and (2) estuary nets for each of the last five years and for 1985, 1980 and 1975 or as much of such information as is readily available; and if he will provide the same information for fish classed (x) 1 sea winter, (y) 2 sea winter and (z) 3 sea winter fish. [55568]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Catch statistics are recorded on an England and Wales basis, and the available information is given in the following table. All figures relate to salmon and grilse although the estimated proportion of grilse in rod catches for the period 1993–97 has also been included. It is not possible to provide any further reliable data on catches broken down by age-class.

Declared catches of salmon (including grilse) for the years 1975, 1980, 1985, 1993–97 in England and Wales

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Consumer Marketing

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will introduce controls over consumer marketing to ensure that information given or implied is not misleading or easily misconstrued. [56072]

Dr. Howells: There are already many controls to ensure that the marketing activities of companies are not misleading. Under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 it is a criminal offence to apply, in the course of a trade or business, false or misleading statements to goods and to knowingly or recklessly do so in respect of services. The self-regulatory system of advertising and sales promotion control, backed up by the possibility of action by the Director General of Fair Trading under the Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations 1988, is also designed to prevent false or misleading information in advertisements and other promotional material. In addition there are specific statutes which address misleading claims in sectors such as medicines, food and drink and financial services. The Government continue to monitor the performance of all such measures and, where necessary and proportionate, would not hesitate to propose new ones.

Sub-post Offices

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many sub-post offices have (a) opened and (b) closed since 1979 by county, and if he will list them. [55726]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I understand from the Post Office that, from the end of March 1993 to date, 583 sub-post offices have opened and 1,614 have closed. I have asked for a more detailed breakdown of these data and will place a copy in the Library of the House as soon as possible.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if redundancy packages of sub-postmasters/mistresses who have lost their jobs following closure of their sub-post offices take into consideration (a) loss of future earnings and (b) capital lost from their business as a result of closure. [55771]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Sub-postmasters are not employees of the Post Office, but are independent self-employed agents operating under a contract for services with Post Office Counters Ltd, I understand from the Post Office that this contract may be terminated by either party upon three months notice with no financial penalty on either side. Consequently, sub-postmasters do not receive redundancy payments in the event that their post office closes, or relocates to alternative premises.

I also understand that a Discretionary Payment Fund exists from which payments may be made to sub-postmasters in these circumstances provided that all eligibility criteria for consideration for such a payment are met. Each application is considered on its merits. This fund is jointly managed by Post Office Counters Ltd. and the National Federation of Sub-Postmasters. It is not part of the contract for services between the sub-postmaster and Post Office Counters Ltd.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many complaints he has received from sub-postmasters/mistresses over (a) the manner in which their sub-post offices were closed down and (b) the post office appeal procedure; and what action was taken to deal with such complaints. [55772]

Mr. Ian McCartney: My Department occasionally receives representations about the termination of a sub-postmaster's contract with Post Office Counters Ltd. and the associated appeal procedure, but has no locus to intervene in such contractual matters.

Ministerial Visits (Media Offices)

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the official visits he has paid to the company offices of (a) newspapers and (b) other media organisations during the summer adjournment, indicating the subjects discussed on each occasion. [56662]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: During the Summer adjournment I made the following official visits to the company offices of newspapers and other media organisations:

Date	Organisation
4 September	The Mail Offices, Hartlepool	Constituency business
23 September	YCTV, Ladbrooke Grove	Personal profile interview
6 October	This Morning Show, South Bank Studios, SE1	The Millennium Dome
12 October	Forbes Magazine, New York	General current affairs
18 October	Breakfast with Frost, BBC White City	General current affairs

Post Office

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration he has given to decreasing the external financing limit to allow the Post Office to invest in new projects. [56658]

Mr. Ian McCartney: Any changes to the financial framework within which the Post Office operates, including the external financing limit, will be announced in the context of the Government's decisions on the review of the Post Office.

Phillips

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions his Department has held with Phillips concerning the company's future in the United Kingdom. [56422]

Mr. Mandelson: DTI ministers and officials are in regular contact with Phillips and are currently in discussions with the company regarding a potential inward investment at its television tube plant in Durham.

Export Credits

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total value of export credits which have been issued by the Export Credits Guarantee Department for defence and security equipment in each of the last three financial years. [56899]

Mr. Mandelson: The total value of guarantees issued by ECGD for defence-related business in each of the last three years was as follows:

£ million

Year	Value of guarantees
1995–96	1,028
1996–97	404
1997–98	748

An analysis of this business by market has been placed in the Library of the House.

Millennium Experience

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish an account of the suggestions, instructions and advice which he has given to the New Millennium Experience Company about the Millennium Experience. [55684]

Mr. Mandelson: As Shareholder of the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) I have issued the Company with a Financial Memorandum and Accounts Direction, copies of which I laid in the Libraries of the House alongside the NMEC's Annual Report and Accounts on 30 July 1998, Official Report, column 564. In addition my role is to ensure that the Company meet the Prime Minister's five commitments on cost, content, national impact, legacy, and management.

The New Millennium Experience Coordinating Group, which I chair, brings together representatives of the NMEC, the Millennium Commission and the Department for Culture, Media and Sport to discuss progress in meeting these commitments. The group is not, however, an executive body, and I have no executive role as far as the NMEC is concerned.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish an account of all the proposals received by himself or the New Millennium Experience Company for the content of the Millennium Experience, describing the (a) scrutiny and (b) response which each proposal received. [55685]

Mr. Mandelson: Officials at the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, who support me in my role as shareholder of the New Millennium Experience Company (NMEC) pass every proposal I receive for ideas for the content of Dome content to the NMEC. The NMEC has received over 5,000 unsolicited proposals about the content of the Dome, related events and works of art. All such proposals are acknowledged on receipt. All content proposals received to date have been considered by a panel of NMEC's Production team who have responsibility for the Dome's content. The criteria used to assess the proposals include deliverability, compatibility with the various content design briefs and with the overall theme of the Millennium Experience (Time to Make a Difference), cost and attractiveness to visitors. Whilst imaginative and unusual, many of the proposals fail against these criteria. Those considered to be of merit are fed into the NMEC's established creative processes for content development. However, as the project moves through its implementation phases the scope for unsolicited proposals being taken into account in the development of the content reduces.

The costs of publishing details of the 5,000 proposals received, assuming the authors would agree to publication, are not considered to represent value for money.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the persons or organisations who will be responsible for providing the information and ideas to be conveyed in each zone of the Millennium Experience. [55686]

Mr. Mandelson: The New Millennium Experience Company's (NMEC) strategy is to ensure that as broad a range of advice and opinion as possible is taken on board in the development of the zone content. The Company established, in December 1997, a Strategic Creative Review Group—"The Litmus Group"—which is particularly concerned with the information and ideas conveyed in each zone, and the means by which they are presented. The Litmus Group meets regularly with the Company, the exhibit zone designers and the sponsors. The Group's membership and terms of reference are set out in the NMEC's Annual Report and Financial Statements 1997/98 which were published and laid in the House on 30 July 1998, Official Report, column 564.

In addition, on 21 October the Company announced the first group of "Godparent" advisers to the exhibit zones. All are experts in their fields with experience of communicating ideas in medicine, entertainment, science, the arts and the environment to wide audiences. They are Lord Puttnam (Work and Learn zones); Floella Benjamin (Local zone); Sir Neil Cossons (Mobility zone); Professor Richard Gregory CBE (Mind zone); Sir Michael Peckham and Professor Catherine Peckham (Body zone); the Hon. Sara Morrison (National zone); Professor Christopher Frayling (Spirit zone); John Sorrell CBE (National Identity zone); Michael Jolly (Play zone); and Simon Jenkins (Communicate zone). The Company have also set up twelve Youth Councils around the country, each comprising twenty 10–16 year olds, and a UK Youth Council which includes representatives from the twelve Councils and from the major national youth agencies. The Councils act as advocates, researchers and reporters on Millennium Experience plans.

Competitiveness White Paper

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the White Paper on Competitiveness will include details of the Concordat on Inward Investment. [56368]

Mr. Mandelson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: It is not my intention to include the details requested in the forthcoming Competitiveness White paper.

Public Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the names of those people he has appointed to public bodies since 1 May 1997, indicating the positions to which they have been appointed and whether they receive remuneration. [56818]

Mr. Mandelson: The Department publishes the names of all those appointed to its Nationalised Industries and its Executive and Advisory non-departmental public bodies on the Public Appointments Unit Website (www.open.gov.uk/pau/paupoint.htm). This information was last updated as of 30 September 1998 and includes the date of appointment and remuneration. I am placing a copy of the full list in the Libraries of both Houses.

Company Fraud

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to introduce new measures to regulate companies which (a) trade fraudulently and (b) change their name. [56074]

Mr. Ian McCartney: I have no new plans at present. My Department has and will continue to take enforcement action against directors who commit criminal offences or who are guilty of unfit conduct, or to refer matters to the appropriate authorities. For example, the Insolvency Service make such directors a target of disqualification action. More widely, the Department's current review of company law is examining how company law can be modernised to give an effective legal framework which will promote business competitiveness without compromising the essential protection for those involved in business transactions.

Cigarette Lighters

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many seizures of substandard cigarette lighters have been made by trading standards officers in each year since 1995. [56073]

Dr. Howells: Local authority trading standards departments notified my Department of six occasions in 1997 when consignments of unsafe cigarette lighters were seized. No seizures were reported for 1996. In addition, from 1996 to date, two suspensions and three prosecution actions have been reported. These actions were taken under the General Product Safety Regulations 1994. Records for 1995 are not readily available.

HEALTH

Paramedics

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress his Department has made towards a national register for paramedics. [55778]

Mr. Milburn: The Council for Professions Supplementary to Medicine considers petitions for state registration. I understand that a petition in respect of paramedics was submitted to the Council on 12 October 1998. The petition has not yet been submitted to the Government.

Breast Cancer

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has evaluated into (a) comparative rates of screening detection and (b) treatment regimes for breast cancer in (i) France, (ii) Germany, (iii) the USA and (iv) the United Kingdom. [56040]

Ms Jowell: It is not possible to compare the National Health Service breast cancer screening programme with services in France, Germany and the United States of America as they do not have comprehensive population breast screening programmes.

The Department has not itself commissioned any international comparisons of breast cancer treatment regimes. Treatment regimes will depend on protocols drawn up and agreed based on professional guidelines, research evidence, local organisation of health services and the needs and characteristics of the local population. However, the Department published in 1996 "Guidance on Improving Outcomes in Breast Cancer", the first in a series of evidence-based guidance on specific cancers. This included a systematic review of international research literature and evidence of effectiveness of breast cancer treatments. The guidance is being used to improve the provision of breast cancer screening services. Copies are available in the Library.

Children's Diet

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures he plans to take to raise the nutritional content of the diet of children. [56070]

Ms Jowell: We are committed to improving the health of our children and our recent Green Paper Our Healthier Nation contains proposals for activities to contribute to "The Healthy Schools Initiative". Our forthcoming White Paper will expand these proposals. Measures already announced to improve children's diets include the Government's Consultation Document on Nutritional Standards for School Lunches and the forthcoming guidance on Food and Nutrition in Primary Teacher Training.

Pain Killers

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total cost to the NHS in each of the last three years of co-proxamol prescriptions; and what would the proportionate saving if co-proxamol was replaced by paracetamol alone prescriptions. [56544]

Ms Jowell: The net ingredient cost of co-proxamol prescription items dispensed in the community in England 1995 to 1997 is given in the table.

Co-proxamol prescription items dispensed in the community England

Year	Net ingredient cost £ million
1995	14.4
1996	13.8
1997	14.1

Notes:
1. The data are from the prescription cost analysis system and cover all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered in England.
2. The net ingredient cost refers to the cost of the drug before discounts and does not include any dispensing costs or fees. It does not include any adjustment for income obtained where a prescription charge is paid at the time the prescription is dispensed or where the patient has purchased a pre-payment certificate.
3. Information about prescriptions dispensed in hospitals is not available centrally.

It is estimated that about £9 million would have been saved in each of the last 3 years if all co-proxamol items had been replaced by appropriate paracetamol items. These estimates are based on the average price per tablet/milli-litre over each year. They make no allowance for the differences in the size of tablets of the two products ie. the estimates assume that a 500 milligramme paracetamol tablet replaces a 325 milligramme co-proxamol tablet.

Children's Homes

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to regulate children's homes which accommodate fewer than four children; and if he will make a statement. [56554]

Ms Jowell: We intend to extend regulation to children's homes which accommodate fewer than four children. We will set out our proposals in the forthcoming White Paper on Social Services.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

National Lottery Distribution Fund

Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 19 October 1998, Official Report, column 919, on what estimates of the percentages of the National Lottery Distribution Fund to be received by each of the six good causes in 1999 and 2000 his decisions on the cash distribution were based; and if he will publish those estimates. [56255]

Mr. Banks: As I said in my earlier reply, our decisions were made on the basis of a new forecast of Lottery income for the present licence period. We now anticipate an extra £600 million for the Good Causes and have decided to allocate £200 million to the arts, sports, heritage and charities and £400 million to health, education and the environment. This will require adjustments to the current percentage shares and we will lay an Order giving effect to those adjustments after consulting the Lottery distributors.

Multilateral Agreement on Investment

Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to press for exemptions from the Multilateral Agreement on Investment for United Kingdom industries with particular reference to the (a) film and (b) publishing industries. [56153]

Janet Anderson: A successful conclusion to the MAI negotiations is most unlikely in the near future. We shall continue to consider the handling of the audiovisual sector within the MAI should negotiations resume. The Government have no plans to seek any form of exception for the publishing industry.

Museum Admission Fees

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the potential cost to (a) the Victoria and Albert Museum, (b) the National Maritime Museum, (c) the Science Museum, (d) the Natural History Museum and (e) the Imperial War Museum in (i) lost revenues and (ii) VAT rebates, of his proposals to introduce free admission. [56907]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 27 October 1998]: Following the Comprehensive Spending Review (CSR), an extra £99 million was made available for museums and galleries over the next three years.

Subject to achieving clear targets for efficiency and reform, this will enable the Trustees of the major national institutions to introduce free access for children from next year, for pensioners the following year, and for all in 2001. However, the decision to adopt any or all of the stages towards free admission remains with the Trustees of the individual museums.

We are currently considering detailed submissions from the charging national museums about the precise level of compensation required, and are liaising with HM Customs and Excise about the VAT implications.

National Lottery (Further Education)

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money from the National Lottery was allocated to projects involving further education between May 1997 and September 1998. [56941]

Mr. Banks [holding answer 27 October 1998]: Between May 1997 and September 1998, the distributing bodies awarded £78.7 million to 77 projects involving further education. Details of Lottery awards may be found on the Department's web site at www.lottery.culture.gov.uk.

National Lottery (Hospices)

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many hospices have applied for National Lottery funding; and how many applications have been successful. [56687]

Mr. Banks: To date, 321 applications have been made by hospices for National Lottery funding. 33 applications totalling £6.3 million have so far been successful.

Digital Television

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Independent Television Commission concerning the proposed provision of the digital ITV and ITV2 services on the digital services of British Sky Broadcasting; and if he will make a statement. [56419]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 26 October 1998]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I meet the Chairman of the Independent Television Commission from time to time to discuss a range of broadcasting issues, including the prospects for digital television across all delivery platforms. Whether to seek digital satellite carriage is a commercial decision for individual broadcasters—including ITV—and not one in which Ministers have a locus.

World Cup

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what support he has given to efforts to attract the 2006 Football World Cup to the United Kingdom. [56029]

Mr. Banks: The Government, from the Prime Minister down, are providing the fullest diplomatic and promotional support for the FA's bid to stage the 2006 World Cup. I hold regular meetings with the FA Campaign Team. I have personally discussed the bid with several members of the FIFA Executive Committee, either here in London or in their home countries. I will continue to accompany FA delegations to promote the bid as Parliamentary business allows. I have written to hon. Members urging them to use every opportunity to support the bid, and have been heartened by the positive response. I was delighted that the hon. Member, together with the hon. Member for Suffolk, West (Mr. Spring) and other right hon. and hon. Members, were able to join me at a reception at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 26 October at which Sepp Blatter, the FIFA President, following his meeting with the Prime Minister, was the principal guest.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iran

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make representations to the Government of Iran about (a) the continuation of the execution order against Salman Rushdie, and (b) the continuing violations of human rights with particular reference to executions. [56707]

Mr. Fatchett: In New York on 24 September Dr. Kharrazi, the Iranian Foreign Minister, made an unequivocal statement of the Iranian Government's position on the threat to Salman Rushdie. He made it clear that his Government will take no action whatsoever to threaten the life of Salman Rushdie or anybody associated with his work, nor will it encourage or assist anybody to do so. We have long sought such assurances.

We have made our concerns known to the Iranians about the recent increases in the bounty. The Iranian Government have always maintained that the bounty offered by the XV Khordad Foundation was a private matter over which they had no control. In his statement in New York Dr. Kharrazi said that his government disassociated themselves from the bounty and did not support it. We shall continue to look for ways of resolving this matter satisfactorily.

We and our EU Partners intend to continue our policy of engagement with the Iranian regime. This will include, as in the past, keeping up pressure for improvements in some Iranian policies, including those affecting human rights. In particular, we shall continue to press the Iranians to allow a visit to Iran by the UN Human Rights Special Rapporteur, Maurice Copithorne.

Loizidou v. Turkey

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals will be put forward by Her Majesty's Government as a member of the Council of Europe and as a guarantor power to seek enforcement of the judgment of the Court of Human Rights in the case of Loizidou v. Turkey. [56336]

Ms Quin: In line with Council of Europe procedure, the UK, along with other members of the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers, has invited Turkey to inform the Committee of the measures it proposes to take in consequence of the judgment, given its obligation under Article 53 of the Convention to abide by the Court's judgment.

Tibet

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Chinese Government about China's occupation of Tibet. [56559]

Mr. Fatchett: The situation in Tibet is a matter of great concern. It is being addressed through our continuing bilateral and EU human rights dialogues with China. When my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary visited China in January, he encouraged Chinese leaders to enter into talks with the Dalai Lama in order to seek a lasting solution. He also raised a list of individual human rights cases, which included a number of Tibetans. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister did the same when he met Chinese leaders earlier this month.

Kosovo

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia regarding (a) attacks on civilians, arbitrary arrests and expulsions, and (b) the actions of the Kosovo Liberation Army; and if he will make a statement about the situation in Kosovo. [56555]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We have made frequent representations to the FYR government concerning the repressive actions of its security forces in Kosovo. In particular, we have condemned the indiscriminate attacks on civilians and the wanton destruction of their homes and livelihoods. We expect the FYR to comply fully with the demands of UNSCR 1199. NATO stands ready to act if they fail to do so. Equally, we expect the Kosovo Liberations Army to meet the demands of UNSCR 1199, including to cease hostilities.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to ensure that (a) independent human rights monitors have access to all parts of Kosovo, (b) resources are made available for the UN Human Rights Monitoring Programme, and (c) an independent international criminal court is set up; and if he will make a statement. [56778]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: (a) We co-sponsored United Nations Security Council resolution 1203 (adopted on 24 October) which places the weight of the Security Council behind the commitments made by President Milosevic to comply with early Security Council resolutions 1160 and 1199. The resolution calls for implementation of the agreement with the OSCE to allow 2,000 verifiers to deploy throughout Kosovo to monitor compliance with the earlier resolutions, assisted by NATO reconnaissance flights.

(b) We have contributed £410,000 to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights to support the setting up of a field operation in Kosovo.

(c) We are among the first 120 states which decided on 17 July this year to establish the International Criminal Court. However, the Court will come into effect only when sixty States have ratified its Statute and will not have jurisdiction over events which take place before then.

The International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia has jurisdiction to investigate and prosecute war crimes against humanity throughout the territory of the former Yugoslavia, including Kosovo.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Albania

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assistance has been given by the United Kingdom Government to Albania in each of the last three years; and if she will make a statement. [56718]
